give tithes of mint and cummin." That is just as comic as the man who lay in the ditch and believed that he was on horseback. For the Pharisee believes that he is talking with God, whereas, to judge from what he says, it is clear enough that he is talking to himself or to another Pharisee. Similarly, in case an innkeeper were to stand in a church and talk with God in prayer, saying, "I am not like the other innkeepers who only give the prescribed wages, I give good wages and a New Year holiday besides," he is not for all this a hypocrite, but he is comic, since it is clear that he is not talking with God but is talking to himself, qua innkeeper, or to one of the other innkeepers. Therefore one should never summon God's aid in behalf of a wish, for thereby one binds oneself absolutely. For if this wish is not fulfilled, God and I are not for this cause quits, but I must stand by my word, I must every instant hold fast to the declaration that this was and is my only wish, so seriously, so eternally my only wish that I ventured to give it religious expression. For if after some time has passed I come with a new wish and send out a message to God again, just as whimpering parents send out a message to the doctor for nothing at all — what then? Then I have made a fool of God, and at the same time have shown that I am a comic individual who, far from being a hypocrite, took it for granted that to pray to God was the same as to pat pappa on the chin and say, "Please, please."

Here ends the report; my common sense has received its tribute, I owe it nothing more. Come now and remain with me, my beloved pain! Outwardly she cannot now be mine (or might it be possible; oh, if only it were possible!), but that in a spiritual sense she should not be where I am is a thought that puts everything to confusion for me. Can the one person not understand the other? Is there then no equality in religion?

— Why did I carry her out with me upon the stream? Why was I so at fault as to apply to a girl's existence a standard which only disturbs us both? Yes, now, now it is too late. Even if everything were to turn out happily, so that she does in effect help herself out of her misery, or never has been so very deep in it, yet to me the religious is so completely the true meaning of life that it terrifies me to think that she might be healed only in a temporal sense. When one has not this anxious care it is easy enough to withdraw with senseless glittering glory, like an elect spirit. But in case my (if it may be so called) great standard has disturbed her life, then she in turn holds me by her (if it may be so called) little standard; she with her little standard is for me a prodigious despot, because without her I cannot bring to completion any life-view, since through her I feel sympathy for every man. Without having any particular knowledge of mankind, it has been my comfort, and as it were my victory over life, my repose from the invidious diversities in life, that one might require religion of every individual. And yet I have stumbled upon an individual of whom I do not know whether I dare require it, whether I may not thereby do an injustice. But on the other hand, if there exists one single individual of such a sort, if therefore religion is to go in the same harness with genius and talent, then I am reduced to impotence, for this thought is properly my life-thought, which gives me the frank-heartedness not to envy the distinguished and highly favored, and gives me the tranquillity of mind not to be distracted at the wretchedness of the man who outwardly is more wretched than I.

Furthermore, suppose that in the last resort she more admired than loved me, suppose she cherished the pitiful notion that I was something great. How difficult then it must be for her, who was perhaps intoxicated by the conceited dream that I worshipped her, to overcome such an impression. And again it is my fault that she is humbled in this way! When one has not such an anxious care, one can well understand that it is a temptation to be reckoned among the persons of distinction upon whom the eyes of many are fixed; this is no temptation to me, I wished to be a soldier in the ranks, indistinguishable from the others.

Not even do I dare to give my outward existence a decisive religious expression, for fear she might misunderstand this and venture out upon the sea of infinity. That she is not able to do, at least not yet. What must save her (such was my first thought, and such it is still) is a certain healthiness of the temporal sort. I am convinced that even at the most decisive instant, when I posited the separation between us, she had no conception of resignation. Either the thought, "Now I am dying and then it is all over" — but that is not resignation; or she continued to hope simply in the form of immediacy — but that is not resignation; or she recovered by virtue of her natural healthiness and was inflamed by the desire to grasp the temporal precisely at that moment — but this is not resignation.

So be still. The thing for me is to be as meaningless as possible. Every hint from me would only be disturbing — and what is the most dangerous of all, it might perhaps be a help at the instant. She must, however, be incited, lest the condition of suffering become habitual. The condition of suffering — I do not definitely know, in fact, whether she suffers.

However, reflection is perfectly inexhaustible. It is like Tordenskjold with his famous parade: it uses over and over again the same few troops, but when they have marched past the reviewing stand they turn into a side street, don another uniform, and thus continue the parade... of the incalculable forces of the garrison.

February 12. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. She does not listen without attention when I read to her one or another religious work; I myself am being developed more and more strongly in a religious direction. I cannot yet achieve enough freedom from care to give to love a more erotic expression, I never make the least mention of love.

If only I have not erred in planning the thing on so great a scale, if only it does not prove too serious for her, although in fact all moroseness and harshness is foreign to my nature, especially in relation to her who makes me as gentle as can be.

So I talk to her in a rather lighter vein, I converse. Verily this conversation has for me a fascination I never could have guessed. What a pleasure it is when I think of the future, for this conversation will continue to have something so inviting to me, so refreshing to my soul, that I desire no other solace than this. As ever, she is substantially without reflection, but she does not chatter, she says one thing or another as it happens to occur to her. Instantly my reflection lays hold of what was said, by a slight modification it is transposed into my sphere, and thus the conversation alternates between us. Now she gives utterance to something in her immediate fashion, a slight modification, sometimes only a change of modulation, and I am satisfied by the observation and amused by it. She is unable to comprehend how such a saying of hers can amuse me so much; however, she seems quite delighted at the liveliness of the conversation. She finds satisfaction in expressing herself, then is amazed at seeing her utterances the object of so much attention, then I perceive underneath it a little matter of reflection and introduce it — so we are both pleased. I think I am actually discovering that I have some qualities which might make me a perfectly good husband: I have a sense for insignificant things, I have a memory for small matters, I have some talent for interpolating a bit of significance, and all of this is useful in the long run. If only I knew how I might become a perfect pattern of a husband, I would spare neither time nor trouble. But the misfortune is that I have a fundamental defect in my morbid reserve, and to be anything by halves is a bitter pill to me.

February 13. Midnight.

IF only something would happen! To keep one’s soul in an ecstasy from week to week, to keep the countless reflections on the qui vive, to have everything in readiness, in readiness every instant, because one cannot know whether they are to be used, or when they are to be used, or what is to be used!

I have seen her today. She was pale. Oh, when one has a soul full of foreboding, when along with this one has a sense for the ominous, such a pallor may well acquire significance. Macbeth was furious merely because a messenger who came with an unpleasant report was pale; but here indeed the pallor is the report. And yet the physician's report is to the effect that on the whole she is in good health. At least I heard this at the house of the Hansens, where the physician was and where they were talking about her. For on account of the family's connection with her and the presence of the physician I had a suspicion and repeated interrogatively the word I had heard the physician utter just as I entered the room, asking who was in such good health. They were put to embarrassment, and I, not without a certain note of sarcasm, said that I did not wonder at a physician being embarrassed at saying what he so rarely says, that a person is in very good health—"who then is that person?" The physician bethought himself and said, "Ah, it was Fru Fredriksen."

"Good Lord," said I, "Fru Fredriksen! Has she been ill? It was she whose husband was sheriff in Scanderborg, and later was transferred here to Seeland. Why that is very curious," etc. Then for a brisk quarter of an hour I conversed with the excellent family, including the physician, on the subject of the aforementioned lady. It was clear that the situation was as painful for them as it could be. Thereupon the physician departed, and I began to talk about the physician and the many families who had him as their doctor, remarking that I never knew he was the physician of Fru Fredriksen. This I could not say so long as he was present, for it was very possible that he had spoken the truth, but perhaps the family did not know it, and knew on the contrary that it was an evasion he had hit upon. In this fashion one never need be at a loss for material of conversation. But it was about her they were talking, that I am sure, for I know that less than a quarter of an hour earlier the physician had been at her house, and undoubtedly he had come directly from it. So this is the physician's report. On the other hand, I beheld her pale. What a torment to have to observe a phenomenon when the phenomenon itself alters in relation to the observer.

She had once a desire to be something extraordinary, an artist, an authoress, a virtuoso, in short, to shine in the world. That might indeed be possible, at least it is psychologically correct that an unfortunate event might be a decisive impulse in this direction. True enough, I never have been able to understand how this occurred to her, how she could so misunderstand herself. Lovable as she was, she had no particular talent. Had it been there, I surely should have discovered it, for my melancholy would have perceived one suffering the more, because I should have understood that she must have a prodigious claim upon life. But a catastrophe may indeed transform a person, and the wish, the aspiration, was perhaps a veridical presentiment in her soul. What wonder that I did not understand it, I who from my earliest youth have constantly lived in the contradiction between seeming to be highly gifted in comparison with other individuals, and being convinced in my own mind that I was good for nothing.

I am free and untrammelled, no servant to any man, to any other woman, or to any situation in life. I lie at the bow of my boat wondering if out yonder a phenomenon might appear. If she were thus to come forward as an object of admiration, that would be just the thing for me, it would be the happiest existence I could imagine: Secretly to see her admired, secretly to risk the last thought and the last farthing in order that the admiration might be jubilant. Impatience already seethes within me! I am able to talk people around, I can lie, prove everything, flatter, shake hands with a journalist, even write articles myself day and night — and admiration after all is for sale to money and shrewdness. I give up everything, my happy lot it is to labor secretly for her. And then when the end is attained, when pain has potentiated the powers of her soul, when fortune and favor and flattery vie with one another to adorn the distinguished one, when her soul swells to overflowing and she marches past me triumphantly, then I dare to behold her calmly, my glance cannot disturb her, for over against me existence has clearly vindicated her.

But after all one must have something concrete to hold on to. I will not so soon again run after anonymous novels, this last made me thoroughly sensible of the ludicrousness of my conceit. If I have not learned anything else from it, I have got a conception of the way reviewers feel. I have never been able to take seriously the work of a reviewer, but it needed only the vaguest suspicion that she might be the authoress (for rumor said that it was by a woman), and with that I set everything in motion to prove that the book was something extraordinary.

February 20. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. No, I can come to no other conclusion but that I am making her unhappy. There is a yawning disproportion between us, she does not understand me, and I do not understand her, she cannot rejoice at that in which I rejoice, nor sorrow for that in which I sorrow. I have begun the thing, however, and I am holding out, but I want to be honorable: I admit to her that I regard her engagement to me as a sacrifice on her part, I have besought her to forgive me for dragging her with me out upon the stream. More I cannot do. Verily I never dreamed that ever I might humble myself before a human being. Well, of course, it is not precisely under her I humble myself, it is under the relationship and the ethical task; however, I have to bring myself to say this to a human being, and in saying this it is not exactly in a jesting mood I say it! Fundamentally this is no great help, for she hardly catches a word of it, and by herself she is unable to explain what it means. But here again we have the disproportion.

February 20. Midnight.

I SAW her today in Hauser Square. Everything as usual. It is lucky that she sees me often. I know in my own heart that I never go out of my way, not so much as a foot-breadth, in order to see her; that I dare not do, my existence must express absolute indifference. If I were bold enough to do it, and if I did not have my hypochondriac sharpness of vision to spy upon myself and to anticipate every possibility, I long ago would have taken up my dwelling in her neighborhood, merely for the sake of compelling her to see me. There is nothing more dangerous for a girl in her situation than to avoid seeing one and thereby to give imagination opportunity to dream.

She must be nettled, lest she go on and become languid, neither one thing nor the other, neither sorrowful nor triumphant. And now this is about to succeed. A correspondence by letter with a friend out in the country (that is to say, with a person I do not trust) is communicated in copy to my initiate (who plagues me by his fidelity); my friend of course received this communication from me under a pledge of the profoundest silence, and on condition of the profoundest silence he in turn confides it in writing to his lady-love in Holbek, and so it goes along famously and at the greatest speed. They sometimes complain of the slowness of the post — when one is so lucky as to have a friend's woman-friend to carry the letter it travels at the greatest speed, I expect she will run on foot to the capital merely to disclose her secret for the information of the person for whom it is intended. After all there is nothing in the world so reliable as a friend of whom one knows to a certainty that he will betray everything that is confided to him — nothing more reliable if only one takes care what one confides. If one were to beseech a friend to say this or that, there is no assurance that he will do it, but when one confides to him under the pledge of secrecy something which one would have come out, one is perfectly secured, for then it is sure to come out. All the same, it is a piece of rare good fortune when such a friend has in turn a friend, and this friend again has a woman-friend — then it goes with the swiftness of light. In this way friendship has assumed the charge of my correspondence.

The more one suffers, the more, I believe, has one a sense for the comic. It is only by the deepest suffering that one acquires true authority in the use of the comic, an authority which by one word transforms as by magic the reasonable creature one calls man into a caricature. This authority is like the self-assurance of the policeman when he lays hand upon his stick without ceremony and permits no back-talk and no obstruction of the street. The man who is struck would retort, he makes a protest, he would be treated with respect as a citizen, he threatens an investigation; at that instant the next rap of the stick follows, with the warning, "Hold your tongue, keep moving, don't stand still." To want to stand still, to protest, to threaten an investigation, is in fact an attempt on the part of the pathetic bungler to count for something serious, but the comic turns the fellow about to show another side, just as the policeman by his impetus gets him turned around, and regarding him from behind makes him comic by the help of his stick.

However, this authority over the comic must be so painfully acquired that one cannot exactly desire to have it. But this comic forces itself upon me especially when my sufferings bring me into relation with another person.

The correspondence above mentioned contains a confidential communication regarding my love affair. Everything is correct, especially the name, the year and the day — the rest is in greater part fiction. I am entirely convinced that she cannot possibly possess a just apprehension of me and of our relationship; I have confused for her the whole thing too much for that, transforming it into a witch's letter which can signify whatever you please. Everything must be left to her, and from me she must at no price acquire an authoritative interpretation, for then she will never be healed. That she may be able to recover herself completely is my highest wish for her, and I will venture everything for it. Merely one single trustworthy word of guidance would be enough to insure that she would retain in quietness an impression of me which she must not have.

My peroration during the two months [since the engagement was broken], my departure from the scene, which certainly was not brilliant but was consistent with the part I played, was calculated to give the impression that I was a depraved man. This is the principle point in my interpretation of the case. For such an interpretation brings it about that her suffering becomes at once autopathic, free from any trace of sympathy, that for her the suffering does not become in the least dialectic, as though she were at fault in any way or had any cause to reproach herself. We must proceed now in the same way. What now in the next place will have the most stimulating effect? I think it is when such a scoundrel is not without a certain sympathy for the poor girl. A rascal properly stands altogether outside the good, but if he becomes impudent enough to wish to communicate with it through an almost chivalrous sympathy — I know nothing more revolting. That confidential falsification of mine bears precisely the stamp of this sympathy. It is written without passion, but in the form of courtesy. To keep the tone exactly right I constantly had in mind when I was writing a person who has or has had a toothache and about the state of whose health one does not inquire without sympathy.

On other grounds I have felt an aversion to writing all this, not indeed on her account, for my hope is that it will be profitable to her, but on account of those through whose hands it passes. And this for a peculiar reason: I am convinced, I wager a hundred to one, that all three of them will say after reading it, “Ah, after all he is not so bad as I thought, he is not without sympathy after all.” It is incredible how men are struck with stupidity in regard to the ethical. By being impudent enough to want to be the most despicable of all men, one becomes a perfectly honest man, just about as good as most people are. For, good Lord! so many have had a love affair and left the girl sitting and waiting, but when one has a little sympathy one is a fairly good sort. And yet to be a scoundrel is not so hopeless, salvation is still possible in that case; but to be able to show sympathy in that way furnishes indubitable evidence that the man has lost his own soul.

And now to rest. I withdraw every thought of mine from the effort of intrigue, I concentrate all my thought upon her, upon my anxious care, upon my wish. I will not be disturbed by anything, but also I will do what I regard as my duty. If it may be right for a good cause to become a fool, one may also be justified in being an intriguer — or rather, I fear a subsequent anguish and regret if I have left any means untried. I have no great faith in intrigues — not for the reason that I have failed to calculate everything to the best of my ability, but because the affair is so important to me.

Oh, blended pain! We are more and more separated, there lies a lifetime between us, and it seems to me as though there might now lie an eternity between us, if she completely tears herself loose from me. It is as though I were serving two masters: I do everything to work her loose, to annihilate everything between us, and then I discipline my soul that it may maintain itself upon the apex of the wish, in order that my wish, if its fulfillment in any way were possible, might be just as ardent at the instant when she is lost to me forever as it was when prostrate at my feet she besought me. To wish while one is young is not difficult, rather it is difficult to desist; but to keep the soul fixed upon the wish when secret remorse, when deathly anguish, consumes one's strength is not easy. To cut capers when the horse is young and mettlesome and has breath in its nostrils is not difficult; but when it is weary, when it totteringly supports itself, when at every step it wants to fall — then to cut capers is a thing the horse cannot do. But the spirit giveth life, and as an aged king said, "A king can die, but he cannot become sick," so it is my comfort that I can die, but I cannot become weary. For what is it to have spirit, unless it be to have will, and what is it to have will, unless it be to have it beyond measure? For he who does not have it beyond measure does not have it at all.

February 28. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. It needs only courage and endurance, and I shall reach the religious with her. This assurance is life assurance — or, alas, it is only a precaution like making a deposit in the Widows' Fund. In any case I can take part in everything and develop more and more dexterity. Her youth is a claim upon me for every effort, and I am as youthful as I can manage to be. I believe that it is succeeding. A few days ago there was a man who said of us that we were a regular pair of young lovers. Of course, that we are too: she by virtue of her seventeen years, and I by virtue of the artificial leg I use. The deceit is succeeding, as it always does with me. The fact is, I seldom succeed in expressing myself directly, but indirectly and deceitfully I succeed beyond measure. In my case this is a natural disposition, a talent for reflection I was born with. But at the same time I am learning something else, I am learning the comic from the ground up — a young lover with an artificial leg! I appear to myself like Captain Gribskopf. This comic however is my secret, not to be jested with. I am not afraid of exertion, for I take delight in it, but I fear misunderstanding.

February 28. Midnight.

IT is the last straw — she is on the lookout for me, that is evident. So I have been fighting the air, she must have a residual sympathy, a nerve in which I still pain her. She cannot yet have received the confidential communication, it was lucky I thought of sending it. In my look she can discover nothing. My face is no advertisement sheet, or, if it be such, it is for mixed notices, which are so mixed that no one can make anything out of it.

Last Thursday I already was struck by the fact that for a second time, and on a Thursday, I had seen her in Hauser Square. She knows from an earlier time that every Thursday precisely at four o'clock I pass that way, she knows that I have dealings with a man who dwells there. If she is seeking me, I dare bear witness within myself that I have not gone a foot-breadth out of my way to seek her. It is almost maddening, so apprehensive I am about doing anything which might arouse her suspicion, and my apprehensiveness makes me assume that she is just as susceptible to the least impression as I am.

This must be investigated. Five minutes before four I was in Hauser Square and entered the Jewelry shop. My suspicion was correct, she came along two minutes later. She walked slowly, looked about her, and turned in the direction of Tornabuske Street, from which I was accustomed to come. In and for itself it is a capital idea to be seen on the street, where chance can always account for it. But since my separation from her I have opened an incessant warfare against the power men call chance, in order to do away with it if possible. No military force is necessary for that, but especially memory, a memory just as petty as is chance itself. Hastily I sprang out of the shop, ran around by Suhnes Street, and came out of Tornabuske Street precisely at four o'clock as usual.

We met and passed one another by. She was a little embarrassed, perhaps also for the reason that she was a bit alarmed at walking in what was as good as a forbidden path, or a bit exhausted by spying out the terrain. Hastily she cast down her eyes and avoided my glance.

So much is clear, that my machinations are rather fruitless; but so much also is clear, that she has a lot of strength.

There is nothing for me to do. I come every Thursday precisely at four o'clock to Hauser Square. To remain away would be very imprudent. I believe I have never been so precise about time as I am with the stroke of the clock, lest my coming too early or staying away might arouse her suspicion either that I was waiting for her or was avoiding her, which in different ways would prove the same thing, that I concerned myself about her.

March 5. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. No new symptom. When a brighter prospect opens before me as now, when it seems to me that all will succeed, when a joyful thought lodges in my soul, then I hasten to her, I am really young, young as one must be in the days of youth. At such moments I take no circuitous path, I rush with the haste of longing so as to be able to delight myself with her. If it were always so, if I were always able to be thus, it surely would be possible to marry.

How it stands with her in a deeper sense I do not know, nor do I wish to know. I will not force her or take her off her guard, but I am surprised at her cautious reserve, and it is something constrained, it is as if she were fearful of my criticism, lest her utterances might not be clever enough. So difficult to understand has my outward nature made me.

March 5. Midnight.

SOLOMON'S DREAM

SOLOMON'S judgment is well enough known, it availed to discriminate between truth and deceit and to make the judge famous as a wise prince. His dream is not so well known.

If there is any pang of sympathy, it is that of having to be ashamed of one's father, of him whom one loves above all and to whom one is most indebted, to have to approach him backwards, with averted face, in order not to behold his dishonor. But what greater bliss of sympathy can be imagined than to dare to love as the son's wish prompts, and in addition to dare to be proud of him because he is the only elect, the singularly distinguished man, a nation's strength, a country's pride, God's friend, a promise for the future, extolled in his lifetime, held by memory in the highest praise! Happy Solomon, this was thy lot! Among the chosen people (how glorious even to belong to them!) he was the King's son (enviable lot!), son of that king who was the elect among kings!

Thus Solomon lived happily with the prophet Nathan. The father's strength and the father's achievement did not inspire him to deeds of valor, for in fact no occasion was left for that, but it inspired him to admiration, and admiration made him a poet. But if the poet was almost jealous of his hero, the son was blissful in his devotion to the father.

Then the son one day made a visit to his royal father. In the night he awoke at hearing movement where the father slept. Horror seizes him, he fears it is a villain who would murder David. He steals nearer — he beholds David with a crushed and contrite heart, he hears a cry of despair from the soul of the penitent.

Faint at the sight he returns to his couch, he falls asleep, but he does not rest, he dreams, he dreams that David is an ungodly man, rejected by God, that the royal majesty is the sign of God's wrath upon him, that he must wear the purple as a punishment, that he is condemned to rule, condemned to hear the people's benediction, whereas the Lord's righteousness secretly and hiddenly pronounces judgment upon the guilty one; and the dream suggests the surmise that God is not the God of the pious but of the ungodly, and that one must be an ungodly man to be God's elect — and the horror of the dream is this contradiction.

While David lay upon the ground with crushed and contrite heart, Solomon arose from his couch, but his understanding was crushed. Horror seized him when he thought of what it is to be God's elect. He surmised that holy intimacy with God, the sincerity of the pure man before the Lord, was not the explanation, but that a private guilt was the secret which explained everything.

And Solomon became wise, but he did not become a hero; and he became a thinker, but he did not become a man of prayer; and he became a preacher, but he did not become a believer; and he was able to help many, but he was not able to help himself; and he became sensual, but not repentant; and he became contrite and cast down, but not again erect, for the power of the will had been strained by that which surpassed the strength of the youth. And he tossed through life, tossed about by life — strong, supernaturally strong, that is, womanishly weak in the stirring infatuations and marvellous inventions of imagination, ingenious in expounding thoughts. But there was a rift in his nature, and Solomon was like the paralytic who is unable to support his own body. In his harem he sat like a disillusioned old man, until desire for pleasure awoke and he shouted, "Strike the timbrels, dance before me, ye women." But when the Queen of the South [sic] came to visit him, attracted by his wisdom, then was his soul rich, and the wise answer flowed from his lips like the precious myrrh which flows from the trees in Arabia.

March 7. Midnight.

I DID not see her on Thursday. Presumably she has now received the confidential communication. Certainly it was confidential enough, it was entrusted to weakness and dishonesty. Or perhaps she came a little earlier or a little later, I do not know, for I always come punctually, not a minute before and not a minute later, not at a quicker pace at one time than at another. That I dare not do. Only he who has a notion of the shrewdness and cunning required in order to turn the most insignificant things to account will comprehend what such ascetic renunciation means when it is applied to the most insignificant things.

My head is weary; oh, if I might betake myself to rest and lull myself to sleep by sorrowful recollection! Oh, that like a departed spirit I might leave pain behind and remember only what was so beautiful! But I dare not, with that I should be depriving her of her rights. I dare not, for I am living, I am in fact still in the midst of the action. The play is far from being over. Is the play not over? For me verily it is not over, for the later development is so far from being a postlude that the engagement was rather a prelude, and the piece began when it was broken off. And yet there is no action, nothing occurs, in the visible and outward world nothing occurs, and all my effort is to refrain from acting and yet to maintain myself in action κατά δύναμιν. Why all this? Why do I do it? Because I can do no otherwise, I cannot endure that my life should have no meaning at all. The nothing that I do does after all give a little meaning to it; every other attempt, be it to forget, to start afresh, to clink glasses with a friend and drink the health of a comrade, is impossible for me, although I understand that people then would find that my life had a deep meaning. Perhaps my eye is at fault, but I have never seen a friendship where the one inflamed the other to risk the utmost for an idea which bears on one's personal existence; but I have indeed seen that, because the other, ό ετερος, had not the pudicity which for a time one always has with regard to oneself — I have seen that their comradeship taught them both to chaffer and not to take the world too much to heart. Only the God-relationship is the true idealizing friendship, for God's thought penetrates so as to separate mind and thought, and does not come to an agreement in fudge and nonsense. — I do this nothing and this everything because it is the loftiest passion of my freedom and the deepest necessity of my being. In case Simon Stylites had in any way been able to bring into relation with the thought of God his practice of standing on a high pillar and bending in the most difficult postures and scaring away sleep and courting terror in the crises of trying to balance himself — then in my eyes he did well to do that. His fault was that he did it before the eyes of men, that after all he was a ballerina, that, like her when she bends upon the floor in the most difficult posture, he seeks the applause of the public. That I have never done, but I have indeed done as he did, I scare away sleep and contort my soul.

On my part this is not morbid reflection, for the leading thought in this whole matter is as clear to me as day, namely, to work her loose and to keep my soul upon the apex of the wish. I do not hit upon a new purpose every day, but my reflection may well hit upon something new in relation to the purpose. Would that be called morbid reflection when a man who would be rich in the world holds to this firmly but in the form of calculation takes everything into account without altering his first plan? Is this morbid reflection when he holds fast to his resolution but, perceiving that by one method he will not succeed, chooses another? If I had been suffering from morbid reflection, I should long ago have acted in an outward way and broken with my first purpose to keep quite quiet and yet on the alert. Yes, if I merely had to keep awake like one of the wise virgins, had merely to keep my lamp burning, and for the rest might let my soul be without passion, it would be easier, but that I dare not do, for then I would be insensibly changed and would not be maintaining myself unchangeably upon the apex of the wish by the elasticity of passion. This then is what I will: if I am changed, it must be against my will. Praise God, this has not occurred up to date.

March 9. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. No new symptom. Where we are I do not know. I will not be in too great haste to explore.

March 15. Midnight.

YESTERDAY I did not see her. Perhaps after all that encounter in Hauser Square was an accident, or perhaps it was an attempt she ventured to make out of solicitude for me. Perhaps she has got my confidential communication, perhaps it has not had the effect of nettling her but only of depressing, perhaps she chooses at last to languish, to be anesthetized by the soothing alleviation of quiet sorrow. Suppose she were to move out into the country, suppose she were unwilling to live in the old surroundings, could not bear it, but rather would have an emphatic expression for the fact that she was mortified, suppose she were to become a lady's companion in a noble family, or a governess. Great God! to have a creditor of this sort, one who has power of life and death over me! And not to dare to redeem the obligation, and that this precisely must be a man's humiliation, that he dare not do it! Presumably she does not dream what an enormous power she has over me, that she determines the quotation of life-value, that by such a step as that which I now fear she plunges me into the deepest despair. The case stands thus: if I get her worked loose, or if she works herself loose, in short, if she becomes herself again, I have got to the point precisely where I can work for my own interest, can be anxiously concerned about my own pain. Before I was engaged to her my life was like a painful inquisition of myself, then I was interrupted and summoned out to the most dreadful decisions; and when I am through with that, if ever I am, then I can begin again with myself where I left off. Now of course I have learned what is even more painful than that. And if this does not come about, if she wilts, I am a beggar, a pauper, yea, a slave who lies in outer darkness.

And yet in fact she let fall a word about wishing she might find a place in the country. And such a word, a word of hers, a caprice, a remark of which she was no more aware than one is aware of what one says in one's sleep, such a word is enough for me. It strikes me that I am like a child of the urchin age which tries its hand at the first problems of practice in the mother tongue, to construct a meaning out of a given word.

Today I heard accidentally from a liveryman that her father had engaged a carriage to drive to a manor house half a score miles out in the country. What is he doing there, he who almost never goes beyond the walls of the capital, except when he rides, and that at the most is the distance of a mile; he who has no connections in the country? Suppose now — the word runs in my mind, and the school exercise begins! — suppose now she actually has resolved, suppose she wills to be mortified, wills to be that openly, wills to despair and to have the characteristic form for despair.

Great God! only not this, everything else, only not this! Cursed be riches and earthly glitter, and to be or to seem to be something great in the eyes of the world! Would I were a pauper, a wretched creature, then the incongruity would be a different one. It is true in fact that in the eyes of the world I am a scoundrel. In the eyes of the world! What are the eyes of the world but blindness? And what is the judgment of the world? I have not found ten men who have the strength to judge severely. Or am I not honored and esteemed as I was before? Do I not enjoy more recognition than before? and is not the qualification, the title, which is required in the eyes of the world just this, that one is a scoundrel or at least has an unusual ingenium for becoming one? Give the world the choice between a deserted girl who bows her innocent head with sorrow and seeks a hiding-place in the country where she may repine, and a play actor upon life’s stage, a shameless fellow who holds his head high and defies everybody with his proud eyes — the world’s choice is promptly made. A man is condemned to lifelong imprisonment for accidental homicide; but I, I have no sentence pronounced upon me. Condemned! I incite people against me, and they cry “Bravo”; I expect that they will slay me, and they carry me in triumph; I shudder, I doubt despairingly whether I have courage and strength enough to bear the condemnation of the world, whether I do not owe it to myself to put myself in a better light, but I do not waver, I pull the cord of the douche — and the judgment of the world is extremely favorable.

But let not this occur, merciful God! let it not occur! I am in despair, I break with Thee, I rush out there, I win her once again, I surrender everything so as with gold to bid defiance to the grandeur of the manor house, I celebrate the wedding and I shoot myself on the wedding day.

At any rate, out there I must hasten, I must see what takes her there. Alas, I dare not make any inquiry of anyone, never that! It is easy enough to impose the vow of silence when one would have nothing more to do with the world, but to have to be silent when one is so deeply concerned!

March 17. Midnight.

A FALSE alarm. Now I have driven twenty miles in sixteen hours, I have been close to death owing to anxiety and impatience — and for nothing. In a ludicrous way my life has been in danger — and for nothing. A lout of a postilion falls asleep, and the horses with him. In a fury I leap out of the carriage and beat the fellow, without taking into consideration that he is a giant compared to me. But what will not one do in such a mood? And the people extol the system of posts, the extrapost. It is a miserable affair. If Richard III would give his kingdom for a horse, I believe I would have given half of my fortune for a team of racers. The postilion throws me to the ground. It would be no use to walk, I must give fair words and a prodigious pourboir — and we started.

The whole thing turns out to be a private affair. There is a farm vacant, and a man in Jutland has a son who wants to have it. His father is an old friend of her father, who is out there now enquiring about the terms.

That a brain can stand that! It is a heaving swell such as there is not in the Atlantic Ocean, for this swell has nothing on either side of it and is the most terrible of all.

March 20. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. No new symptom. Whether this quietness and security is a good sign I do not know, whether in a spiritual sense it is a fertile air and the fair blossom is burgeoning in secret, I do not know, I dare not yet investigate, for fear of doing so too early and thereby interfering with the growth.

March 20. Midnight.

I HAVE no time to think about myself, and yet my inward life is of a sort to give me enough to think about. I am not actually a religious individual, I am only a properly and completely formed possibility of such a thing. With the sword hanging over my head, in mortal danger, I discover the religious crises with a sense of originality as vivid as if I had not known them before, with so vivid a sense of originality that, if they had not been discovered, I must have discovered them. Of that there is no need now, in this respect I can humble and chasten my soul in the way I once consoled a man of rather limited intelligence to whom another said mockingly that he had not invented gunpowder— “there is no need of that,” I replied, “for it has been discovered.” But it is one thing to learn from a textbook exercises to be memorized, one thing to be able to recite the catechism to the parson, or even to the bishop when he makes his visitation, one thing to be able to preachify like a parson — but an entirely different thing is primitiveness in appropriating. It is well I do not have to teach others. I joyfully pay the school tax and the priest’s tithes. Hail to him who is so sure of himself that he dares to take money for giving instruction!

I am good enough as a possibility, but in the catastrophe when I would appropriate to myself the religious patterns, I encounter a philosophic doubt which I will not pronounce as such to any man. It has to do with the factor of appropriation. Placed as I am in the religious catastrophe, I grasp after the paradigm. But, behold, I am not able to understand the paradigm, even though I venerate it with childlike piety which will not let it go. One paradigm appeals to visions, another to revelations, a third to dreams. To talk about this, to kindle the address with imagination and yet retain the assumption, the assumption which bears precisely upon the factor of appropriation on the part of subsequent generations, is easy enough — but to understand it!

When one is able to comprehend the religious need so profoundly that one might even do well to call for the priest, and one has a philosophic scepticism completely corresponding to it, the prospects are not exactly the best. However, if only I get through this year of mourning when I have to mourn for her (and my year of mourning is not determined astronomically, it may be drawn out to five and even to ten years and my whole life may be determined by her), then I can throw myself into these conflicts, and then surely the thing will succeed. To hold out I am resolved, I will not run away from the conflict, I will not be clever in the use of shrewd devices by which one deceives another, like schoolboys who when they are writing the first pages of the copybook look in the middle of the book, and when they are in the middle of the book look at the last pages of the book, and with the last pages of the book fool the teacher. It is my conviction that the will is the principal thing even in relation to thought, that talents ten times as good without an energetic will do not make so good a thinker as do talents ten times as poor with an energetic will — the superior talents will avail for understanding the many things, the superior will for understanding the one thing. But from the fact that one has will and has the will to hold out it does not follow that one becomes a jubilant saint, who, contemplating the course of life and of the universe and of world history sees and, behold, “It is so wonderful!” Let him contemplate if he will life and world history and behold that it is so wonderful — when I contemplate him I behold that he is an ass, just as he also beats a cancan on the pulpit for the honor of Christianity or becomes so serious that he tickles the people as the priest tickles himself with a pinch of snuff. Stupidity or getting into a sweat and becoming red in the face is no nearer to seriousness (because the perspirerer is too stupid to be able to laugh) than the asinine stare is to religiousness. If I know nothing else, I know this, that the comic ought to be employed to police the religious field. One should not characterize delusion as hypocrisy but as stupidity. By calling a person a hypocrite he is put at an advantage inasmuch as this implies that he has a God-relationship. A pathetic anger and indignation at the malversations of speculation, at the systematic peculation which (like the Roman proconsuls who sucked the provinces dry and enriched themselves) makes the System rich and life poor, and a good comic sketch of a religious enthusiast — that most assuredly is what is needed. A skipper can keep on swearing all day without meaning anything by it, and so can a religious enthusiast be solemn the whole day long without having a wholesome or a whole thought in his soul. That Gothic king would not be baptized when he heard that in heaven he would not be united with his fathers, the natives in America feared heaven more than hell and wanted to remain heathen lest in heaven they might be united with the orthodox Spaniards — and so does many an enthusiast, if he does nothing else, make one disgusted with religion.

About this step I dare not yet say within myself "today," but I feel that with respect to what I have ventured I have put myself deeply in debt to her. He who has made another person unhappy is well adapted to hold out in such conflicts. The man who is sentenced for life they put to rasping dye-wood, which is mortally dangerous; but after all he is sentenced.

This too I perceive, that the unmarried man can make greater ventures in the world of spirit than the married man, he can stake everything, being concerned only about the idea, and he is far better prepared for the discrimen of decision where one has barely room to stand, let alone to establish an abode. But truly it was not for this reason I would not marry. I too desired quiet joy in life, and her prayer made my one wish my only wish; and even if I had not wished it, I should have done it, because I always believe that obedience is dearer to God than cosmopolitan, philanthropic, patriotic sacrifices upon the altar of humanity, that quietness in the fulfilment of a modest duty is infinitely more worthy and more becoming to every man than luxurious living in the world of intellect and prodigality in concerning oneself about the whole human race, as though one were almighty God. Let them talk glowingly about the wrath of God and the consuming fire — there is something else that I fear, and that I fear just as much, namely, that I should compel God to become haughty (foment) towards me, so that I should vanish as an untruth before His haughty majesty. A religious enthusiast would likely find this expression not sufficiently serious, he would likely wish to have me swear in a godly way, as the skipper swears in an ungodly way. It is serious enough for me, and more terrible than the sensuous conceptions of a heated imagination. So soon as I disdain duty God becomes haughty, for only in the performance of duty am I in submissive understanding with His sublime highness, and therefore it is not a haughty majesty. Hence it is not God that makes Himself haughty — that He never does, that is paganism — but it is I that make Him haughty, and this is a punishment. Here is the profound consistency in this relationship, that the man who would approach nearer to God by disdaining the simplest things actually removes God to a distance by reason of His haughtiness, a haughtiness which even the most wretched man does not have to experience. In this respect also I am very sharp of hearing, and though it is not heard by many a philosopher who cries out in the world δοσ μοι πον στώ, yet I hear a voice which says, "I will give you dosmoi, ye dunces [dosmere]!"

No! If I had not believed that I had a divine counter order, never would have retreated, and if only this order is recalled I shall choose again my wish. God forbid that laborious exertion and tension should weaken my wish before such a thing is permissible! I can understand my counter order, for it passes through repentance. A repentant individual who can employ his whole life for a recantation cannot go forward. It is a perfectly simple protest against a marriage. I have neither visions nor dreams to guide me, my collision is quite simply one between repentance and existence, a collision of suspension with relation to a present actuality. Until that collision is resolved I am in suspenso, so soon as it is resolved I am free again. Hence it is that I make every effort to keep myself upon the apex of love. So soon as she is free the religious crises are my task.

To think quite hypothetically, suppose that she were again in possession of herself; suppose that the word about death were an exaggeration, not intended as a pathetic line, but only as one says in the course of conversation, “I am about dying of heat in these small rooms”; suppose she may have meant it but had not understood herself; or suppose she had suffered unto death but had triumphed; suppose I had contributed little to this triumph, or nothing at all; suppose she were to snatch at the defense that she had never troubled about me at all — what then? Then I have troubled all the more about her. Good God! if this were possible! How my soul clutches at every explanation from this angle! Although in some of these hypothetical cases I should be sorry for her sake, I ask nothing more, so then I have suffered most, more I do not ask, I have assumed the rôle of the girl, have been more active in the work of sorrowing, or at least just as active, I ask no more. I did not leave her in order to lead the dance or to play the part of chief lover in a comedy.

What for her has had no significance, or only perhaps the significance of a temporal decision, has had for me eternal significance. I regret nothing, not a tear, not a single tear I shed for her sake; I am not ashamed of it, for it is not unmanly to be able to weep, but it is womanish not to be able to hide it from everyone. Yea, if there were a mocker who had counted every tear (ah, despicable deed, ah, pitiable delusion of the man who counts the tears which assuage my grief!); suppose the number were great, suppose she were to mention the number to deride me, a man who weeps — I shall not regret it. Though I should die tomorrow, my life was yet an epigram which makes an inscription on my tomb superfluous. I do not regret it; after all she has done me good, done me an infinite good, just by an unconsidered word and an exorbitant utterance.

But, behold, if such were the case, my position becomes difficult in a peculiar way. I had to have a human life upon my conscience in order to be awakened and torn out of the lethargy of melancholy. I humble myself under the seriousness of this thought. But then comes my understanding and says, "No, it is not true, thou didst perceive well enough that it was not a human life, that it was thine own imagination which fashioned this conceit and showed it to thy melancholy, and both agreed that it was indeed possible. But then it was not a human life, it was a word, a word which in the mouth of many another thou wouldst even have laughed at." Yes, in a sense that is true. And yet I regret nothing, not even that I have suffered all this pain, which after all has not yet lamed me, though it would do so were I to talk to anyone about it. In loneliness, in sleeplessness, I have been sensible of it, when in a single second one is able all at once to think together more thoughts than can be written in months, when imagination conjures up dreadful presentiments which no pen dare deal with, when conscience starts up anxiously and provokes terror by optical deceits.

But, alas, all this is only an hypothesis.

March 25. Morning.

TODAY a year ago.

What is the happiest existence? It is that of a young girl of sixteen years when she, pure and innocent, possesses nothing, not a chest of drawers or a pedestal, but has to make use of the lowest drawer of her mother's escritoire to keep all her magnificence: the confirmation dress and a prayer-book! Happy the man who possesses no more than he is content to put in the next drawer.

What existence is the happiest? It is that of a young girl of sixteen years, pure and innocent, who indeed can dance but goes to a ball only twice a year!

What is the happiest existence? It is that of a young girl when, sixteen summers old, pure and innocent, she sits diligently at her work and yet finds time to glance sidewise at him, at him who possesses nothing, not a chest of drawers, not a pedestal, but is only a partner in the same wardrobe, and yet has an entirely different explanation of the case, for in her he possesses the whole world, in spite of the fact that she possesses nothing.

And who then is the most unhappy? It is that rich young man twenty-five winters old who dwells opposite.

When one is sixteen summers old and the other sixteen winters old, are they not equally old? Ah, no! How is that, is not the time identical when it is identical? Ah, no! The time is not identical.

Ah, why were nine months in my mother's womb enough to make me an old man? Ah, why was I not swaddled in joy? Why was I born not only with pain but for pain? Why was my eye not opened for happiness but only to behold this realm of sighs and to be unable to break away from it?

March 27. Midnight.

To clutch an hypothesis is like embracing a cloud instead of Juno, and at the same time it is unfaithfulness towards her. But to employ the hypothesis as an expedient for exercising the soul, ungirding it and giving its energies new elasticity, is permissible, yea, obligatory. Being thus fortified I am again completely hers. If I no longer hold her to my breast, I do nevertheless embrace her, for the work of remembrance in the morning hours and the lifesaving attempt at the hour of midnight constitute as it were an embrace in which she is enfolded. A lifesaving attempt — can it be called such? Though I had everything in readiness, what does this avail if I dare not employ it? Though I were never so willing, what does it avail when I am bound, and to keep myself bound is the only thing that possibly may help her a little? If I could get myself afloat, I soon should be in my boat, in case this might in some way be of advantage to her, for it is also possible that what at one time would have saved her has now no importance in her eyes. It is incredible how many ways possibility knows of getting out of a difficulty, especially for one who dare not tread a single one of them — for with that there would be one less way, perhaps several. And yet it is a lifesaving attempt.

How strange a power a single word has when, as in this case, it is not integrated in the coherence of the discourse or the sentence where it is hardly noticed in passing, but when without grammatical connection it stares at one with the provocation of a riddle and the relevance of dread! I am as deeply depressed as if in this word there were a veridical presentiment of actual truth, as if I were to lie in my boat upon that rush-encircled lake one quiet evening, as if I heard her cry — and now to my oars, and I saved her life, but never more shall she be human. Dread and pain and bewilderment had thus been slowly picking the lock of consciousness, and at last despair succeeded in disintegrating the charming essence of this lovable womanliness. Horrible! Dare I not command this thought to flee from me? dare I not pray that this thought be taken from me? No, it is in fact a possibility. And yet if only I were sitting with her, only this, that I might venture to be present, that I might venture all, although it were nothing, this at least would be an alleviation, an alleviation like the tumor which causes a dull incessant pain but not so much suffering. Everything would now be confused for her, she would believe that we were sitting as aforetime in a boat upon this lake where once we rowed together; and then we would exchange, if not the winged word, at least the expressions of insanity and would understand one another in madness, and talk about our love, as Lear would talk with Cordelia about the Court and enquire for news from it. — But to be separated from her, and then if she were to die, that he who was closest to her, the only one, perhaps, who had a whole lifetime, short or long, to mourn for her, that he was the only one who might not be in mourning, or rather that he was prevented from riding in the carriage when the funeral cortège followed her to the grave, although he knew better than anyone that a deceased person is the mightiest of all!

Oh, any expression at all for sorrow, though it be the most painful expression, is after all an alleviation in comparison with having no expression whatsoever. To live as though I were dumb, and to have torments in my soul and speech within it, not as one learns it from a phrase-book but as the heart discovers it; to be as if dumb, yea, as if mutilated, and yet to have sufferings which crave the eloquence of an actor! To have to be distrustful of the voice lest it tremble, to have to be distrustful of the foot lest it go out of its customary way and leave a betraying footprint, to have to be distrustful of the hand lest it seek its place upon the breast and indicate the hidden thought, and lest it stretch out for her. To sit at home in sackcloth and ashes, or rather naked in one's wretchedness, and when one would dress, to have no other clothes but those of joyfulness and merriment in order to hide oneself!

"Where precisely is it you are suffering?" says the physician to the sick man. "Ah, everywhere, dear Doctor," he replies. "But how do you suffer?" continues the physician, "Tell me, so that I can diagnose the disease." No one asks this of me, I have no need of it, I know well how I suffer, I suffer sympathetically. Precisely this suffering it is that is able to shake me. Although in my melancholy I am inwardly convinced that I am good for nothing, so soon as danger comes I have the strength of a lion. When I suffer autopathically I can apply all my will, and melancholy as I am and brought up in melancholy, the terrible finds me prepared for the still more terrible. But when I suffer sympathetically I have to employ all my strength and all my inventiveness in the service of terror to fashion an image of the other's pain, and thereby I become powerless. When I myself suffer my understanding discovers grounds of consolation, but I dare not believe in any of them when I suffer sympathetically, for in fact I am not so precisely acquainted with the other that I can know whether there are present the presuppositions which condition the effectiveness of such consolations. When I suffer autopathically I know where I am, I place signs along the path of suffering so that I may have something to go by; but when I suffer sympathetically I go astray, for I cannot know where the other really is, and every instant I have to begin all over again, and be prepared to be able to think a still more dreadful possibility, the horror of which I must endure in order that I may shirk nothing.

The moment she is free, then indeed I am without sorrow; but at that moment I am at the point where she supposed I was when sometimes she begged me to remember her. Yes, at that moment I shall remember her, but at that moment I shall have found alleviation, I shall be sad and say with Ossian, "Sweet is the sorrow of melancholy!" Then I shall have peace, for the remembrance of melancholy is blessed and softened and is as happy as the weeping willow when it is swayed by the evening breeze. But not now. I do not fear the whole world, at least I think I do not, but I fear this girl. A glimpse of her as she passes by, and my fate is decided till the next time. Hence she essentially is everything, absolutely everything; if she is free, she essentially is nothing at all. True, she is lovable, but essentially this does not signify anything. I have been in love, but my soul is fashioned of a substance too eternal to despair over an unhappy love; on the other hand I can despair over an unhappy responsibility, over being on unhappy terms with the eternal meaning of life. How dialectically difficult my position is, only he can comprehend who himself is tried. When an inexperienced man reads a legal document through, he can understand it to be sure, but only the experienced lawyer can reconstruct its genesis, only he can read the invisible writing which witnesses to difficulties overcome, only he is capable of knowing about the contributions vanished generations have made to the formulation of this document, he recognizes the signs of border warfare waged by ingenuity against ingenuity, ingenuity in the service of justice and ingenuity in the service of deceit, and for him therefore each individual expression has significance, not just up to a certain point, but absolute significance, and for him such a document is also a contribution to the history of the human race. The inexperienced man can indeed understand it, but he is unable to draw it up, yea, hardly with any confidence can he copy it exactly.

April 2. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. I had determined that either on the first or the second of this month I would examine where we are. I arranged an occasion and the interrogation of circumstance in order to give her feeling an opportunity of expressing itself. What comes of it? In the most free and easy way in the world, in fact with unseemly vehemence which bordered almost upon petulance, she declared that she didn’t care for me at all, that she had accepted me out of pity and couldn’t in the least conceive what I wanted of her. In short, it was a little improvisation ad modum Beatrice in Much Ado about Nothing. O melancholy, what sport thou dost make of the melancholic! The poet says truly, quem deus perdere vult primum dementat. Now I have been wandering through the valley of the shadow of anxiety, seeking to do everything as well as I could, I have humiliated myself in such a way as I dare not admit before anybody, I have sat in the darkness of death, deeply wounded by the thought that I could not make her happy — and never did I suspect what is the most natural thing, and what now that she says it I can perfectly well understand, that she doesn't care for me at all.

However, it was perhaps only an unpremeditated utterance, an impetuous outburst, perhaps she was vexed, though I cannot comprehend by what. I will not let her provoke me to anger. If only I were perfectly well assured in my life-view, so that I might venture to use force, the whole thing would be a prank. But on the other hand she opens to me a bright prospect. This much is certain, a marriage is for me a difficult problem; I have now learned to understand this much, that if I had so understood myself before, I would not have embarked upon this. And now she seems to have far greater power in relation to me than I in relation to her.

The exploration resulted in an explosion, and I received the corrosive sublimate straight in the face. Just as one who for a long while has been sitting in the dark cannot at once see anything when a strong light shines into the room, so it was with me: although she was sitting by my side, I could not see her. This ideal figure which I embraced with the anxious responsibility of an eternal obligation became in fact something less, something so inconspicuous that I hardly could descry her. My melancholy was as if wafted away by the wind, I beheld what I had before me — heavens and earth! a saucy little miss!

I have to repeat the experiment again to see whether this is seriousness or not. I feel a lack of consistency in her behavior. To be consistent she must put an end to the thing and reject me. But she doesn't seem to have that in mind. What does this signify? We shall see.

April 2. Midnight.

BUT if she actually were to become insane! As for the danger of death, maybe there never was any serious question of it; at all events she now seems to be past that peril, although there remains always for me the alarming logical conclusion which results from confounding a cum hoc with a propter hoc. But as for insanity... let us see how the thing went.

First of all, my retirement as a scoundrel made an essential change in the situation, inasmuch as that would throw her into a pathological emotion of a totally different sort, it would arouse wrath, exasperation, defiance in her mind against me, and more especially her pride would prompt her to venture to do anything which might keep up her spirits. If I had been faithful to her, not only love but the other sides of the soul would have found satisfaction in possessing all in the loved one, and hence in losing all in the loved one; but as I did not prove myself a worthy object of her love, it would require a very rare heroism to disdain the comfort which most readily presents itself: that, namely, of making the unworthy one as unimportant as possible. In this respect I have supported her with all my might, and I believe that if I had not used such prudence (by which at the same time I paid due respect to the common judgment passed upon me), I should have been directly to blame if she had become insane; for to want to be a worthy object of her love, and then to want to behave in such a way, is to propose to her a dialectical problem which is so specifically relevant to the single individual's God-relationship that only by God's help can one hold fast to the problem. Hence it is the duty of the individual to submit, even to contribute, to the opinion that he is a depraved man, in the eyes of all who are concerned in the matter, and especially in her eyes, though in relation to unconcerned parties he may well hold his peace. This I have done.

Psychologically considered, it is possible for a feminine soul to become crazy in two ways. One is by a sudden transition which gets the better of the understanding. One may become blind by the sudden change of light and darkness, the heart may cease to beat by reason of a sudden change of temperature, breathing being impeded by the air which is drawn in. So it is also with the understanding in the case of a sudden transition: reflection is unable to breathe, and the understanding comes to a stop. So in this case insanity is petrifying. There is no proportion, or rather there is an absolute disproportion, between what the understanding is capable of dealing with, and the problem proposed to it. This disproportion expresses the character of the insanity. One instant is decisive for the whole thing — only one instant more, and this would not have occurred.

The other way is when a secret passion exhausts the will, and the sufferer slowly sinks into insanity. In this case the sufferer does not become petrified but becomes distracted by a multiplicity of ideas which displace one another by a natural necessity and stand in no relation to freedom, which at one instant when it was free called up the ideas, but now they unfreely call themselves up.

The first could not possibly be the case with her, for the transition was made as gradual as possible, and besides it must at once have been observable that this had occurred. It is rather the second, which in a way is the most dangerous, we might suppose has set in. For in a certain sense the relationship was made for her as dialectical as it was possible for my reflection to make it. I do not know that I have neglected to bring forward any possibility reflection could suggest, throwing it out always as an aside and so hypothetically that it was left entirely to her to find an explanation. That I did intentionally, and I believe (humanly speaking) that it is the only correct way. Ah, the labor was trying, and it was almost to be feared that I rather would be the one to lose my mind. By nature she was not very reflective, or rather hardly reflective at all, but one can never know what effect an occurrence may have. Merely a tenth part of the reflection-possibilities I set in motion would have been enough to unsettle a feminine brain if she had discovered them herself. But reflection-possibilities must have lost their attraction for her. That is what I wanted, and (humanly speaking) that is the correct thing. Secret sorrow must itself discover and bring forward reflection-possibilities, and then sorrow finds seduction in holding on to them, and this is the earnest money of insanity. Such is not her case. She may call up whatever reflection-possibility she will, it does not acquire the refreshing coolness of novelty, nor the enticing allurement of surprise, it possesses no secret infectious power, for she is already acquainted with it. Moreover, I have brought forward every reflection-possibility as completely as I could. I wanted to give her an impression of a superior reflection. One does that any way one can. So the instant she begins to reflect it will occur to her to say, “Ah, what good does it do me to reflect! If only I could reflect like him — and what good did it do him?” For a feminine soul, reflection is like sweets for the child: a little is tempting, but en masse sweets lose their seductiveness.

Furthermore, if sometimes she thinks of me, if she sets her hope upon the possibility that the relationship might be reestablished, a new sort of reflection might sneak in, she herself being the discoverer of such. With a view to this I have labored and am laboring with might and main by keeping my existence entirely unchanged. Perhaps, however, she will draw a conclusion from something she has heard about me or from something she thinks she sees in my outward appearance. Quite so, but at the same instant she will bethink herself that my reflection has exhibited to her so much possibility that she cannot possibly keep pace with it. This cannot humiliate or mortify her, for it is entirely natural that a reflective individual has more and even much more reflection than a girl. If she has not yet, as I hope not, to the point of nausea, formed a concrete conception of what reflection amounts to, it would perhaps be able to tempt her. I do not believe that such is the case now. I have done everything to make reflection loathsome to her

(for the omnipotence of reflection when it dwells upon one thought of course becomes omnipotence in dialectical bosh when the one thought is taken away) and to bring it about that every attempt at reflection, the moment she began it, might seem to her fruitless. I have suffered in doing this and suffer from it: a man may suck poison from another and himself die of it; by wresting reflection from another a man may become only too reflective. But if reflection is odious to her, she will be close to a resolution and will not tread the slippery path which may lead to insanity. If she becomes free, she becomes free by reason of her own resolution and not by means of one or another consideration or interpretation which I contrived to suggest to her.

In all human probability she could not become insane for love. Just because she has so little power of reflection the sudden transition would be the most dangerous thing for her. This danger has been obviated, and I have done the best I could with all my might to prevent the delirium of reflection. If then insanity were to set in, it must be due to the mortification of pride at finding herself rejected, which in despair of having a revenge would shut itself up within itself until it went astray. Ah, I know the world's judgment upon me, I perhaps have felt the pain more agonizingly than she; I shudder when I think that by a proud or (what is still more dreadful) by a compassionate glance somebody might give her to understand that she was insulted and thus impart to her the sense of insult. Once it was the custom in olden days, so it is related, that when a prince was being educated there was educated with him a boy of simpler extraction who had to take the floggings. People have talked about the cruelty towards the poor boy who had to take the floggings. To me it seems a far greater cruelty towards the poor prince, who, if he had a sense of honor, must have felt the blows far more forcibly, far more painfully, far more devastatingly, than they were felt corporally. I know also how it tortured me to expose her to this pain, I know that I was willing to do everything to prevent it by giving a false expression to the separation, so that in the eyes of the world I should be the sufferer, for when it is only a question of myself I know just how much pain there is and what I have to do for it. It was not possible, however, to put this through. Several times in our colloquies I let fall jestingly and in a conversational tone a few hints to call her attention to this, but in vain. Only a word from her, and the thing would have been done, though I had prudence enough to broach in a jesting and conversational tone an expedient which for me would have been an indescribable alleviation. More I did not dare to do. Ah, if I had talked about it with all the passion I felt, she would have perceived eo ipso in my zeal how much she concerned me, and then again the whole thing would have hung fire, and again she would have allowed herself to employ every means to move me, that is, to torture me, for moved I might not be. It is a comic contradiction to talk with pathos or with the decisive assurance of a systematic philosopher about what one is not convinced of oneself or does not oneself understand, but it is a tragic, a profoundly tragic contradiction to have to talk in vague terms, with jesting hints, in conversational phrases, about a matter which concerns and alarms one in deadly earnest. It is a comic contradiction to be ready to bet fourpence when there is an infinite stake to be won, but it is a tragic, a profoundly tragic contradiction to have to play as if one were playing for counters when one knows only too well how much is at stake. I suppose it would be one of the most dreadful collisions, perhaps the most dreadful of all, if one were to imagine that solicitude for some person made it necessary for an Apostle to talk ambiguously and in a light conversational tone about the truth of Christianity. — But to return to the subject. That insanity might come about in such a way I am reluctant to conceive, not because it is a dreadful thought, for the dreadful is a challenge to my honor to think it, but because it would cast a less favorable light upon her conduct towards me. Every outburst of passion whereby she laid a murder upon my conscience, every such outburst of passion which, until further evidence is forthcoming, my honor requires me to regard as truth, in spite of the protest of the understanding, every such outburst which may be ascribed to exaggeration can after all be easily reconciled with womanly purity and womanly loveliness, but every such outburst, on the assumption that pride was the motive, can only be an unseemly falsehood directed by self-love against me. True enough, I have permitted myself to direct many a falsehood against her, but truly it was for the sake of saving her and was meant sympathetically. Hence I am so reluctant to conceive this horror. Moreover, again I have done everything I could and have done it indefatigably. If my existence were to express something positive, it is conceivable that it might inflame her pride. If I were able to sustain a manly existence, which is such precisely by reason of its relation to the other sex, that is to say, by personal beauty, elegant deportment, an ingratiating nature, courteous ways, etc., then the prejudice in favor of me might be prejudicial to her, it might be an incitement to anger that he to whom the sex conceded competence as a judge had passed such a judgment upon her. But fortunately no man is farther from this than I. If I were an artist, one therefore who has an understanding of beauty and of femininity, if I were a poet, who is in fact the darling of the sex, then that possibly might inflame pride, for the fact that he whom the sex acknowledged had passed such a judgment upon her. If I were a thinker, a scholar, it would be more difficult to imagine how such an existence could be a further trial to offended feminine pride; and yet such an existence would be something after all, and on the other hand the something I am is precisely nothing. With her in mente it gratifies me and my genius to keep my whole existence at the critical zero-point between cold and warm, at the critical zero-point between being something and being nothing, between being perhaps wise, and being perhaps, perhaps sottish. Such an existence is entirely heterogeneous with a feminine existence, it cannot even be of any concern to a woman, still less incite her. My derangement of mind is not so great as to inspire her sympathy, but I am just half mad enough for her to say disinterestedly, “Oh, he’s so mad,” and if an offended pride is concerned about vindicating itself against me, it easily could rise superior to such a queer chap. It requires a good deal of dialectic to conceive of the zero-existence and to sustain it, but then to conceive of this existence as a polemic against oneself demands an uncommon dialectician. A woman rarely possesses much dialectic; she did not have it, if subsequently she has become such an uncommon dialectitian, she is perfectly able to look after herself, and if she has not, then my mode of procedure is correct and well thought out.

This is my diagnosis. To me unfortunately it gives scant comfort — though for me it is always a necessity to make everything clear to myself. If I had been consulted and had dared to say with regard to the condition of the sufferer that it is as I have described, I should be tranquil about the danger of a delirium setting in. Since I am not a physician but am the guilty party, this is of no help to me. The poison works upon me, the poison of reflection which I have developed within myself in order to suck all reflection out of her. I remember that she once said to me that it must be dreadful to be able, like me, to explain everything. She might here have got a notion how little she understood my reflection, for she scarcely apprehended how welcome this utterance was to me, and in what way it was welcome.

However, I have understood that after all she might become insane; my melancholy has also impressed upon me this possibility. Even though the unfortunate one whom insanity has ensnared in its infatuation were to suffer nothing, to have to experience insanity sympathetically in the case of another, staring incessantly at the doubtful reading of an eternal responsibility — ah, the thought of it is enough to drive a man to distraction! And yet if that were to come to pass, I should dare to seek her out, and that would be an alleviation to me — but suppose she were to recover and my problem were to retire again, then surely it would be my turn to go mad. To keep watch by her side night and day, that I can do, but I cannot sleep, and my agony is not overcome by "each night to rest beside my faithful wife," when it is not settled whether she can be my wife.

Now I will extinguish the lights. When everything is dark around me and I am silent I feel better. What is the use of talking. Everybody indeed would say it was a lie. Be that as it may. It is not my purpose to defend my assertion against opponents, neque thesin meant publico colloquio defendere conabor. And what is the case I am arguing with God? If it were about the emperor's beard — if she were to have changed her mind, if she would gladly retract every word which works along with my melancholy to fashion the horror — what then? Then it would merely follow that she had brought a nemesis upon her own head, that it is evident she had confused her person with the eternal relationship to God which is implied in the responsibility of duty, and with that she would have shown how insignificant she is. The case has been carried to a higher court; I have bestowed upon her every possible ideality; I could not, either for her sake or for mine, desire here again to come to such close quarters with the comic.

April 5. Morning.

Y ES, I was quite right; I got today the declaration and the last will and testament legally confirmed by... my little confirmand — for that is exactly the way she impresses me, the little miss that she is. And yet she does not want to act, she seems rather to want to incite me to become an adorer. In the case of anybody else I should say that this is the beginning of a little coquetry; of her I dare not and I will not say it, not even think it. But it is one of the most ludicrous things I have experienced. I am, as I have most deeply felt, much too old in comparison with her, but by such behavior she makes me indeed so disproportionately old that I am involuntarily prompted to think of an old schoolmaster who ex cathedra made the following speech to a pupil: “If you come to me again this way, you really will get one upon the ear... and I really believe you will get it right away.”

This then is the consequence of my ideal conception of duty. If it might be made clear to me that in the strictest sense I had a duty towards all men, I should be the most worried person in the whole land. I have an ideal conception of every relationship of duty, and inasmuch as my independent position brings it about that I have not entered into any, the conception still has the primitiveness characteristic of childhood, the enthusiasm proper to youth, an anxiousness attributable to melancholy, which makes the conception itself perhaps the best thing I have, but also constrains me to the most reckless exertion.

Why should she then bring laughter into this relationship? If she really didn’t care for me, well then, I am all ready for the journey; I have been religiously broken and contrite, and I may be so again when I assume the responsibility, but I am not to be broken erotically. If this is her serious meaning, then let one come straight out with it, let one say it becomingly, let one do honor to oneself in all that one does in this respect; but let not one be peevish and strike out backwards, for thus one only makes everything ridiculous. Even in her behavior there is, perhaps against her will, a recognition of me, for it is like a sort of insubordination. She must surely know that she possesses just as much power as I, and the person who possesses the power does not behave like this.

April 5. Midnight.

A POSSIBILITY

LONGBRIDGE gets its name from its length, for as a bridge it is long, though as a road the length of the bridge is not very considerable, of which one can convince oneself by crossing it. Then when one is standing on the other side, in Christianshavn, it seems as though the bridge must after all be very long, for it seems as though one were far, very far away from Copenhagen. One notices immediately that this town is not a capital or royal residence, one misses in a sense the noise and traffic in the streets, one feels as though one were out of one's element when one is out of the bustle of meeting and parting and hasting on, in which the most disparate interests assert for themselves an equal importance, out of the noisy sociality in which everyone contributes his part to the general hubbub. At Christianshavn, on the other hand, there prevails a quiet repose. There people do not seem to be acquainted with the aims and purposes which prompt the inhabitants of the metropolis to such noisy and busy activity, do not seem to be acquainted with the diversities which underlie the clamorous movement of the capital. Here the ground does not move, or rather shake, beneath one's feet, and one stands as securely as any stargazer or dowser could wish to stand for the sake of his observations. One looks about in vain for that social posciamur, where it is so easy to go with the others, where every instant one can get rid of oneself, every hour can find a seat in the omnibus, surrounded on all sides by conductors, where one feels so deserted and imprisoned in the quietness which isolates, where one cannot get rid of oneself, where on all sides one is surrounded by nonconductors. In certain quarters there are streets so empty that one can hear one's own footfall. The big warehouses contain nothing and bring in nothing, for though Echo is a very quiet lodger, yet in the way of business and rent no owner is the better for it. In the populous quarters life is far from being extinct, and yet it is so far from being loud that the quiet human murmur suggests to me at least the buzzing of summer out in the country. One becomes sad as soon as one enters Christianshavn, for memory is sad out there among the empty storehouses, and in the overpopulated streets the sight is sad where the eye discovers only an idyl of poverty and wretchedness. One has crossed the salt water to get here, and now one is far, far away, in another and remote world where dwells a race which deals in horseflesh, where in the only square there stands a solitary ruin, ever since that conflagration which did not, as pious superstition recounts in other instances, leave the church standing while it consumed everything else, but consumed the church and left only the prison standing. One is in a poor provincial town where the only reminder of the vicinity of the capital is the presence of suspicious characters and the special vigilance of the police; everything else is just as it is in a provincial town: the quiet hum of humanity, the fact that they all know one another, that there is a shabby fellow who at least every other day does duty as a drunkard, and that there is a lunatic known to everybody, who shifts for himself.

So it is that several years ago there might have been seen at a definite hour of the day at the southern extremity of Water Street a tall, thin man who walked with measured tread back and forth along the pavement. The strangeness of this promenade could scarcely escape anybody's attention, for the distance he traversed was so short that even the uninitiated must observe that he neither was out on business, nor was taking a constitutional like other people. Those who observed him often could discern in his walk a symbol of the power of custom. A sea-captain, accustomed on shipboard to promenade the length of the deck, marks out on land a distance of equal length and walks mechanically back and forth — so did this wayfarer, or bookkeeper, as the people called him. When he had reached the end of the street one observed in him the converse of an electric shock, the tug of custom in him: he came to a halt, swung about, turned his eyes again to the ground, and then marched back, and so on.

He was known naturally in the whole quarter, but in spite of the fact that he was crazy he never was exposed to insult; on the contrary, by the inhabitants of the neighborhood he was treated with a certain deference. This was due in part to his wealth, but also to his beneficence and to his advantageous appearance. His face, it is true, had that monotonous expression so characteristic of a certain sort of lunacy, but the features were fine, his figure erect and handsome, his dress was scrupulous and even elegant. His lunacy was very plainly exhibited only in the forenoon between eleven and twelve o'clock, when he walked out along the paved way between the Bornehus Bridge and the end of the street. The rest of the day he doubtless was dangling after his luckless preoccupation, but his aberration did not show itself in this way. He talked with people, made longer excursions, took an interest in many things; but between eleven and twelve o'clock one could not at any price get him to stop walking, to go on farther, to make a response to a questioner, or even so much as to return a greeting, though at other times he was courtesy itself. Whether this hour had some special significance to him, or whether, as sometimes occurs, he was actuated by a bodily disorder of regular recurrence, I never was able to learn while he was alive, and after his death there was no one from whom I could seek more precise information.

Now although the inhabitants of the neighborhood almost reminded one by their attitude towards him of the behavior of the Indians towards a lunatic, whom they venerated as a wise man, they perhaps privately had conjectures about the cause of his misfortune. It not infrequently happens that a man reputed to be shrewd betrays by such conjectures quite as much disposition to madness, and perhaps more puerility, than any lunatic can be charged with. The so-called shrewd people are often stupid enough to believe everything a madman says, and often stupid enough to believe that everything he says is madness, although no one is more cunning than a lunatic often is in hiding what he wants to hide, and although many a word of a crazy man contains a wisdom which a wise man need not be ashamed of. Hence it is perhaps that the same notion which regards the governance of the universe as being determined by a grain of sand or a mere accident is considered valid in psychology; for it is the same notion when one descries no deeper cause for insanity but regards it as easily explicable by nothing, just as mediocre actors think that to play the part of a drunken man is the easiest job — which only is true when one can be sure of a mediocre audience. The bookkeeper was shielded from ridicule because he was loved, and the conjectures about him were so securely preserved in silence that actually I never heard more than one. Perhaps the neighbors had no more concealed under their silence; that is a view I too can adopt, and I am not disinclined to do so, for fear my obstinate suspicion that they privately had many conjectures should betray in me disposition to puerility. The conjecture was that he had been in love with a queen of Spain; and this obviously was wide of the mark since it did not account for one of the most remarkable traits, his decisive predilection for children. In this way he did a great deal of good, actually consuming his fortune in doing it; hence he was sincerely loved by the poor, and many a poor woman instructed her children to greet the bookkeeper deferentially. But in the morning between eleven and twelve he never responded to a greeting. I have often seen a poor woman pass him with her child and greet him in the most friendly and deferential way, as did the child too, but he did not look up. When the poor woman had gone by I saw her toss her head. The situation was touching, for his benefactions were in a very characteristic and curious sense entirely gratis. The pawnshop takes six per cent on a loan, and many a rich, many a fortunate, many a mighty man, and many a middleman between them and the poor, will sometimes take usury on the gift, but in the case of the bookkeeper a poor woman was not tempted to be envious of him, or dejected because of her wretchedness, or cowed by the poor-rates, which the poor do not pay in money but work out by a bended back and a mortified soul, for she had the feeling that her “noble and generous benefactor” (to use the expression of the poor) was more unfortunate than she — than she who got from the bookkeeper the money she had need of.

But he was not interested in children merely as an opportunity for doing good; no, he was interested in the children themselves, and that in a very singular way. The moment he saw a child, at any time but the hour between eleven and twelve, the monotonous expression of his face became mobile and reflected a great variety of moods, he made up to the child, engaged it in conversation, and all the while regarded it with such close attention that he might have been an artist who painted children’s faces only.

This is what one saw in the street, but one who saw him in his apartment might marvel still more. One frequently gets an entirely different impression of a person seeing him in his home and in his chamber than when one sees him elsewhere. And this is not true only of alchemists and others who busy themselves with occult arts and sciences, or of astrologers, like Dapsul von Zabelthau, who in his sitting-room looks like other people, but seated in his observatory has a high peaked cap on his head, a mantle of gray callimanco, a long white beard, and talks with a dissembled voice so that his own daughter cannot recognize him but takes him for a bugaboo. Ah, one not infrequently discovers an entirely different sort of change when one sees a person in his home or his chamber, and then compares him as he here appears to be with what he appears to be in public life. Such was not the case with the bookkeeper, and one only saw with astonishment how serious his interest in children actually was. He had collected a considerable library, but all the books had to do with physiology. Among them were to be found the most costly copper engravings, and along with them whole series of his own drawings, including faces drawn with the precision of portraits, then a row of faces connected with one original in a sequence which showed how the likeness constantly grew less, though a trace of it always remained; there were faces executed in accordance with mathematical formulae, others which illustrated by a few clear lines how a slight alteration in the proportions completely altered the total impression; there were faces constructed according to physiological observations, and these in turn were checked by other faces sketched in accordance with a hypothetical assumption. In all of these what interested him particularly were the similarities attributable to family relationship in successive generations as seen from the point of view of physiology, psychology and pathology. It is perhaps to be regretted that his works never saw the light of day; for it is true he was a lunatic, as I learned on closer acquaintance, but a lunatic is by no means the worst observer when his fixed idea becomes an instinct for prying things out. A curiously interested observer sees a great deal, a scientifically interested observer is worthy of all honor, an anxiously interested observer sees what others do not see, but a crazy observer sees perhaps most, his observation is more intense and more persistent, just as the senses of certain animals are sharper than those of man. Only it goes without saying that his observations must be verified.

When he was thus occupied with his passionate investigation (which generally speaking was at all times except between the hours of eleven and twelve) many people would suppose that he was not crazy, although it was precisely then his lunacy permeated him most completely. And as underlying every scientific investigation there is an x which has to be sought for, or (regarded from another side) as the thing which prompts the scientific investigation, which is an eternal presumption seeking to corroborate its certainty by observation; just so did his anxious passion have an x which it sought, a law which would determine precisely the degree of resemblance in racial inheritance and thus enable one to reach an exact conclusion; and so too did he have a presumption to which his imagination lent a dolorous certainty that this discovery would confirm some dolorous fact concerning himself.

He was the son of a subordinate government employee living in modest circumstances. At an early age he got a position with one of the richest merchants. Quiet, retiring, rather shy and embarrassed, he attended to his business with an intelligence and punctuality which soon led the head of the house to discover in him a very useful man. He employed his leisure time in reading, in studying foreign languages, in developing his decided talent for drawing, and in making a daily visit to the house of his parents, where he was the only child. So he lived on without knowledge of the world. He was employed as accountant, and soon he was in receipt of a considerable salary. If it be true, as the Englishman says, that money makes virtue, it is certain also that money makes vice. However, the young man was not tempted, but as year after year went by he became more and more a stranger to the world. He himself hardly noticed this because his time was always fully occupied. Only once did a presentiment of it dawn upon his soul, he became a stranger to himself, or was like one who pulls himself up and vaguely recalls something he must have forgotten, though without being able to comprehend what it was. And something indeed he had forgotten, for he had forgotten to be young and to let his heart delight itself in the manner of youth before the days of youth were past.

Then he became acquainted with a couple of clerks who were men of the world. They soon were aware of his shy embarrassment but had so much respect for his ability and knowledge that they never did anything to make him conscious of his lack. Sometimes they invited him to take part with them in a little gaiety, in short excursions, or at the theater. He did it and liked it. His companions on the other hand were doubtless none the worse for his company, for his shyness put a wholesome check upon their merriment, so that it did not become wanton, and his purity imparted to their very amusements a nobler character than perhaps they were accustomed to. But shyness is not a power able to maintain its position and assert itself, and whether it was that the sadness which sometimes seized a man unacquainted with the world then revolted against him, or whatever other cause there may have been, at all events an excursion in the forest ended with an unusually sumptuous dinner party. Frolicsome as the two clerks already were, his shyness became only an incentive to them, and the painful sense of it on his part became an incentive to him, which had a more and more powerful effect the more they were inflamed by wine. Then the others led him with them, and in his over-excitement he became an entirely different man — and he was in bad company. So then they visited one of those places where, strangely enough, one gives money for a woman's despicableness. What occurred there even he himself did not know.

The following day he was out of sorts and dispirited; sleep had obliterated the impression, yet he remembered enough not to want to seek again the society of these friends, whether it was reputable or evil society. If he had been diligent before, he now became all the more so, and the pain he felt for the fact that his friends had so misled him, or for the fact that he had had such friends, made him even more retiring, and to this the death of his parents contributed.

On the other hand, the esteem in which he was held by the head of the house increased with his efficiency. He was a man much trusted, and they had already begun to think of giving him a share in the business when he fell ill and was sick unto death. At the moment when he was closest to it and was about to set foot upon "the solemn bridge of death" there suddenly awoke in him a remembrance, a remembrance of that incident which till then had not existed for him in any real sense. In his remembrance of it that occurrence assumed a definite form which brought his life to an end along with the loss of his purity. He recovered, but when he left his couch with health restored he took with him a possibility, and this possibility pursued him, and he pursued this possibility in his passionate investigation, and this possibility brooded in his silence, and this possibility it was that set in manifold motion the features of his face when he saw a child — and this possibility was that another being owed its life to him. And what he sought so anxiously, and what made him old when he was barely a man in years, was the unfortunate child, or the query whether there was such a child; and what made him a lunatic was the fact that every obvious way to discovery was cut off from him, inasmuch as the two who had been his destruction had long ago journeyed to America and disappeared; and what made his lunacy so dialectical was the fact that he did not so much as know whether his notion was a result of his illness, a fevered imagination, or whether death had actually come to the aid of his memory with a recollection of reality. Behold, it ended therefore with his wandering silently with bowed head along that short path between the hours of eleven and twelve, and with his wandering the rest of the day along the prodigious detour of the desperate windings of all possibilities, to find if possible a certainty, and then the thing to be sought.

However, in the beginning he was quite capable of attending to the business of the office. He was as precise and punctual as ever. He scanned the ledger and the letter-books, but now and then it came to him in a flash that the whole thing was labor lost, that there was something quite different he ought to be scanning; he closed the yearly statement of accounts, but in a flash this appeared to him a jest when he thought of his prodigious accountability.

Then the head of the firm died, leaving great wealth, and as he had loved the bookkeeper like a son, being himself without children, he made him heir to a fortune as if he had been a son. Thereupon the bookkeeper closed the account and became a man of science.

Now he had otium. His anxious remembrance might not perhaps have become a fixed idea if life had not inserted one of those casual circumstances which sometimes turn the scale. The only kinsman he had left was an old man, the cousin of his deceased mother, whom he called Cousin κατ’ εξοχην. This was an old bachelor to whom he betook himself after the death of his parents, and in whose house he dined every day, continuing this practice even after he had ceased to be in business. The cousin took delight in a certain sort of equivocal wit which (as psychology easily explains) is more often heard from old men than from the young. It is certain that when all hath been heard and most of it forgotten a simple open-hearted word in an old man’s mouth may acquire a weight it otherwise does not have, it is also certain that an equivocal expression, a careless word, in the mouth of one stricken in years may easily have a disturbing effect, more especially when one is so much disposed to infection as the bookkeeper was. Among the recurrent witticisms to which the cousin repeatedly returned there was one standing joke, namely, that no man, not even a married man, could know definitely how many children he had. This was a way the cousin had, who for the rest was a good fellow, what one calls a boon companion, fond of a merry party, but the equivocal jest and his pinch of snuff he couldn’t get along without. So there is no doubt that the bookkeeper had heard the cousin go through his whole repertoire a number of times, with that equivocal jest included, but without comprehending it or in any real sense hearing it. Now on the other hand it was aimed steadily at his sore spot and was calculated to wound him where he was weak and suffering. He would fall into one of his reveries, and when the cousin’s jest should have given spice to the conversation it was the accidental touch which developed the elasticity of his fixed idea so that it established itself more and more securely. The silence of the reserved man and the wit of the loquacious cousin worked together upon the unfortunate until at last the understanding seriously resolved upon a change of masters because it could not endure serving with such housekeeping, and the bookkeeper exchanged understanding for lunacy.

In the capital there is traffic and tumult in the streets, at Christianshavn there prevails a quiet repose. There people do not seem to be acquainted with the aims and purposes which prompt the inhabitants of the metropolis to such noisy activity, do not seem to be acquainted with the diversities which underlie the clamorous movement of the capital. It was at Christianshavn the poor bookkeeper dwelt; there, in the practical sense of the word, he had his home, there, in the poetical sense, he was at home. But whether it was along the specialized historical path of investigation he sought to penetrate to the origin of that reminiscence, or whether it was by the prodigious detour of ordinary human observation that he sought wearily, with only the support of deceptive hypotheses, to transform that x into a known quantity — he did not find what he sought. It seemed to him sometimes that the object of his search might be very far off, sometimes that it was so near to him that he was sensible only of his own contrition when the poor thanked him on behalf of their children for his lavish gifts. It seemed to him as if he were dispensing himself from the performance of the most sacred duty, it seemed to him the most horrible thing that a father should give alms to his own child. Hence he would have no thanks, lest this gratitude might be a curse to him, but for all that he could not cease to give. And seldom have the poor found a benefactor so "generous and noble" and received help on such favorable terms.

An intelligent physician, viewing the case in a more general light, would of course have been able to remove from his mind this possibility which was the origin of all the rest; and even if, accommodating himself to the sick man’s fancy in order to venture another method of cure, he had admitted this as a dolorous certainty, he still would have been able by his knowledge as a physician to remove the deduction from this certainty through a sequence of so many possibilities to so remote a distance that no one would be able to descry it... except the crazy man, who perhaps would only be the more deranged by such treatment. Such various effects has possibility. It is used as a file: if the body is hard, the sharp edge can be filed off; but if it is soft in temper like a saw, the teeth of the saw only become sharper by filing. Every new possibility the poor bookkeeper discovered sharpened the saw of anxiety with which he was sawing alone and from the bite of which he himself was suffering.

I often saw him over there when he wandered along the waterfront, and I saw him also on other occasions; but once I encountered him in a coffee house of that neighborhood. I soon learned that every fourteenth day he came there in the evening. He read the papers, drank a glass of punch and talked with an old ship’s captain who came there regularly every evening. The captain was well up in the seventies, white-haired, with a wholesome complexion and unimpaired health; his whole person showed no indication that except as a sailor he had been much tossed about in the world, and doubtless this impression was correct. How these two got to know one another I never learned, but it was a coffeehouse acquaintance, and they saw one another only in that place, where they talked with one another, now in English, now in Danish, now in a mixture of both. The bookkeeper was an entirely different man, he looked so roguish one could hardly recognize him as he entered the door with an English greeting which gave cheer to the old sailor. The captain’s eyes were not of the best, with advancing years he had lost the capacity for judging people by their appearance. This explains how the bookkeeper, who was in his fortieth year and here looked much younger than he did elsewhere, could make the captain believe he was sixty years old and could maintain this fiction. In his youth the captain had been, as a sailor can be in all decency, a jolly good fellow, but doubtless in all decency, for he had such a worthy air and his whole nature was so lovable that one could vouch for his life and for his smartness as a sailor. He never tired of telling tales about dance-halls in London and larks with girls and then about India. Thereupon they drank to one another in the course of the conversation, and the captain said, “Yes, that was in our youth, now we are old — but I should not say ‘we,’ for how old are you?”

“Sixty,” replied the bookkeeper, and again they drank to one an other. — Poor bookkeeper, this was the only compensation for a lost youth, and even this compensation was the effect of contrast with the all too serious brooding of insanity. The whole situation was so humoristically planned, the deceit about the sixty years supported by the use of the English language was so profoundly thought out with a view particularly to the humorous effect, that it impressed upon me how much one can learn from a lunatic.

Finally the bookkeeper died. He was ill several days, and when death came in earnest and he now was about to tread in earnest the dreadful bridge of eternity, the possibility vanished, it had been nothing but a delirium; but his works did follow him, and with them the blessing of the poor, and there remained also in the souls of the children the remembrance of how much he had done for them. I followed him to the interment. I chanced to be driving back from the grave along with the cousin. I knew that the bookkeeper had made a will and that the cousin was far from being covetous. I therefore took the liberty of saying that there was something very sad in the fact that he had no family of his own which could inherit what fortune he might leave, in the fact that he had not been married and left no children. Although the cousin was really affected by the death, more so than I could have expected, and on the whole produced a more favorable impression than I had foreboded, he could not refrain from saying, “Yes, my good friend, no man, not even the married man, can know definitely how many children he leaves behind him.” To me the redeeming feature was that this was an adage, which perhaps he was hardly conscious of repeating, the pitiful thing was that he had such an adage. I have known criminals in prison who were really reformed, had really got an impression of something higher, and whose lives bore witness to it, yet to whom it would occur that in the midst of their serious talk about religion the most abominable reminiscences were mingled, and that in such a way that they were not aware of it at all.

Longbridge gets its name from its length, for as a bridge it is long, though as a road the length of the bridge is not very considerable, as one can convince oneself by crossing it. When one is standing on the other side, in Christianshavn, it seems as though after all the bridge must be very long, for it seems as though one were far, very far away from Copenhagen.

April 6. Midnight.

How disappointing when a person is concerned about only one single thing and nothing occurs that has any reference to it. In the street there is plenty of life, in the houses there is movement and bustle and noise, but about my affair not a single word is heard. Thus it is a thread dealer sits in his little shop on a side street waiting for customers and rarely hears a footfall — in East Street the stores are full of people. But then the thread dealer does not have to pay so high a rent as the rich merchant in East Street. That is true, but on the other hand I am subject to as great taxes and exactions as any married man, and yet nothing happens that concerns me.

If the actress knew her rôle, had memorized it perfectly, with animation in her voice, in her bearing, was only waiting for the cue — but the prompter had fallen asleep, and she could find no means of awakening him!

If one saw that the telegraph was erected on the other side of the world, it was functioning and the first words were legible, but then a mist descended, and except by means of the telegraph nothing could be learned, and what one wished to know was as important as the salvation of one's soul!

If the noble steed knew why he was saddled, knew that now she would come, the royal maiden, the cavalier, the steed's pride, and therefore he puffed, panted, stamped his hoofs, bidding defiance with his strength, that it might please her with a voluptuous shudder to control his fiery metal — but the ostler went away and did not come again, and then he came again, but the cavalier was not with him, and yet the knightly trappings were not taken off, and the mighty steed was distressed at missing the breath in his nostrils and the joy of the leap and the satisfaction of obeying the hint of the royal cavalier!

If Scheherazade had invented a new story more entertaining than any previous one, if she had put all her trust in this tale, that it would save her life and not merely postpone the sentence of death, in case she were to succeed in telling it as thrillingly as she could at this instant — but she was not summoned at twelve o'clock, and one o'clock drew near, and she feared she might have forgotten it or forgotten how to tell it!

LAST night I had the good fortune to converse with a couple of very clever ladies. It all went off very brilliantly, and I almost believe that my presence inspired the clever women. They were ladies of fashion, and I — well, I am a man of the world, that is to say, I am intelligent and depraved. What wonder then that such clever people are in sympathy with me! It is so luxurious to try one's hand at a gallantry which is fashioned out of effeminacy and witty intelligence, the auspices are so favorable when a party to the excursion is a man from whom in case of need one can draw back and say, “No, God forbid, we do not, of course, approve of his shabby conduct, but after all he is so clever.” So on that occasion I learned much about what essentially is required for a happy erotic understanding; I learned that when a man is not clever enough to follow the emancipated spirit in her lofty (I would say gadding) flight, it is a cross, and penible in the highest degree to be tied in this fashion, indeed such an alliance is really invalid. No more was said, but I have no doubt that my heroines, being so sure of their own cleverness, were willing also to invert the proposition and express their sympathy with one who was tied to such a girl, or rather to prompt him to cut the matter short and seek a cleverer mate. A hint was also dropped which doubtless was meant for me and obligingly meant. O silence, silence, how thou canst put a man in contradiction with himself! So then they were proclaiming to me an indulgence, making a favorable appraisement of my conduct. That one woman dare thus offend another woman, and in this case a girl the latchet of whose shoe she is not worthy to unloose! If I had been emperor, they would have been banished straightway to a desert island. Now it is a nemesis upon me that my outward existence, though it is not known to many, contributes in a measure to confirm somebody in this odious aristocratic cleverness. If only I were free and did not have in mind the consideration that an authentic interpretation of my conduct might be a dangerous precedent for her — verily, if the maiden who sorrows or causes me sorrow wishes to place a man in the field as a martial contingent to fight for the good cause of love, let her set me free, and pro virili I shall hold up the banner. Come on then, ye clever ones, with your disdainful witticisms! A good cause stretches the bow taut and hits most surely the mark. That true love should be held in such slight honor! Yes, I feel indeed that I could make good use of an unhappy love affair, it comports well with my existence. If only I were free in giving expression to my love, if I were rejected but yet in formal possession of my love, if only I were not afraid that by acknowledging its significance for me I might suddenly unsettle her who must be supported by precisely the contrary notion. Then I would say, “Yes, I am the effeminate male (for man I dare not suffer myself to be called), the wretched manikin, who could not manage to love more than once, the narrow-minded wretch who was stupid enough to take seriously that pretty word about the first love, and could not regard it as a coquettish nosegay which experienced or half-experienced young ladies bandy about teasingly at the tea-table. One might after all have a little compassion upon me; I myself feel what a pitiful figure I cut, especially in these times when even girls die as pathetically as Falstaff falls in the battle against Percy — and arise again vigorous and nubile enough to toast a fresh love. Bravo!” — And by this speech, or rather by a life which is a justification for speaking thus, I am inclined to believe (if such a thing is at all possible) that the one man may benefit the other, to believe that I should have benefited my highly esteemed contemporaries more than by writing a paragraph in the System. What we imperatively need is that the pathological factors in life are posited absolutely, clearly, legibly and forcibly, that life does not become, like the System, a peddler’s cart containing a little of everything, so that everything is to be done up to a certain point, even the most foolish thing of all, that of believing up to a certain point, that people do not lie but are ashamed, do not lie in such a way that, erotically speaking, they die romantically of love and are heroes, but do not remain standing (or lying) in that position, but arise again and go further, and become heroes in the daily chronicle of news, and go further and become frivolous, witty, like the heroes they laugh at in the comedies of Scribe. Just try to think the thought of eternity into such a confusion! Think of such a man at the Day of Judgment hearing God’s voice, “Hast thou believed?” — and then the reply, “Faith is immediacy, the immediate is not what one should stop with, that is what they did in the Middle Ages, but since Hegel one goes further. One must admit, however, that it is immediacy, and that immediacy is — but wait for another boon." My old schoolmaster was a hero, a man of iron — woe, woe unto the lad who could not answer yes or no to a plain question! And if at the Day of Judgment one is no longer a lad, still God in heaven can count as a schoolmaster. Just to think that this paragraph-madness, this curriculum-craziness, this systematic slithering has so got the upper hand that in the end one would like to instruct God with all brevity in the newest philosophy. If God won't do it, I think then that the trumpeting angel will take his trumpet and smite such a Privatdocent upon the pate so that he will never be a man again.

But he who bungles in one thing bungles in all, and he who sins in one point sins in all. If only you clever ones knew how comic is the cleverness you admire. If only you knew — not how bad a seducer is, but what a comic personage. If you knew how detestable, but also how ludicrous it is that love, the loftiest thing in earthly life, should be regarded as merely the invention of sensuality, no more than the rut of the beast, or a plaything for wit and a social diversion for clever people! But you do not know that all this is merely theme for vaudeville, that your social cleverness is nothing but fiddle-faddle. Suppose that a woman, beautiful as the mistress of a god and clever as the Queen of Sheba, were to offer to squander summa summarum of her hidden and manifest charms upon my unworthy cleverness; suppose that the same evening a comrade were to invite me to drink wine with him and clink glasses and smoke tobacco studenticos and enjoy the ancient classics — I should not hesitate long. "What vulgar taste!" someone cries. Vulgar? I do not descry the vulgarity. I take it that along with love and the eternal element in love, all this beauty, and the gift of cleverness as well, is of infinite worth; but without this, a relationship between man and woman, which yet essentially would express this, is not worth a pipe of tobacco. I take it that when from this one separates love, and from love (mark well!) the eternal element, one can only speak correctly of what is left over, which amounts after all to the same thing, whether one talks like a midwife who talks without beating about the bush, or like an extinct soul which, being "burnt out to sheer spirit" cannot comprehend natural impulse. It is comic that the action in the vaudeville turns upon the sum of 4 s. 8 d., and so too it is comic that Don Juan has 1003 loves, for the number simply proves that they have no value. Hence one should be sparing in the use of the word love. Language has only the one word, and nothing is more sacred. One should not be shy of employing if need be the expressive term, as the Bible and Holberg do; but above all one should not be so excessively spirituelle as to think that the spirituelle is the constituent factor, for it constitutes anything but an erotic relationship.

But to maintain a prescriptive right in an unhappy love affair, to become happy in the highest sense by means of it, to make significant what to me appeared senseless when in Prussia they established an order of merit for those who had taken part in the war of liberation, and likewise an order for those that remained at home, to enrich this with a beautiful meaning, to wit, that he who had remained at home [understand unmarried] was happy by reason of his order, happy by reason of his [unhappy] love, although in the star upon his breast one more clearly perceives the cross [of marriage renounced] than in that of the more fortunate, although he wears the order (as that other is called in Prussia) "for good will" — that I well perceive would be a task to engage the enthusiasm of one who knows how to be content with the idea, with oneself and with the cognizance of heaven. Let them then fall at his right hand, the individuals who perished battling for an unhappy love, they rest in honor, they deserve a burial inscription and a monument, but he must not bury the dead for fear he might be distracted from his task. Let them then arise again, the seemingly dead who come to life by the application of the usual remedies, let them take delight again and yet again in stabbing for the ring in the cake, let them find everything restored to them now that they are thriving mistresses in their own house, let them when they are fully restored find themselves happy in being raised up with the best of care into a third marriage, let them mumble in unison over the fragments of a love story, and dribble life away in connubial intercourse — but he must not be willing to take time to behold it for fear he might be delayed.

My vow of silence makes me strong in monologues; but even a digression like this brings me only the more definitely back to her. When the fatherland is pressed by war and a woman can afford to equip a ship, that must be glorious, it seems to me. Such never will be my lot, but she, she is able to launch in the sea a warship which will fight for a good cause.

April 7. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. She is intractable. She breaks the engagement, and breaks the engagement, and yet doesn't break it. Heavens and earth, if the match is to stand thus, if we are to break it off — well then, we may as well begin tomorrow.

April 7. Midnight.

How is it with the wish? Might I not after all wish to have another, wish to find indemnification in a new love? Well, if a man who holds a cane in his hand were as certain that he is actually holding it in his hand as I am certain that there is not a thought of this in my soul, he would be pretty sure. But the passion of the wish, is this entirely unchanged?

It is difficult to test oneself with regard to a possibility, it is as if, without daring to use the voice, one were to test whether one has a strong voice. Many a time, and hitherto in vain, I have speculated how to find a way of testing myself with regard to possibilities.

However, I still believe that the passion is the same, and if it should be changed, I am certain that a hint, the merest hint of a more definite possibility will be enough to make the wish more burning than ever; for actually it was with the rupture of the engagement that for the first time I can say of myself in every sense and from every point of view as was said of Phaedria, amare coepit perdite.

In one way everything is in readiness, there is lacking only approval on the part of the idea, and the consent of the thought-context, notwithstanding I have sought in all quietness and still continue to seek every turn that can be given to this question. Hardly can any stage manager know with greater assurance that the change of scene is all prepared when he rings the bell than I know it. I have a standing account with a merchant for a complete set of furniture, my chambers are put in order, everything is calculated for a wedding — if only the moment comes, the bell rings, and the change of scene is accomplished in the twinkling of an eye.

Distrustful of myself, I have arranged my personal existence entirely like that of a married man. Punctuality and orderliness prevail everywhere. Darius or Xerxes (it is indifferent which) had a slave who reminded him to make war on the Greeks. Since I dare not confide in anybody, I must be content with having my reminder within myself. In my whole existence I express incompleteness — there is a memento. Whatever I buy, I buy in double quantity, my table is set for two, the coffee is served to two, when I ride I always ride as if I had a lady beside me. In so far as in these night hours I live rather differently, it is not just because this life pleases me so much.

And in case the whole thing comes to nothing after all, I regret nothing. I would not omit the least item: it is a matter of honesty which has the utmost seriousness for me, that if ever the thing might be done, my reckoning must be exact to the last farthing.

April 8. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. War has been declared. When one has to fight it is important to use self-restraint, above all no precipitancy. Admission to a menagerie costs 3 s., later it is reduced to 1 s. A fine edition of a new book costs a pound; if one is not precipitate, there comes out subsequently a cheap edition, and the book after all is the same. When one has to fight one must be alert to seize the opportunity, and must know where the opportunity is. At an antiquarian's or at second hand one buys at half price. When the dancer alights from her carriage she carefully hides her feet with her cloak lest anybody might admire these pretty feet. Not for ten pounds would she do differently, and yet everybody knows that it costs only 3 s. (or for persons of rank 8s.), and with that she dances before one in silk slippers, etc.

The mood I am in is abhorrent to me; all the frosty intellectuality which I had forever banished from this relationship she has forced back into it. It shall not be for long.

Today I entered her room with a skip, remained standing, hat in hand, assuming an easy conversational attitude, kissed her hand in passing with courteous and officious politeness, and hastened into the salon, where I knew there was company, because it was an anniversary occasion in the family. It was an opportune chance. Sarcasm, satire and coldness make a poor showing under four eyes, there must be some company present if this is to be effective.

A lady in the company was so kind as to invite us for the following evening. Usually I leave all such things to her, but in this case I hastened to accept in the most cordial terms, with thanks on behalf of both of us. It was quickly decided, and the terms in which I expressed myself were so flattering, that if my little confirmand were to have said a word against it, she would have disgraced herself. She did not do it.

When I was leaving her and had said farewell and was halfway out of the door I suddenly turned around and said to her, “Listen, it is quite true, don’t you think we ought to break it off?” Thereupon I swung about and parted with a wave of the hand.

April 10. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. Last night I was bored beyond words; but what will a man not do for his fiancee, that she may have a chance to go out in society... and that one may get her to be a little bit courteous.

She understands me very well, that I can see. In case it really were to come to a breach I had the situation well in hand.

Today we had to go to the Exposition and take a promenade and pay calls. It all goes capitally. With the utmost courtesy I keep her at a distance from me, although we are seen together more than we commonly are. There is some advantage in being regarded as malicious: I can be pretty sure not to be treated superciliously when we are out together, she easily gets to feel that she is de trop. Why did she provoke me! Of course no third party notices her embarrassment, for I constantly draw her into the conversation: “It is as my sweetheart says, only yesterday she said it.” A look from her is enough, and I proceed: “But for God’s sake, my sweet girl, canst thou not remember, it was yesterday — no, wait a bit, I am not any too positive of that, it was four days ago, just four days ago. Canst thou not remember?” etc. She understands very well why I said four days.

But my mood is past, there is something ominous in the whole thing. An old man has said that it is never well to let that which is to be regarded as holy appear in a ludicrous light. It is true enough that a young girl is not a holy object, and yet she was something like that to me. Verily I did not torment her by requiring her to behave like an ideal, I only wanted her to sit still while I was concerning myself all too deeply about the relationship.

I hope, however, she will soon get over this childhood's malady, there is still so much good understanding between us that I venture with confidence to read aloud to her from an edifying work. A third party would perhaps find it suspicious that I who am capable of behaving as I do should want at the same time to be a religious character. To scorn cleverness and everything but solemn plain downright seriousness is easy enough for one who has nothing else. But such judgments are of no help to me. In a spiritual sense the same thing is true of individuals which is true of sentences: a sentence which consists only of subject and predicate is easier to construe than a period with subordinate and intermediate clauses. The fact that there was a man who couldn't behave thus towards his lady explains nothing therefore, whereas if there were one who could, and in a situation similar to mine would not do it, and that on valid grounds, the case would be applicable. I hold to the idea. She is comic. Essentially this is what I would express. And I believe I do her more justice than if in an erotic relationship I were presumptuous enough to reprimand her formally. I must constantly possess the saving grace of indifference, it is the aesthetic idea which judges between us.

But if this were to develop in her a spirit of defiance, it might cost me dear. However, I do not know how else to act.

April 10. Midnight.

ONCE there was a man who said to me, "I have suffered something so terrible that I never have dared to speak of it to anybody." Most people will dismiss this utterance perhaps a bit hastily as an exaggeration. And yet if they were right in thinking it an exaggeration, the man too may have been right in another way. For when it came to an explanation it appeared that the object of terror was a mere insignificance, but the fact that it had so affected him that he did not dare to confide it to anybody may well have caused him to suffer terribly.

Today I read in the newspaper about “a young girl of superior station” who had put an end to her life by suicide. If only this girl had considered what deadly anguish she might cause another person, I believe she would have desisted. But how could it occur to her to be prudently careful of me? And now not to dare to inquire of anyone, but only with countless starts and jumps and turns, in the careless language of conversation, to fish for information! If on the whole my path is strewn with thorns, these accidental commotions are like a thorn hedge in which I am stuck fast. I am constantly seeing ghosts, in chance utterances, in verse, in mystifications. It is a nemesis upon me that I am so adept at this.

It is now already a fortnight since she received my confidential communication. During all that time I have not seen her in Hauser Square. — Agitated as the sea may be, and wherever in all the world one may be upon the sea, the compass always points to the north. But upon the sea of possibility the compass itself is dialectical, and the variation of the magnet furnishes no reliable indication.

April 12. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. She finds herself on rather a fasting diet — and not without dismay, as I can well observe. She would not be averse to yielding a little, but she cannot prevail upon herself to do it. Yes, that’s the way of it, she has trumped too early and quite in the wrong place. What, in view of my behavior these last days, would have been a rather justifiable retort came like a capricious shower. — True, I wage war for the sake of peace, and yet it tortures me to think of the final goal of the war, the crisis when she gives up. That will pain me, for I do not desire a victory over her. As long as we fight it is undetermined which is the stronger, but when she surrenders as the weaker one I do not desire to be present. I am proud myself, and in my relationship to her I am prouder on her account than on mine.

April 13. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. It all went capitally. For that I have to thank her good genius, and I have done so silently. Yesterday afternoon during my fencing hour the mask fell off just as I was making a pass, the adversary had raised his saber and was not able to stop it, so I got one on the head. The whole thing was of little importance, some blood flowed, a piece of plaster was applied to it, and I went home. But what happens? Yesterday evening rather tardily she gets an exaggerated account of it, and as I failed to make my appearance although I had promised to come, she becomes anxious. The shedding of blood, the tension between us, or our broadsword play, and perhaps a little love, united to make her sleepless. It is just as I have always said, in the course of one sleepless night a person can be incredibly changed. Today she came in haste to my apartment with her father. She showed a distress that must move the hardest heart. — So all went well. We were spared having me conquer, and mortal danger helped us to understand one another.

So much lovableness, such a girl, and with that such a little miss! But I gladly give twenty pounds to the poor out of gratitude for escaping so luckily the awkwardness of the capitulation. She looked at me now and then in such a way that I understood she had something on her heart to say. But I talked about the dangerous wound and about the coincidence that it was a mask that fell off. At that she laughs, although there was a tear in her eye. Then I say, “Yes, you may well laugh at me for being thus unmasked.” Then she says, “Oh, what foolishness, you know very well what I mean.” And I, “Yes, you mean that I should challenge him again and declare that it doesn’t count when the mask falls off.” And then we talked of other things.

Thereupon she goes home, and I watched her as when she returned from her singing lesson, and yet she now walks differently, there is a reckless happiness in her gait.

O Death, I believe they do thee injustice. What significance thou art able to impart to life when even such a little reminder produces such an effect!

April 14. Midnight.

THE method must be changed. When an examining magistrate would examine sharply he makes the environment as inquisitorial for the accused as possible: the murderer he seats beside the murdered man; him who is afraid of the night he awakens at cockcrow. For me there is an environment where my examiner is able to bring me very close to a confession, as close I think as it is possible to bring me. That is in a church. Today, contrary to my custom, I went to the Church of the Holy Trinity. Farsighted as a bird is she, and unfortunately she has a high conception of my talent for observation. She fixed her eyes upon me and could very well see that I saw. I was standing in the narrow aisle on the right; she came from the church door, went directly across in front of the choir and was about to be shut into a pew on the opposite side. She looked and then nodded her head. I hastily withdrew my glance, turned the pages of the hymn-book as though I had lost the place, and by this movement brought about a shake of my head. Ah, I feared that in this greeting there was concealed a hope. When I looked up another glance was exchanged; she seemed to have understood the movement of my head, and thereupon she nodded again. Ah, her expression was entirely different, it was as though she required of me only an admission, having given up hope. I had found the place and was now joining zealously in the singing, and as a chorister sometimes does I lifted up my head with the voice and then let it sink, a movement like that of a man who bids at the auction and says, “Yes.” Then the priest entered and we were separated. I did not watch her as she departed, and I left the same way I came, not a foot-breadth out of the path. A Pythagorean could not be more fearful of stepping on the ground than was I of taking, as they say, one step.

So I have talked then! No, I have not talked, I have not even done anything I could avoid doing. This ought not to have been in a church, she should not have tried to move me from what I once regard as my duty. But in a church I am so readily tempted to regard the matter eternally, and viewing it eternally I can willingly tell the truth, but not in time, at least not yet. She can perhaps be saved for life, she is not to bid farewell to it because I do. I do not think that she is sufficiently developed religiously to be capable of conceiving what it means to make such a break with existence, which is even more decisive for a woman than for a man. To wish to proceed along that path in union would be to repeat that dreadful incongruity which already I contemplated with dread during that two-months period of horror, that in union we should mourn an unhappy love. That cannot be. What likeness is there between her sorrow and mine, what fellowship between guilt and innocence, what kinship between repentance and an aesthetic sorrow over existence, even if that which awakens repentance is the same thing as that which causes her sorrow? I can sorrow in my way; if she is to sorrow, she must do it on her own account. A girl can subject herself to a man in many things, but not in ethical matters; it is unethical for her and me to sorrow thus in union. Along that path how is she ever to come to the point of sorrowing religiously, if she is to leave unresolved the ethical problem of my conduct towards her, when it is over the consequence of this she would sorrow? If only I might be a woman for half a year in order to learn how it is she is differently fashioned from man. I know very well that there are examples of such conduct on the part of women, I have them psychologically at my fingertips, but in my eyes all these characters were failures. I can make no sense out of my view of life if I myself am to have the experience that one individual is wasted upon another, and wasted she is if things go on this way.

As soon as she has begun to venture in the narrow way which leads to a religious view of life she is lost to me. A woman may possess passion as strong or even stronger than that of a man, but contradiction in passion is not a task for her, as for example the task of giving up this wish and retaining it at the same time. If she labors in a purely religious way to give up this wish, she is transformed; and then if ever there were to come an instant for its fulfilment, she would no longer understand it.

And yet perhaps I am talking quite irrationally, perhaps my construction of her is planned on too great a scale. Perhaps the religious movement of infinity is not within the compass of her individuality. Her pride had not energy enough to raise her temporally to a higher power. If she had been absolutely proud, this, humanly speaking, would not have happened. Perhaps therefore religiousness in her does not accomplish the complete revolution of infinity. Her religious eternity is possibly not the eternal decision but an indefinite extension of time. So eternity has dwelt with her, comforted her, as when in Homer’s descriptions a god or a goddess hastens to the help of one of his heroes. She believed it was the decision of eternity, she believed it was her death, she believed all was lost; but behold, instead of waking to this eternal decision she became weary of fruitless wishing, weary of the fruitless act of renunciation, and fell gently asleep in eternity, while time passed, and she awoke and belonged again to life. Then there would even be a question of a new engagement, a new love.

This indeed was what I desired, thus she is free in fact. I have thought of three possibilities: that through pride she might be raised to a higher power in temporal existence; that through an illusory resignation she might attain a new love; or that she might become mine. Every unseemly possibility whereby she might indeed become free, but in such a way that she would lose in my eyes, I have not been willing to think.

The first possibility must be discarded; for if even now, after receiving my confidential communication, she has not got further along, she is not proud in the sense requisite for constructing the unusual character upon this foundation.

The last possibility is only a wish, which encounters moreover this difficulty, that she will have remained at the point for it only in case she had not begun at all upon the religious way but had kept herself in a state of feminine naïveté. No sooner has she begun to sorrow religiously than the wish vanishes like the evening sun when the moon begins to shine in its splendor, or like the moonlight before the break of day. Double illumination and double reflection a woman cannot deal with, her reflection is only single. If she would give up the wish, then reflection is the conflict between the life fostered by the wish and the death exacted by resignation; to will both at once is impossible to her, or perhaps even so much as to understand such a thing.

So there remains the middle possibility: the slumber of illusory resignation, repose upon an eternity, while time passes and again she opens her eyes and awakens to new life. If this comes to pass, then no human life has been wasted upon me. The girl who once in the illusion of sorrow felt, alas, that she was a superfluous flower in life, felt, alas, like the poor little bird which could not be taken into consideration when a greater was in question, seems now in this way to be taken into consideration. So let the scientists teach us that existence is waste on an enormous scale, let whosoever will talk about a love which demands sacrifices, if the situation is as I here think it, the girl becomes in my eyes a capitalist, and providence effects a highly economic conversion of her funds. It has been said that Denmark is the only state which possesses a private fortune, because it has the toll of the Sound. It appears to me that on the smaller scale of the world of private persons she in like manner becomes an exception among women.

Marriage is like the ordinary revenue of the State, but then at the same time she possesses the mortgage on my life and has the interest on it. But it is well at all events that she has not done this for my sake or because I begged her to do it. — This, it seems to me, looks very inviting. Her existence acquires more importance than mine. That cannot have had great importance for her, since in such case there must have come about one of the situations constructed en gros, and that would have resulted in costing me dear.

Yet even when I think the thing in this purely hypothetical way there is still a ticklish point left over. For what is it she is to do? what is it one may expect to happen? Oh, yes, I know full well, she is to do what perhaps is preached in more than one church. The religiousness of infinity is perhaps not always preached where in other respects people are precise about the categories. Nor is it always Christianity these people preach when, without a trace of hypocrisy, they use the sacred name and the Biblical expression, for the movement of thought may be entirely pagan. That in which she is expected to find comfort is not the real religiousness. As seen from that point I should vanish from before her eyes as an atom, as a mere occasion like the sale of Joseph, until she should win the eternal; but with that there would be no question of a new love. No, what she is supposed to be healed by is a practical wisdom permeated by a sort of religiosity, a not altogether unseemly composition of a bit of aesthetics, a bit of religion and a bit of practical philosophy. My life-view is different, and with all my might I compel myself to hold to the categories and to hold them fast. This is what I will, what I require also of everyone whom I admire, of everyone I am in any real sense to recognize, that by day he should think only of the categories of his life and dream of them by night. I judge no one; he who is busy judging others in concreto is seldom true to the categories. It is the same as in the case of one who for the proof that he is serious has to rely upon the testimony of another; such a man is not serious, for seriousness, first and last, is self-assurance. But every existence which wills something is thereby indirectly a judgment, and he who wills the categories judges indirectly one who does not will them. I know too that even when a man has only one step left to take he may stumble and let go of his category; but I do not for this cause believe that I shall let it go and be saved in twaddle, I believe that it would hold on to me and judge me — and in this judgment there again would be the category.

But what power she has over me! To gratify her every wish, to employ the days in giving her joy, that indeed is a pleasure, had I been permitted to do it; but my thought which is my very life and the loss of which is my spiritual death — if that is to be taken from me! I have long since cancelled as unessential all the differences between men, but what keeps me in life is the belief that there is equality for all in the matter of willing, that in this respect the same thing may be required of all. And yet by the merest hint hardly divined she has brought me to the pass (as a third party would say) of treating decorously that equivocal resignation. And why? Because I in my turn cannot exist spiritually unless she may exist in the same spiritual apprehension. From this one perceives how dangerous it is for a thinker to be in love, not to say married, and to hear daily the reasonings of a woman. Ought the thinker perhaps to be neither the one thing nor the other, or ought he perhaps to be both? — Oh, yes, here you have a real man who resigns himself up to a certain point, and then in turnconsoles himself up to a certain point! But no, be still, thou passion, which would stir my mind to rebellion, though there is good reason for it. For that which to the point of desperation I require of myself — not as something extraordinary but simply as the right thing — I cannot endure to see confused with something different, I cannot chaffer.

But have not I myself furnished the occasion for such a thing? I have in fact labored to the end that she may become free. Quite true; but I have left the thing so dialectically to her decision that she can do what she will. I thought I owed it to myself that I should incur no responsibility. Perhaps in the first period of horror it might have been possible to bring about a milder decision; but I should have been thinking of my own, not of her welfare, had I done anything in that direction. She perhaps would not have comprehended how in that way she became dependent upon me and instead of being respected was wasted. So the thing was put in such a way that she had plenipotentiary authority to act in the strength of religious infinity. Thereby I was bound forever and never would quite recover myself. If she chooses the other, I have guessed wrong.

What consoles me is that infinite reflection is not essentially a thing for women. Hence that rather doubtful sort of resignation may keep a woman just as beautiful. If she falls in love, that is a help to me so far as I can be helped, but whatever she does I cannot but try to make something beautiful out of it. It would be a bitter consolation for me if I am helped and she too, but in my heart I must say of her, “This existence is a renunciation of the idea.”

And to what end all my cares and plans and efforts? What do I accomplish? Nothing. But not for this cause will I cease, precisely for this cause I will not cease, for when one does everything and it is of no avail, one can be sure one is acting with enthusiasm. Therefore I do not disdain this nothing, any more than the widow disdained to cast her two mites into the treasury of the Temple. This nothing in the way of accomplishment is a great deal in the way of suffering, as a lonesome man will understand. For when agony has convulsed the bowels and the body trembles, there is a friendly hand which supports the patient’s head until the fury of the pain is calmed; or when the groan alarms and pain wrings the heart which is about to burst if it is that of a woman, there is a compassionate woman who loosens the stays until she breathes again; but the lonely man dare not even abandon himself to the physical relief which agony is for passion.

But there is no time yet to sorrow on my own account, for the dialectic difficulty of my position is shown also by the fact that it signifies two entirely different things, facing the alternative of sorrowing on my own account or sorrowing on account of her and her family. However, I will try to find out what would be the most beautiful form for a new attachment. The most beautiful would be that before she was engaged to me she had been in love with another and that this love might now awaken again, supported perhaps by the self-reproach she might feel at having given me the preference. Thus her association with me would be an episode, she would not be falling in love anew but returning to her first love, and her association with me would perhaps have taught her to find this more beautiful than ever. Bravo, bravo, that will do! In case my pen were a living being — but it is only a steel pen — but in case it were a bird which came with this leaf in its beak, if it could have any joy in my gratitude, how I should thank it! — But the misfortune is that about this I know nothing. And yet there cannot be imagined a more reliable informant to whom I could appeal than she is. But why keep it secret? And why so zealous to hold me fast? The answer to this would make clear to her a responsibility towards the unknown individual and towards me. Have I then taken her by surprise? Far from it, I made the case clear to myself at an early date. If I have taken her by surprise, it must be by reason of the caution with which I sought to avoid it. Assuming this to be the case, all is well again. She feared me more than she loved me. So when the debates began about breaking the engagement she brought up again the forgotten experience, and the painfulness of it has been the prompting of her despair. — So it is then. If this comes about, she is helped, i.e. she has helped herself, and I am helped because she is free, and helped because she has not become less beautiful. She owes nothing to me, for she has not followed any advice of mine, since I have given none, and in this direction could not have given it. If she owes me anything, some little compensation for all the suffering, it is this, that I have not been meddlesome enough to want to advise her. I owe nothing to her directly, for I have not begged her to do anything for my sake, and she cannot by any means be supposed to have done this for my sake. Indirectly I owe her much, but the debt is essentially grounded in my personality, which precisely upon the hypothesis here assumed desires to acknowledge it.

All this is capital — if only it were not a hypothesis. It is a capital hypothesis, if only as a hypothesis it were not so frail.

It lacks five minutes to two o'clock, my working time is over. I shall think of her passionately from midnight on, but not a minute beyond this stroke of the clock. It is necessary to hold out, and after two o'clock every thought of her is a temptation, a fraud against her, for there must be some sleep to maintain passion in the long run, which is what I will to do. — The difference between thin beer and the strong beer or ale the English drink is not that the latter foams, for the thin beer too can foam and foam just as strongly, but its foaming is over in a moment — on the other hand the foam of the heavy beer lasts.

April 15. Morning.

A YEAR ago today. So then the weather became fair, indeed serene. One starts out for the country at an early hour in search of freedom and beauty, but the weather is uncertain, so one sits in the carriage speculating whether it might not be possible to wrest from the changeable condition a fairer aspect so that one might be content with it — and then the sun itself grows weary of the capricious inventions of the scurrying clouds and of the inconstancy of the showers, and it bursts forth in all its splendor, so it is settled that the weather is serene. How could I fail to appreciate duly the fact that now it has been settled by her, my sun, that the season of showers is past?

The feminine immaturity which gave vent to utterances a bit feverish is now as though forgotten. I dare to believe that I am loved. It never occurred to me indeed that she might be in love with another, but she seemed to me to lack the consolidation which embellishes the soul and permeates it by its beauty. The sight of it now affords me an experience of joy comparable to the dreadful experience of seeing a man who has taken poison and observing that it begins to take effect.

And the pain occasioned by the fact that she could behave so preposterously invests her with a gentleness I had not divined. And the fact that she is sensible of my pain — how much that proves! How fortunate that death came between us! If we had fought longer, if by our own efforts a settlement had been reached between us, however amicably, it would still have been precarious. I fear only that she takes the whole thing too much to heart. To relegate it completely to oblivion might cause her to suffer in silence, and if I make a reference to it, she at once is agitated, even though I do it as good-humoredly and as jestingly as possible. Is it perhaps precisely because of this jocular tone?

April 17. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. The misfortune is that she has no religious postulates. In this respect I have been beating the air. Yet she wanted to fight with me, she has not exactly been vanquished by me, but the dread she experienced that night has taught her to understand herself. She regards it as a defeat, even though she finds herself happier than before. Here the thing for her is the freedom of infinity as over against me. For the moment she has idealized me, and now by this little misconception she disparages herself. If only there does not succeed to this a weakness, a blind devotion towards me which I cannot and will not understand. I do not want to be worshiped. I do not believe that unfaithfulness on her part would wound me so sorely as this annihilation of herself, as it seems in my eyes to be. I am proud, and so ought everyone to be in relation to other men; let him be humble before God, and that in every respect, but not humbled under the personality of another man. Truly, there is a kind of devotion which if it holds fast to me would compel me to repel it — terrible as it may be to say so. If it is unseemly for lovers to squabble, there is also a devotion which in a religious sense is a terrible responsibility.

April 18. Midnight.

So then there is nothing for me to do except to keep calm, for to accomplish anything with regard to another love which I know nothing about is impossible. So the reflections I have registered above are in vain, and so too a good part of my sympathetic expectation for her and the trembling for myself.

What then is the good of shrewdness? But I am anything but shrewd. If in a certain sense I am the shrewdest in my circle, in another sense I am perhaps the stupidest of all. Nothing I have heard or read has struck me so pointedly and personally as a saying about Periander. It is said of him that he talked like a wise man and acted like a maniac.

That this saying applies aptly to me is proved by the fact that I accept it with the most passionate sympathy, and yet it has not the slightest influence to change me for the better. This way of appropriating it is quite à la Periander. Within my postulate I am shrewd, but the postulate for my action is so ideal that it turns all my shrewdness info foolishness. If I could learn to discount my postulate, my shrewdness would make a good showing. If I could be shrewd in this way, I should have been married long ago. To get one's wish fulfilled and to get thanked for it into the bargain as for an act of charity, and then to arrange matters as if one were essentially in possession of one’s freedom, that would have been shrewd, and I should have been regarded as an estimable man who does not break his plighted word, a prodigy of a husband who is faithful to his wife and does honor to a girl; for my ideal postulate presumably does not do her honor, and the fact that I would prefer to spend everything and set heaven and earth in commotion rather than sneak into the honorable estate instituted by God and so sneak through life is enough presumably to prove that I have no honor.

My wish, which aims higher than to see her free, my wish, which is the culmination of the divine madness in my soul, must now, I suppose, be relinquished. But I will not relinquish it. As soon as I am set at liberty and dare to act it would still be possible that my nature might inflame the wish in her. Suppose this possibility, contingent upon a remote possibility, is infinitely remote, yet I will not let it go and will not renounce it. Only an official certainty that she is free and is another’s — only with this is the wish dead. But until then it shall not visit me piteously as a fleeting fancy now and then, but it shall be held in high honor as the highest passion in my synthesis.

True enough, sadness is the grace which accompanies sorrow, as despair accompanies it as a fury; but one first shrieks in pain before one dares to be sad. To become sad at once is sometimes an indication of a base soul.

So sleep well, my girl; he who promised thee faithfulness can do no more than he does. So sleep well, my dear child, as I almost might say, for my solicitude is almost like that of a father who desires to see his daughter engaged. Behold, this is sadness. But I will not be sad, I will hold out with thee, I will hold out though I become an old man — if nothing happens in the meantime. I do not call back the night watchman who stands on the lookout for the fulfilment of expectation.

April 20. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. When an examining magistrate has perhaps been sitting for a long time reading documents, hearing testimony, confronting witnesses, exploring localities — just as he sits there in the chamber he suddenly sees something. It is not a man, a new witness, it is not the corpus delicti, it is a something, and he calls it "the course of events." As soon as he sees the course of events, he, the examiner, has all he wants.

I have noted in myself that there was disquietude in my whole being, that something dreadful was in the wind, I did not sleep at all the whole night, and now I see — alas, not the course of events, but the course to destruction. She is devoted to me in a measure which fills my whole being with dreadful foreboding; and yet she is lovable in my eyes and touches me profoundly, but this devotion and the agitation it causes me are a torment. Even if I were a different man I could not understand this devotion, and I cannot devote myself in this way. And think of me who am intensely reserved! And she hardly knows me! What an incongruity! I acquire power over her, and she has none at all over me. Is such a relationship a marriage? It is like a seduction. Do I then wish to seduce her? Abominable thought! And is there not a higher sort of seduction which is worse than that of lust? She says she has never felt happier than now, she cares about nothing but her ecstasy. Is it on my part compatible with love to see such an incongruity? And I know for myself that I am intensely reserved. Yes, to be sure, I have seen that by my practice in dissimulation I am able to conceal my reserve. But her devotion becomes exigent, it turns my being inside out. True enough, she does not comprehend this in the least; but I know it, and what am I to do?

That misunderstanding has done irreparable harm. Perhaps she had inwardly intended to fight seriously. And there is no limit to the expression of devotion when once it begins to express itself directly. It is as when a person first begins to complain of his sufferings: soon the true expression no longer suffices to move the hearer, and so, without being conscious of it, he stealthily interjects untruth. That misunderstanding does irreparable harm. If I look serious, she thinks it is because of our strife. And to think that such is not the case at all, but it is my reserve which makes me gloomy! Ah, it is enough to drive one mad!

Today she bade me sit on a chair. I did so without suspecting anything. She retreated a few steps, then approached and fell upon her knees. Doubtless there was a little coquetry in this, but essentially it was an expression of sadness, and for all that an expression of beatitude (yes, I may call it that), an insane beatitude at having found the correct expression for her passion. That instant I laid hold of her and lifted her up. He who has committed a crime casts his glance around the room, suspicious of every corner, he directs it through the window to the neighbor's house, and the agony of conscience makes him sharp-sighted. I cannot say how dearly I would have paid for a certainty that no one had seen it, or how dearly I would have paid not to have seen it myself. Have I demanded this? Truly, she has never understood me. I myself have never bowed the knee before any man, perhaps I might do it before her if the situation required it, but for her personality and mine the situation ought never to occur. For me, such a thing is not a foolish prank, an exaggerated gesture; if I had done it, I should count no insult so intolerable as to have it regarded as such. Another instance of my pride.

I know very well that a girl is different from a man, but yet I shall never forget that act, it has produced a madness in my blood, a confusion in my brain, an anguish in my reserve, a despair in my resolution, and above all a humming in the ear of presentiment which is harbinger of the extremest ill.

April 22. Midnight.

As one who is sickly and accustomed to a certain medicine must have the pain-killing drops with him wherever he goes, so, alas, must I have with me everywhere a brief summary of my story of suffering, so that I may orient myself in the whole situation — orient myself in the matter I have thrashed out by myself, in a way quite different from that in which a pupil thrashes out his lesson with the teacher. If I happen suddenly to think of it (suddenly means in this instance that half a day has elapsed since the last time I recited the lesson), there occurs then the most dreadful crisis. Psychically this in a measure corresponds with a slight return of apoplexy as a bodily ailment. In an instant I become dizzy, my thought cannot quickly enough catch hold of something solid in the complication, and it seems to me as if I were a murderer. There is nothing to be done except with the utmost effort to renounce all thought about it as a religious temptation — then the instant is past, and again I understand what hundreds and hundreds of times I have recited.

— Or I suddenly reflect how much I have suffered, and the thought comes so suddenly that the superintendent of reflection cannot hasten quickly enough to the spot, and I am completely overwhelmed. This happened to me yesterday. I was sitting in a coffee house reading a paper, when suddenly that idea awakened in my soul, so suddenly that I burst into tears. Fortunately there was no one present, but I learned to be more cautious.

April 24. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. I am a lost wayfarer, I am like one who has come into a strange land where people talk a different language and have other customs. If my suffering were that the strangers behaved towards me with nationalistic pride, that would be well enough. But such is not my case. She is very far from making any demand upon me, in her illusion she sees only her illusion, and she is infatuated with it. She is happy, she says, and I believe that in a certain sense she is happy. She is lovable and busies herself with her love like a child which is left to its own devices but is joyful and happy in its pastime. One could sit and look at her and grow old and still look. There is only one inconvenience, and that is the fact that I am the object of this love. All that preceded that little altercatio and which in my eyes was of such great importance, namely, the ideal impression to which I, who myself bow under the ideal, sought to direct her attention, has not moved her in the least. In this respect she is, as it were, unsusceptible. But the conflict, my altered behavior, death's intervention, is changing her nature, she displays an amiability at which I sadly wonder and which makes me an enthusiast for her. And what does this mean then? It means that she is totally unreceptive of the motives which I count the highest. There is a difference of language between us, a world between us, a distance which now is revealed in all its painfulness.

April 25. Midnight.

PATIENCE!

April 26. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. So it is upon this reef I am to be wrecked! I have never humbled myself before anyone, neither have I wished to exalt myself. My notion about the relationship of man to man is for everyone to get his deserts, and that's enough. Generally speaking, I have not had a great deal to do with people in an intimate sense, my spiritual existence has preoccupied me too much for that. Now I have been humiliated. And who is it that humiliates me? It is a young girl, and it is not by her pride, for we should get ourselves out of that all right, but it is by her devotion.

Fortunately she is not to remain with me always. No, never shall that be! Possibly she may imagine it, but I do not understand it, and it is a question after all of her happiness. And if we are united, it will at last come to the point where she begins with consternation to suspect what I ought to have prevented.

To maintain my reserve in her presence is easy enough — perhaps it is precisely on this account I feel humiliated.

What for me is the nerve of my spiritual existence, namely, equality in human relationships, she does away with. She cares nothing for this infinite passion for freedom; she has conjured up her illusion, and that suffices her. I too think that one may love, that one may sacrifice everything for one's love; but whether I am to see good days, or whether I am to adventure my life, the deepest breath of my spiritual existence I cannot forego, I cannot sacrifice, for that is a contradiction, since without that I do not exist. And of this breath she feels no need.

Yet precisely now I feel that I love her, that I love her more deeply than ever, and yet I dare not, I (nota bene) who as her fiancé am bound to love her.

April 27. Midnight.

I HAVE no inclination to make any entry, and there is nothing whatever to register. In this town the night watchmen show by their cry that they are on their beat. Why all this crying? In England they go along in perfect silence and put a ball in the box, and the inspector sees in the morning that they have been on the beat and have not slept.

April 28. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. If only she might put up some resistance against me. When I am fighting it is easy for me, and even when I am to live in peace I wish that he I am to keep peace with were equally strong or stronger than I. The more blindly she is devoted, the more responsibility falls upon me. And I am afraid of the responsibility — and why is that? It is because I then have myself to deal with, and of this strife I always am afraid. In case God Himself were a man of some sort, whom one might have outside oneself and talk to and say, "Let's hear now what you've got to say, and you'll have a chance to see how it strikes me" — in that way one would get off easily. But this is the reason God is stronger than anybody, the strongest of all, that He does not talk that way to a man; the man He would briefly engage in conversation he takes under custody in such a way that through the man himself He speaks to the man. Their conversation is not a pro and contra as of persons outside of one another, but when God speaks He uses the man himself to whom He speaks, He speaks to the man by means of the man himself. Therefore it is He possesses might and can crush a man any moment He will. In case the situation, for instance, were this, that God has spoken once for all, in the Bible, for instance, then, so far from being the mightiest, God would be in the tightest fix, for one can readily dispute such a thing, if one is free to oppose to it one's own opinion. But such an assumption is an airy fancy which has no basis in fact, for God does not speak thus. He speaks directly to every separate individual, and the instant He speaks to him He uses the individual himself in order through him to say to him what He would say to him. Hence it is a weak point in the structure of the Book of Job that God appears in the clouds and also appears as the most accomplished dialectitian; for what makes God the terrible dialectitian He is, is precisely the fact that one has Him at very much closer quarters, and therewith the softest whisper is more blissful, and the softest whisper is more terrible, than seeing Him enthroned upon the clouds and hearing Him in the thunder. Hence one cannot argue dialectically with Him, for all the dialectical power in the soul of the man concerned God uses against this man.

When an individual fears God he fears what is more than himself, and after this fear comes the fear of oneself, and the angustiae of this fear is responsibility.

The more she devotes herself, the more unhappy I become. Is this a happy engagement? And what indeed is her happiness? From my point of view it is the happiness of infatuation, of illusion. But Socrates says that the greatest misfortune is to be under an illusion.

April 29. Midnight.

THE question remains whether I might not convey to her a mitigated notion of my character. If she thinks of me at all, as there seems to be a sad probability she does, I can well see what in all human probability she might need. The explanation given of my conduct was about as follows: I was to a certain degree a depraved man, but yet not entirely bad, I had good points too; I had indeed loved her but was lacking in seriousness, and then there was my instability, I could not keep a resolution; I regarded her indeed as an amiable girl, but I did not find in her a spirit with which I could be happy; it is handsome of her therefore to submit to her fate, it is magnanimous of her to be reconciled to the girl who one day is to enthrall me with a greater power, "for one thing is certain, that though he were to find a girl more spirituelle, he will find none that loves him so dearly. This he himself must surely admit, and in view of that he surely has repented of his conduct, even if he is too proud to alter anything." — A repentant individual who is too proud to alter anything he has done amiss! What then in God's name is repentance?

To think of being obliged to help one by such an explanation, in which every sentence is meaningless, and as applied to me is also untrue! I am either exceedingly depraved, a hypocrite, indeed, if not loathsomely enslaved by self-deception, or else I am as chivalrous a soul as the best of them. I do not lack stability in keeping a resolution, least of all when the criterion is a young girl who doesn't quite know what a resolution is. I have never regarded her as amiable, have never altered my opinion of her a tittle. I have not found anyone more spirituelle or intellectual, since I do not seek for feminine intellectuality but beg to be excused. Her magnanimity is a trump entirely misplaced, for I have no intention of enacting "A Story of Everyday Life" and engaging in the business of barter. It is true that I repent, but just as certain it is that I wish to alter everything.

By the aid of this explanation I am making pretty progress: I step out of the determinants of infinity — and become comic. Not in the eyes of everyone, to be sure, for there are several poets in whose eyes I still am a hero. Verily, one would hardly suppose that an eternal and righteous God had discovered the ethical, but that a theatrical tailor had bunglingly patched something together. And this is the standard which is applied even by poets to their heroes — for the sake of showing that they themselves are heroes. But Scribe is the smartest of them all. In his works one reads or hears lines which bring to confusion the whole of existence, as if comedy were not played before men, even before madmen, but before "distracted June-bugs," and yet these lines are so trippingly composed in a conversational tone that it all seems a matter of course. A married woman is depicted and by the author is regarded as both sensible and worthy, as one in fact who champions the good cause, a case of true love between a young girl who is under her protection and a young man who has had recourse to her on this account. I do not recall the lady's name, so we may call her Madam Scribe. So then to the wooing swain she said, "Have you reflected that the girl has no fortune?"

"Yes, I have considered that."

"She has only a dowry of 20,000 francs."

"I know it."

"And yet you are ready to keep your word!"

"Yes."

"Truly, this heroic courage captivates me completely in your favor." What a satirist Scribe is without knowing it. I thought I was with Master Jackel. The young swain is brought under a brilliant illumination: he gets the girl and 20,000 francs — and becomes a hero. But such a hero is as comic as a tailor's child named Casear Alexander Bonaparte Appleclump; and a poet who nominates such heroes seems to me as foolish as the tailor who had his babe thus baptized.

However, it is my duty to do everything that might seem to be serviceable, whether or no it is profitable to her as a matter of fact. What I have sought to do hitherto has proved futile. If she had been a religious personality in the proper sense, that would have been dreadful for me. But I have not sought counsel from flesh and blood.

My common sense is furious as it shudders at the motley, that is, at becoming a hero à la Scribe. But so much for that. I am thinking of her, I behold her in convalescence, I behold the possibility of a happy issue. Well, I submit to the discipline. Truly this girl is designed for my humiliation. Though no one understands this, though few would understand it if I were to tell of it, I understand it, understand it excellently.

When Pericles' legitimate children were alive he promulgated a law that no one might be accounted an Athenian citizen who was not born of parents who were both Athenians. Many suffered by reason of this law. Then came the pest and all of Pericles' children died. His grief was so great that when he stepped forward to lay a wreath upon the head of the last he burst into tears before the eyes of all, a thing which had never before been seen. He had only illegitimate children left, so Pericles urged that the law be rescinded. It is harrowing: Pericles weeps — and Pericles does one thing one day and the opposite thing the next. But it is affecting to read Plutarch: he says that the Athenians indulged his desire; they believed that the gods had wreaked vengeance upon him, and that men therefore ought to treat him indulgently.

Pericles was a great man, he could keep a resolution; he never went into society after he had resolved to devote himself to the service of the State. It is easy for me in this comparison to feel my lowliness; but would that I might be sensible of the indulgence which indulges me by letting me comprehend that I ought to misrepresent my existence! But have I not constantly misrepresented it? True, but this misrepresentation was such that, if she took it into consideration, it might produce something great in her. This misrepresentation, whatever it may effect, will not be an aid to greatness. And she honored the first method far more highly than this.

April 30. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. She does not any longer foam over in the expression of her devotion. Perhaps the whole thing was a transition. But I have seen that terrifying tableau, and I shall never forget it.

My melancholy has triumphed after all.

May 1. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. Is it possible? She was provoked by an inattention on my part. I do not deny that it was an inattention. She almost challenges me. Now or never. It is well that the word separation came up between us in that little altercatio. It always makes it easier to bring the word out again.

I will not run away from the thing. It is not to have good days I would be separated from her, but because I cannot do otherwise. If I cause her pain, I cannot, I dare not, exempt myself from the sight. I wish to get through with the thing as soon as possible, I believe that this is best for her. However, I also am willing to do differently and shall show respect for every argument.

At this moment she is the stronger. So now the matter is started. My sentence upon her is brief; I love her, I have never loved any other, and will not. I desire to stop with this and not go farther — so I venture to say this, but yet I have strength to get me a new love. My fault is that I ventured in where I do not belong. What I have made of myself with all my passion proves to be a delusion, but now I cannot make myself over again. She does not understand me, nor I her. From the first time I saw her and while she was my object in the form of hope I could imagine her dead without losing my composure. I should have felt pain, perhaps all my life long, but eternity would promptly have been at hand, and for me eternity is the highest. Only thus can I understand that people love one another. In the consciousness of eternity, in the infinite, each of the partners is free, and this freedom they both possess while they love one another. This higher existence does not concern her at all. Is then this relationship of ours a foundation for a marriage? Is a husband then a pasha with three horsetails? By such a union I become unhappy, I feel apprehensive with regard to my deepest existence. If now I could, if I were morally compelled to go through with this, well then, what further, what of her happiness for which I am to risk all this? Am I then to stake everything upon a fond illusion? If only anyone could assure me that she would be happy — but to be in an illusion, is that to be happy? But if once she has given herself up, I have the responsibility.

That these are premises for a life sentence it is easy to see. Whether it applies to two or to one, I dare not say; the sentence upon me is the more certain. But is it not then unreasonable to make two unhappy when one is enough? Yes, it would be all right if only I could see how it is to be understood that I can make her happy.

May 2. Midnight.

BUT does not my soul conceal a secret wrath against her? I do not deny it. I have no liking for this direct expression of feeling. Let one keep silent and act within oneself. I do not like to talk about dying of love. And if the speaker, without any womanly resignation, does not hesitate to place upon the conscience of a melancholy man the burden of murder, as if this were faithfulness, genuine faithfulness which outdoes Charlotte Stiegliz, who indeed took her own life, but because she felt that she was a burden and had a womanly sense of the situation; I do not deny that, if it were another person who did it, I should require existence to let us have a view of the case as a false alarm, it would satisfy my wrath (if it were another person) to have it publicly acknowledged that these strong words and noble oaths are neither more nor less than a bad attack of belching (with reverence be it said), a little fit of the hiccups, occasioned perhaps by a surfeit of novel-reading, that these death-thoughts are dreams, not such as Shakespeare's Juliet has, but as Greta has in Wessel's comedy after eating peas. I should require this of existence because what I myself eternally respect is not to be made ridiculous, and he who truly and seriously respects it is not to be made ridiculous because a girl mimics the same words.

I am bound by no oath, on the contrary I am set at liberty, and that upon a condition very unusual, by the fact that I am a scoundrel, for usually such a person is put in confinement. I uttered not a word about death when the dread of death pierced my soul, and I still am of the same opinion, that if I actually die, I have no need to say it, I have not invited anyone to view me as a melodramatic hero. This, however, has little to do with the case, if only I might in myself be found faithful. For whether a man has appearances in his favor or appearances against him, time is and remains a dangerous enemy. Impulses from without help only for a little while, and in the end this is deceptive. If a man is to hold out, it must be by his own strength, and not even this avails if his religiousness does not day by day suck eternity into the temporal resolution. Every man who truly has remained faithful must therefore thank God for it. This is the sharpest, the most difficult perhaps, but also the most inspiring discrimination, that namely which determines what a man properly can say that he has to thank God for and nobody else. To have appearances against one always helps to illuminate this distinction; but everyone makes it, as language itself does, the only question is how. It is this "how," not new phrases, terms and expressions, which makes the thing clear. — Yesterday I saw a drunken woman on the street; she fell down, the boys laughed at her, then she got up again without anybody's help and said, "I am woman enough to get up by myself; but that I thank God for, and nobody else — no, nobody else!" When this distinction concerns a man absolutely there is something humiliating for him in the fact that, so far from making new discoveries, a drunken woman says the same thing. And yet there is something indescribably joyful and touching in the fact that even a drunken woman says the same thing. How it is said is every man's responsibility; but I wish only to lead my life where every man can lead his — if he will.

A life which would labor for the idea I can understand; apart from that it is impossible for me to sympathize essentially with anyone, be he happy or unhappy.

This does not hold good with respect to her. No renunciation of the idea has yet taken place, and therefore I abhor any thought of this in connection with her as an affront to her. If it takes place, I crave only the indulgence that I may be able to refrain from thinking of it. What is death? Only a little halt on the path one has definitely chosen, if one has remained faithful to the idea. But a rupture with the idea signifies that one is taking a wrong direction.

May 4. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. Twice already in two days I have introduced that terrible word in the course of conversation. There is a great difference between the displacement of a warship in the ocean and a nutshell, and this difference is outwardly visible. It is not the same with words. The very same word may imply even greater differences, and yet the word is the same. This word has not yet been uttered between us with pathos, but it recurs again and again, in connection with various topics, in order to explore the feeling it evokes. — From what I have observed till now I might almost be tempted to believe that the thing will be got over more gently than I dared to hope.

As for my part, I have assumed the responsibility for this step. As I regard it, this means that I am making another person unhappy. I cannot get off more cheaply when I act on my own responsibility. The issue may show that in reality I estimated my responsibility at too high a figure. But thus it is I have resolved to act. I have pictured to myself the worst, so reality cannot terrify me. What I suffer within my own mind where everything is in confusion and perturbation, what I suffer from the thought of her pain, from the thought that I shall never overcome this impression, since my whole structure has been made to totter, since my view of life, of myself, of my relation to the idea has failed to pass muster, and I never can erect any new structure without being reminded of her and of my responsibility — this is my share in this, the lion's share, or rather the sorrow is so great that there remains more than enough for us both.

May 5. Midnight.

A SCHOOL EXERCISE

PERIANDER was a son of Kypselus of the Heraclidian race, and he succeeded his father as tyrant of Corinth. It is said of him that he always talked like a wise man and constantly acted like a maniac. It is very strange, and a continuation, as it were, of the madness of Periander, that he who characterized him by this clever saying did not himself know how significant it was. The rather shallow author who vouches for it introduces in his simplicity the wise observation in the following way: "It is very extraordinary that the Greeks could have reckoned among the wise men such a fool as Periander." But a fool (MM fat — such is the moralizing author's term) Periander was not. It would have been different if he had said that there was another Periander, Periander of Ambracia," with whom possibly he was confused, or that there were only five wise men, or that historians had rather discordant notions, etc. So the gods understood the saying about Periander better, for in their wrath they so led him through life that they brought down the wise words as a mockery upon the head of the tyrant, who by his deeds brought his own words to shame.

When he became tyrant he distinguished himself by leniency, by justice towards the lowly, by wisdom among people of understanding. He kept his word and gave to the gods the statue he had promised, but it was paid for by women's jewels. Bold were his undertakings, and this was his saying: "Diligence accomplishes all things."

But beneath the leniency smouldered the fire of passion, and the word of wisdom concealed, until the moment arrived, the madness of his actions; and the bold undertakings gave proof of powers which remained the same in the transformed man. For Periander was transformed. He did not become another man, but he became two men, who could not be contained in the one man. These two were the wise man and the tyrant. That is to say, he became a monster. The occasion of his transformation is variously related. But this is certain, that it was only an occasion, for otherwise we cannot understand how he could be so changed. However, it is related that he had lived in criminal relations with his mother Gratia — surely before he had yet heard his own fine saying: "Do not that which you have to keep secret."

And this is a saying of Periander's: "It is better to be feared than to be lamented." He acted in accordance with this saying. He was the first who maintained a bodyguard and altered the government as the tyranny required, and ruled as tyrant over bondsmen, himself bound by the power he could not get rid of; for he himself said: "It is just as dangerous for a tyrant to lay down his command as to be deprived of it." He also got out of this difficulty by a clever device which subsequently will be described, and not even death subjected him to revenge — his name was inscribed upon an empty tomb.

That this must be, Periander understood better than anyone, for he said: “Ill gain is father of a bad bargain.”

“A tyrant,” said he, “must have good will as a bodyguard, and not armed soldiers.” Therefore the tyrant Periander was never secure, and the only refuge he found safe enough in death was an empty tomb in which he did not lie. This thought would have been expressed in a way evident to all if upon the empty tomb had been put the following inscription: Here RESTS a tyrant. The Greeks, however, did not do this. More placable, they permitted him in death to find peace in the motherly bosom of his native earth, and wrote upon the empty grave words which sound more beautiful in verse, but mean substantially this: Here Corinth, his native land, holds hidden in its bosom Periander the rich and wise. But this is untrue inasmuch as he does not lie there. A Greek writer composed another inscription, intended rather for the beholder, that the inscription might remind him “not to grieve because one never attains one’s wish, but to accept with joy the dispensation of the gods, reflecting that the spirit of the wise Periander was quenched in despondency because he was unable to accomplish what he would.”

This must suffice concerning his end, which teaches posterity about the wrath of the gods what Periander did not learn from it. The narrative recurs again to the occasion which led to the madness of Periander, which from that moment increased year by year to such a degree that he might have applied truly to himself a saying which, so it is said, a desperate man thousands of years later placed upon his escutcheon: “The more lost, the less repentant.”

As for the occasion, we will not attempt to decide whether it was that a rumor circulated about his criminal relations with his mother, so that he was mortified that people knew he “had done what one dared not mention”; or whether the occasion was an enigmatic response from his friend

Thrasybolos, tyrant of Miletus, who indicated by sign language which, though not understood by the messenger (like the message of Tarquinius to his son) was well understood by Periander as a hint for the guidance of a tyrant; or finally whether the occasion was despair at having killed with a kick his beloved wife Lyside to whom he had given the name of Melissa. This we cannot decide. Everyone of these occurrences by itself would be sufficient: the ignominy of dishonor for the proud prince; the temptation of the significant enigma for the ambitious man; the torture of guilt for the unhappy lover. In union they would little by little have the effect that wickedness altered the understanding of the wise man, and exasperation deluded the soul of the ruler.

But when Periander was altered his fortune changed too. The proud saying, that it was better to be feared than to be lamented, fell upon his own head, upon his life of despair, and fell upon him in death. For he was lamented. It was lamentable even that he had uttered such a word, lamentable that the gods, who are the stronger, worked against him, whereas the deeper he sank in perdition, the less he understood in penitence their anger.

Melissa was a daughter of Prokles, tyrant in Epidauros. When the mother was slain, her two sons, Kypselos and Lykophron, the one seventeen years old and the other eighteen, fled to their maternal grandfather in Epidauros. There they remained some time, and when they returned to Corinth Prokles took leave of them by saying, “Do you know, children, who it is that killed your mother?” Upon Kypselos this saying made no impression, but Lykophron became silent. On returning to the paternal house he never deigned to reply to his father. At that Periander became exasperated and drove him away — and then learned (when by many questions he succeeded in prodding the memory of Kypselos) what it was Lykophron concealed under his silence. His wrath now pursued the outcast, and he commanded that no one might espouse the cause of the persecuted fugitive, who went from house to house until finally some friends took him in. Then Periander had it proclaimed that whoever offered hospitality to Lykophron or even spoke to him should die. Now no one dared have anything to do with him, so that he must perish of hunger and wretchedness. Periander himself was moved and went to him when for four days and nights he had had neither meat nor drink. He invited him to be ruler in Corinth and lord of all his treasures, since he had now learned well what it is to defy his father. But Lykophron answered nothing. Finally he said, "Thou thyself art deserving of death, for thou hast transgressed thine own commandment and spoken to me." Exasperated by this, Periander banished him to Corcyra, and his wrath was turned against Prokles, whom he vanquished, took captive and deprived of Epidauros.

Periander had now become an old man. Weary of power, he sought to lay it down. But, as he had said, "It is just as dangerous to lay down a tyranny as to be deprived of it," and from the tyrant one learns that it is also difficult to get rid of it. Kypselos was unfitted to rule, upon him not even the saying of Prokles had made an impression. So Lykophron was to succeed to the power. Periander sent a messenger to him, but to no effect. Finally he sent his daughter, that the obedient might persuade the disobedient and by her mild temper lead the erring one back to reverence for his father. But he remained in Corcyra. Then finally they decided to treat with one another, not as a father and son treat with one another in love, but like mortal enemies. They decided to exchange residences. Periander was to dwell in Corcyra and Lykophron was to be ruler in Corinth. Periander was about to start upon the journey, but the people of Corcyra had such a horror of him, and understood so well the intolerant spirit of the father and the son that they resolved to murder Lykophron, for they hoped that then Periander would not come. They did so, but by this they were not saved from Periander, who ordered three hundred of their children to be carried away and violated. But the gods prevented this, and Periander took it so to heart that he was unable to avenge his son that he resolved to put an end to himself. He summoned two young men and showed them a secret passage. Thereupon he commanded them to meet there the following day and slay the first man they encountered, burying him immediately. When these had gone he had five others summoned and gave the same order, namely, that they were to wait at the passage and when they saw two young men they were to murder them and bury them at once. Then he had twice that number summoned and ordered them in the same way to slay the five whom they would meet and bury them on the spot where they were cut down. Then came Periander himself at the hour appointed and was murdered.

May 6. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. It goes better and better. The word is acquiring more and more pathetic significance for us. She seems calm. God grant that she may be so. If only a little earlier I had understood myself as I now do! When that little altercatio broke out, that would have been the moment for it. Being egged on, she herself perhaps would have broken the engagement and have suffered nothing.

My soul is weighed down, my mind is oppressed, my hope is like a lifeboat with too many people in it on a tempestuous sea.

But he who has another to be concerned about finds no time to feel his own pain, and the dreadful terrors of imagination greatly outweigh those of reality. The incongruity between us shows itself again here and does her a new injustice. Her actual pain, though she feel it never so acutely, her lamentable outcry, though it were never so violent, is nevertheless weak in contrast with the inventiveness of my fantasy, even though I see nothing.

May 7. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. She does not reach a decision suddenly. And suddenness perhaps would be the most dangerous thing for her. The practice has got along so far that it is almost like a dress rehearsal. If it should come off as well in actuality, I demand nothing more, although in another sense it will be a bit inexplicable to me.

For my part, I have a feeling of homesickness for myself. It is distracting to have imagination and reality so much at odds. The distress my imagination causes me is dreadful. What if, in a way as tragic as it is comic, I should again find reality easier! Oh that I might be permitted to retain my imaginations! With them I am accustomed to wrestle.

Yet it comforts me to be eyewitness to everything. Even though she were to die, I want to be an eyewitness to it. Reality, after all, is not the torture possibility is.

May 8. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. The same situation repeated, the decision as near as it can be in a rehearsal — yet it is a rehearsal which is not without passion on her part. She seems, however, to understand that what was too grave a matter for jest must be serious. She is without any vehemence. That is the good part of it. It must come about today.

When the merchant stands at the extremest point of the harbor and sees his ship with its rich cargo imperilled by the sea, and resigns himself to the loss, and goes away, saying to himself, “It is thine own fault that thou didst not insure it” — would it be a joy to him perhaps if a sailor were to come running after him, saying, “One can see the ship again, it has not gone down,” and he were to turn around, and the sailor were to take the spyglass to look out there and were to say, “Well, now it is gone again”?

True, she means to me much more than a merchant vessel and its cargo. That the whole affair may mean as little as possible to her is my wish, my most heartfelt wish; but even if she were to receive laughingly the letter which she will receive today, even if she were to regard it as glad tidings that she now is liberated from a burden — would it were so, but even if it were so, it would not help me. What I have experienced in my inward man, the fact that I have stood upon the extremest point of possibility and seen the extremest horror — the consequence of having stood there and seen that sight will pursue me. I have no wish to wound her, if I mean enough to her to be able to wound. I humble myself under the relationship and under my guilt, and thus it is I would part from her. From the rehearsals I believe I have seen enough to know that the horror of reality will be such that I should be shirking something by not beholding it.

I wrote her a letter in these terms:

"In order not to put more often to the test a thing which after all must be done, and which being done will supply the needed strength — let it then be done. Above all, forget him who writes this, forgive a man who, though he may be capable of something, is not capable of making a girl happy.

"To send a silk cord is in the East capital punishment for the receiver; to send a ring is here capital punishment for him who sends it."

Now that it has been done I totter like a drunken man, I can hardly walk, cannot collect myself. Indeed there is nothing to collect. These moments are like a hyphen between two words.

What happens? Great God, she has been in my room while I was out. I find a note composed with the passion of despair, she cannot live without me, it would be her death if I were to leave her, she conjures me for God's sake and for the sake of my salvation, by every pious remembrance which binds me, by the holy name which I rarely take upon my lips, because doubt has prevented me from appropriating it, although for this very cause I have greater reverence for it than anything else.

So then I am married to her! What else does a marriage mean but a religious expression and a religious sanction given to an engagement. The thing is done. There are two powers which bind me and bind me indissolubly: that of God, and that of a dead man with whom there is no disputing. There is a Name which will bind me forever, although all my thought only descries it afar. That too she has laid under sequestration. Wipe out these powers, and I no longer exist; and if I exist, I am bound, and in these thoughts I shall think uninterruptedly of her who has laid these powers under sequestration.

Erotically she is at fault, that is certain. A girl has no right to employ such means. The fact that she employs them shows essentially how little understanding she has of them. I truly would not dare to employ such means. He who employs them against another binds himself just as tight as he would bind another, lest it should ever result that he had used in vain these holy means. But she has unlimited credit on the score of the capital account of my wrong.

But what folly to go up to my room! Someone may get to know that on that day she was in my room, and perhaps does not know that I was not at home. So perhaps her honor is now compromised. And I who have been so vigilant lest any indignity of the sort might dare to approach her! It is hard enough that it should appear as if I rejected her. I should be only too glad to have it appear that she rejected me. The terror of responsibility cheapens considerably the direct erotic sufferings.

And where did she go when she left my room? Perhaps she ran away in a delirium of despair at not being good enough. Good enough! That, I believe, is the only thing that is not in question. O death, who gave thee permission to exact usury? Art thou not a worse usurer than the most bloodthirsty Jew, worse than the most bloodless miser, when thou dost but threaten, or but torture one by the fear of death?

So then the terminus for our separation is postponed — if for no other reason, because her honor is involved, and because the whole thing has assumed a dreadful form: I have a human life upon my conscience, and an eternal responsibility. But what is to be my relation to her? A religious point of unity is nonsense. That we two should sorrow in common is crazy, seeing that I am the guilty one, and she the sufferer. What an absurdity to have to be at one and the same time father-confessor and a murderer, to have to be the one who crushes and the one who compassionately raises up!

No! She shall not fail to see me, I have no mind to run away from anything. If she has foolishly fixed me for life in this relationship, fastened me by a bond which she is able to bind but cannot loose, it may go ill with her, I shall manage to hold out. However, it does not follow from this that she is to become mine and I hers; but if she believes she can make some impression upon me, if she has an argument which I perhaps have not considered, I do not shirk anything.

We are separated, but I shall do what a man can to help her. So take hold of me with all thy might, thou mighty power, thou counterfeiter, who art truth's changeling, but not to be distinguished from it in deceit. Give me strength for two months — that is the period, not a day more; but for that time, punctually and conscientiously, give me strength. Transform all anguish in my breast to nonsense upon my lips, all pathos to twaddle when it comes to expression. Take away, take it away, conceal every look, every feeling, every hint of a feeling, which might please her, hide it so surely that no truth may glimmer through the deceit. Refashion me, let me, when I sit by her, sit like a nodding Chinese idol, with a senseless smile upon my lips, encompassed by the incense fumes of noodledom.

I went to see her. She was calmer than I had expected. — A pair of secret lovers have need of caution to conceal their mutual understanding. We are openly lovers, and yet in this case too caution is needed to conceal our understanding.

So tomorrow begins the last struggle, the period of horror. I have of her no impression at all. Religion, which has always preoccupied me, has preoccupied my thought to desperation, and will preoccupy me as long as I am able to think, she has won over to her side. Perhaps it was a wild combat in which she knew not what means to employ, and so hit upon this. Be that as it may, I am bound to treat it with respect. What I shall venture to do now is to wrench myself from her if possible, to confuse her picture of me to sheer nonsense, and bewilder her thoroughly. Every counter-argument shall be treated with respect. I know well enough what these arguments will be. All sympathy for me must be destroyed, and at the same time she must be run to a standstill by reflection. In all human probability, she will experience with me the worst suffering, and humanly speaking she will not be disposed to begin the thing over again the moment I leave her. — One becomes almost calm when it is a question of action, though it be the most desperate thing one proposes to do, and that in the most difficult form, namely, in the form of time and the long run. But if I cannot be calm, I might as well not begin such a work.

May 8. Midnight.

Now all is quiet, not in the sense in which it holds that quiet is attained by a passion which is stronger than the noisiest outbursts. No, it is quiet in the sense of the dealer when he says that corn is quiet, there is no demand; quiet in the sense in which one speaks of a village as quiet, because it is uneventful and no event is to be expected, where nevertheless the usual things occur, the cocks crow on the dunghills, the ducks splash in the pond, and the midday smoke rises from the chimneys, and Morten Frandsen hurries home, and all is in movement until the peasant shuts his door and looks out into the quiet night, for till then there was no quiet. Quiet, not in the romantic sense in which one uses the word in speaking of a house which by its close reserve suggests some mystery, but as one uses it in the homely sense of a house where the tranquil members of the family are severally employed about their own affairs, and where everything occurs as it is wont to occur; quiet as one uses the word with regard to “the quiet of the land,” who all the week long attend to their business, cast up their accounts, shut their shops, and on Sundays go to church.

The more I think upon this quiet, the more my being is transformed. The hope of any passionate decision has been given up, the whole affair will pass off quietly. But to me this quiet, this security, appears like the slyest subterfuge of existence. Ah, when quiet is an endless nothingness, and precisely as such is the form of possibility for an infinite content, then, then indeed I love it, for then it is the element in which spirit lives, and is of richer content than any change of dynasties or any world events. Therefore I love thee, thou quiet among the graves, for the dead sleep there, and yet this quiet is the form for the eternal consciousness of their works! Therefore I love thee, thou quiet of the night, when the inmost character of nature betrays itself more clearly than when it loudly proclaims itself in the life and movement of all things! Therefore I love thee, thou quiet of the hour of spiritual exercise here in my chamber, where no sound and no human voice sets limits to the infinity of thought and of the thoughts, to which Petrarch’s words apply: “The sea has not so many creatures in its waves, never did the night behold so many stars in the vault of heaven, there dwell not so many birds in the forest, nor are there so many blades of grass in the field and meadow, as every night my heart has thoughts!” Therefore I love thee, thou solemn quiet before the battle, whether it be the quiet of prayers which are not uttered aloud, whether it be the watchword which is whispered, thy quiet signifies more than the tumult of battle! Therefore I love thee with shuddering, thou quiet of the desert; thou art more terrible than all that happens or has happened! Therefore I love thee, thou quiet of loneliness, rather than all that is multifarious, because thou art infinite!

But this vegetating quietness, which is like a spell cast upon human life, where time comes and goes, and is filled with something, so that there is no sense of lack, for all rivers run into the sea, and yet cannot fill the boundless sea, but this and that can for men fill up their time — this is foreign to my soul. And yet it is this I must try to become familiar with. Down there in the village dwells pretty Mary. She too had a love affair; now the pain is past, now the musician scrapes the violin, and Mary treads the dance with a new lover. No! No! That brings my whole being to confusion! Let infinity separate us; my hope was that eternity would unite us. Come, death, and preserve her for eternity; come, madness, and put all aside for the time being, till eternity removes the seal imposed by the probate court; come, hate, with thine infinite passion; come, proud distinction, with thy withering wreath; come, godly fear, with thine imperishable blessedness; come one of you and take her whom I cannot take — but not this, not the pottering triviality of the temporal. — If this comes to pass, then I deceive her, then I must deceive her. I steal her picture as my imagination loves to represent it, I shall gaze upon it, but it shall not remind me of her, as hitherto it did when I decided to forego the anesthetic relief of remembrance, for now it is only remembrance.

Alas, when we separated my understanding taught me that I must be prepared, yea, that I might venture to expect it. Now — now it seems to me so difficult, if this were to occur.

However, will it actually occur? I know not. But this I know, that I owe it to her to adapt myself to anything that is possible for me. And this is possible, to give her, or seek to present (and for me the decisive thing is not whether in all human probability I shall accomplish anything), a more lenient interpretation of my conduct, an interpretation which to me is more distasteful than the bold lie I employed when I hoped that in an infinite sense it would be advantageous to her.

May 12. Midnight.

TODAY I saw her. It was at noon, just outside King's Garden. She was coming out, and I was walking on the farther side of the street, directly opposite. It really was my intention when I started out from home to go into the garden; if such had not been my intention, I would not have gone a step out of my way to encounter her. But this strictness is not much more than a reminiscence of a bygone method, when with ascetic abstinence from every even the remotest interference, and with selftorturing cruelty, I recognized infinity in her. Accordingly I had never occasion to take advantage of the favor of a chance encounter. So we met. She had seen me a little in advance and so was prepared, but possibly also in some agitation. What a task for the observer! To have half a minute to see — to see what was to be the subject of reflection for many hours! And with that to have to look out for oneself and be mindful to take into account what impression the sight of me might make. A movement passed over her face — was it an indication of suppressed pain, or was it the transition to a smile? I have never known a girl, or indeed any person, in whom the preliminaries to weeping and laughter were so exactly alike as in her. And in this case the contraries were not so strongly pronounced; for a suppressed laughter can be observed in the movements of the muscles of the neck, and suppressed weeping by the heaving of the bosom, but here the dubious movements lay between contrasts less extreme, and moreover there was no time to look. The movement might have been accounted for by the fact that she gasped for breath, in such a way, however, that I did not see her as she opened her mouth, but as she closed it. — One could lose one's wits by wanting to torture anything out of such an impression, and yet that is what I want to do. When one hears the church clock and counts the strokes, it does not follow that one knows what the hour is, for on account of the transmission of the sound to a distance one may fail to hear the first strokes, and so be in error at the beginning of the count.

She had the appearance of being in even vigorous health — a bit pale, but I dare never ascribe to this pallor essential significance, for the sight of me might produce it. But I dare to rejoice at her wholesome appearance — or might it be a false appearance, that the air has given her the semblance of health? What can a hasty doctor say? A hasty doctor I am not, properly speaking, it is not I that pass hastily through the patient's room, it is the patient who runs past me so hastily; and a doctor 1 am not, rather it is I that am the patient.

May 15. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. I have often laughed at a lover of whom it was told me that he had another coat which he kept hung in his lady's house, which he put on when he visited her, in order not to wear out the new coat. Now I no longer laugh at it. I too have another coat, not hanging in her apartment, but outside in the corridor. There I put it on and discard every expression of my love, every hint of my sympathy, every tempting little wish, which, if our relationship were secure, would be fain to delight her with insignificant expressions of love. When I have the coat on, then begins a continual twaddle, beating about the bush, constantly mixing up the physical and the moral, confounding all things with one another, constantly chatting about our engagement, and our engagement, and things like that.

It is an agonizing punishment I suffer, as agonizing as if the scene were in Tartarus, to have to sit thus making mouths at myself. But so it must be. By this course of action our whole relationship, when the moment comes again to break off, will have no attraction for her, not even the fascination of the dreadful, but she will be sick and tired and disgusted, as one is tired of orange juice because one has taken medicine with it. If later she should be able by herself to bestow ideality upon the relationship, she is quite a different individual than I supposed, and is far from standing in need of me.

May 16. Midnight.

As I have said, the whole thing is likely to pass off quietly. Yesterday and the day before I had a talk with my friend, who is very well informed, and who tortures me in a spirit of true friendship, though at the same time he obliges me with all sorts of information, without referring to her except under fictitious names. And his friendship is unchanged. First he wanted to distress me with the suggestion of mortal danger to her, now he pipes a different tune, he would if possible incite me by stirring up in me a little jealousy — but then she must be in a pretty good state of health. I possess in this man an incalculable advantage. He it is I now shall make use of. Today the comedy began. As he sat talking, in the midst of his narrative, I arose, embraced him heartily and said with pathos, “Now I understand you. Oh, what a fool I am that I did not recognize in you a friend! Do not deny it, you are speaking of her, of her whom, alas, I made unhappy, and whom yet I loved, to whom many a time I have wished to return, but I cannot, no, I cannot; honestly speaking, my pride has too much power over me.” My friend was rather taken aback. It must be pretty embarrassing when one is sitting in friendly converse, and with artless Christian malice would torment a man, then to be folded in friendship’s embrace. As if a robber who met a traveller on a remote path and was just on the point of falling upon his prey, were to feel himself tenderly embraced and were to hear these affecting words: “O kindly fate, which hast sent me a guide when I had gone astray; O thou my benefactor, the precious representative of humanity in these lonely places,” etc. It might well be possible that the robber would fall into embarrassment. So at least did my friend. I know very well that she must occasionally seek information about me. This I do not know from him, but because there is another who has been very nimble in getting news to carry to her; and my friend stands much closer to her.

He became now in a way my friend. It goes without saying, however, that I do not trust him beyond the threshold. On the other hand, it suits him well to believe that he has me in his power, and that I am still so much concerned about her that he can find pleasure in torturing me. First I wanted with his help to open a correspondence with her. I declared in the most dramatic manner that I did not dare to see her and therefore must write. That I have seen her no one knows, and it would hardly occur to her to say it. This plan, however, was rejected. Then he promised to see to it that there should come into her hands several letters which I am to write to a third person. As a precaution I have used three sorts of ink, so that there might be a little difference in the color, since the dates are different.

So with combined forces the thing is going ahead. He has no objection to her marrying again, because he believes this will irritate me, and he perceives that I possibly may be of some help to him in this direction.

An author (I forget who it is) has said that honesty is the most durable thing — only not with reference to pleasing women. I really believe too that truth does not make a woman happy; I would not say by any means that a lie does, but some sort of little untruth. The jealousy he is scheming for is my affair. Non enim est in carendo dificultas, nisi quum est in habendo cupiditas, says Augustine. Well, it is true that I desired her, yes, that I desire her; but the fact that there was no external impediment shows that there was something higher which constrains my wish. This higher thing is the idea. Along with that I desire her... infinitely; without that, I hold to that which is higher than either of us. My preoccupation is therefore a different one, that regarded essentially (for regarded from the point of view of actuality and chance it may be that I accomplish nothing) I with these letters am writing her a letter of separation which puts infinity between us, that with these letters, regarded essentially, I have contributed my part (verily not with a sympathetic wish) to acquire some lightness in the life which heavily distresses me.

BY this time she has presumably received my letters. The interpretation of the relationship does not fail to mention repentance and contrition. This "accommodation" is what distresses me most. In the case of every other deceit I have had at all events an ardent spirit, because the reason for it and the impulse to it was the hope that she would collect herself in an infinite sense. This time I am in low spirits, and yet this time perhaps I shall exert a much greater influence over her than by all I labored to do when by tearing myself from her I became more tightly bound to her. My repentance and contrition are of course expatiated upon in many words, and of course the upshot of the many words is that now it cannot be undone; I repent of the past, I wish to undo it, but I cannot, no, I cannot, but I have a will to do it if only my pride would let me, otherwise I would, etc. Repentance used to be recognized by the fact that it acts. In our age it is perhaps less exposed to such misapprehension. I do not believe that either Young, or Talleyrand, or a more recent writer, are right in saying of language that its purpose is to conceal thought, for I believe that its purpose is to assist and confirm people in refraining from action. What in my eyes is nonsense will perhaps produce a great effect, and perhaps the majority of my more intimate acquaintances will say, if they read these letters, "Well, now at last we have understood him."

It is pretty hard. One would fain enjoy the reputation of not being publicly regarded as a Bedlamite. To that in fact I too attain. I really believe that whatever I might say, if only it were not the truth or my sincere opinion, I should be regarded even as sagacious, whereas by doing the other thing I should be absolutely bringing about my deportation. If I were to speak thus: “I took this decisive step because I felt myself hampered, because I must have my freedom, since the libido of my desire embraces a world and cannot be satisfied with one girl” — then the chorus responds: “There’s a lot of sense in that. Hail to thee, thou enlightened man!” Were I on the contrary to say, “She was the only one I have loved. Had I not been certain of that when I left her, I should never have had the courage to leave her” — then the chorus cries, “Off with him to the madhouse!” If I were to say, “I was tired of her” — then says the chorus, “There we have something one can understand.” But if I were to say, “Then I do not understand it, for one dare not denounce a relationship of duty because one is tired of it” — the cry then is, “He is mad!” If I were to say, as the most recent construction would, “I repent it, I would fain undo it, but I cannot, no, I cannot, my pride will not permit it, no, I cannot” — then the judgment of the chorus is, “He is just like the rest of us, and like the heroes in French poetry.” If on the contrary I were to say, that nothing, nothing could so satisfy my pride as to undo it, that nothing, nothing would so assuage the cold fire of revenge which demands redress — then the response is, “He is delirious, don’t listen to him. Away with him to the madhouse!”

Mundus vult decipi — there could hardly be a more precise description of my relation to the environment which I may call my world. I believe too that in a broader sense it is the best thing that has been said about the world. The speculative philosophers therefore should not rack their brains to fathom what it is the age requires, for from of yore this has always been the same, namely, to be led by the nose. If only one utters some nonsense and drinks to the health of mankind en masse, one becomes, like Peer Degn, loved and respected by the whole community. It is not different now, and everyone who sets himself down before the eyes of all to ponder how he might discover what the age requires, has substantially discovered it already. In that respect everybody can serve the age, whether it be understood as a whole nation, as humanity in general, as all the generations to come, or as a smaller group of contemporaries. I serve the sympathetic by being a scoundrel. There is no doubt that I satisfy their requirement. I myself profit by it too, and in a certain sense I find this public estimation quite desirable. To be a paragon of virtue, the normal type of intelligent man, is for one thing very embarrassing, and for another thing... very problematical. On the other hand, I am not persecuted either. That too is desirable, lest I should draw a false inference and think well of myself because I was persecuted in the world.

With regard to other people I have never hesitated to follow my guardian angel by yielding to a certain innate bashfulness about the good that is in me, and a rather melancholy distrust of myself — that is to say, by deceiving in such a way that perhaps after all I am always a little better than I seem. I have never been able to understand it in any other way but that every man is essentially thrown back upon himself, and that apart from this there is either vicarious authority such as that of an Apostle (the dialectic definition of which I cannot comprehend, though in reverence for that which has been handed down to me as sacred I refrain from drawing any conclusion from my non-knowledge)... or else mere patter. It is perfectly true that he who cannot shave himself may very well sit down and employ others to accommodate his hair and beard; but in the world of spirit this is nonsense. Nevertheless it is esteemed a part of seriousness to be straightway at hand to exert an influence upon others, without for this wanting to be an Apostle (how humble!) — and without being able for all that to define in what way one differs from or resembles such a figure (how senseless!). Everybody wants to work for others. This is the conventional theme of the patriotic or moral address, where it is easier to understand; but it is also a conventional feature of the rhetorical form of the religious address. I do not doubt that it is found in the printed instructions for preachers, and one hears it often enough, except when one listens to an individual who has himself been tried by experience and knows how to speak, and knows whereof to speak. If the sermon is about preparing the way of the Lord, the first topic has to do with the duty of every Christian to do his part in spreading Christianity— “not only we priests, but also everybody,” etc. That is charmant. “Not only we priests.” Here one feels at once the lack of middle terms to determine whether a priest is an Apostle, and if not, how he differs from such a figure, and in what respects he is like him. The ecclesiastical points of dispute about ordination increase the difficulty, and the principal middle term is thrust into the background by decisions within the undecided. So then, “not only we priests.” That to which “not only” refers is not given, and then follows the apodosis with all the seriousness of exhortation: “Give heed, my dear hearers, to what I say: it is not only I and we priests who should labor thus, but you should all labor thus!” How? Yes, this is the only thing that is not made clear in this serious address — if that can be called serious which is not serious in its thought-content. Now the first topic is finished; the priest wipes off the sweat, and the hearers do likewise, at the mere thought that they have thus become missionaries. The orator begins again. One hopes to get a little more light on the subject; but, lo, the next topic is, that everyone should prepare within himself the way of the Lord. This of course is the way one ought to speak, and upon this point one can construct a whole life-view. One understands that the individual has to do with himself essentially, and that the business of accomplishing something is accidental, cannot be assumed by anyone in advance, and cannot be ascribed to oneself, and only as seen retrospectively in eternity can it be seen as it is, essentially as God’s bounty, and accidentally the deed of the individual. For in fact existence, and providence within it, is something more than the simple sum of all the deeds of individual men. A man must have his absolute thought in mente wherever he fares. When it is lacking, a man is at fault in two ways: he beguiles people into dreams, and he works injustice to the sufferer. For in fact that first topic requires success of every man. It is easy enough to talk about a thing which inexperienced and indolent natures especially like to hear; but it is senseless to require it, because success does not depend upon freedom but is the boon of providence — and suppose now that one were to have ill success. If on the contrary it is understood that the individual has to do essentially with himself, then it will also be understood that he so exists in order that his life, his word, may possibly have significance for others. "Possibly," because in the first place it is the affair of providence, and secondly the power exercised by the example, the teacher, is not direct. At this point then a speaker might begin, inverting the topics, somewhat in this fashion: "Not even I, though it may seem so, can essentially do more than attend to myself. Do not let yourselves be captured by an illusion." But ordinarily the address is planned in exactly the opposite way. One appeals to the example of John the Baptist; but John is not directly a paradigm, he is set apart (αφορισμενος) for a special work, and hence middle terms are needed. Moreover, one must always be cautious in employing world-renowned figures, for these possess a completely rounded character which makes it easy to contemplate them, but as easy to misunderstand. Every figure which is to be employed must in its dialectic structure be clear to thought, otherwise it is merely a jest to propose him as a paradigm.

I have pondered much over this, seeing that I am an existing person, and so must put to use ethically what is said. When one elects to do differently, elects to teach or to learn, but leaves out the crises of realization, one may have much to talk about, I dare say, many words of instruction, and may find tranquillity, I dare say. From what I have thought on this subject I have come to the conclusion that I do a man the most good by deceiving him. The highest truth with respect to my relationship to him is this, that essentially I can do him no good — this is the expression for the deepest yearning of sympathetic pain, which only by living in a mare's nest one can abstain from having an experience of, but is also an expression of the loftiest enthusiasm for the equality of all men. And the most adequate form for this truth is that I deceive him — for otherwise it would be possible for him to make a mistake and learn this truth from me, and by this he would be deceived, that is, by believing that he had learned it from me. I know well that the plurality, were I to initiate them into my doubtful process of thought, would smile at me and reprehend my levity, for the infatuating is taken to be the serious. That cannot disconcert me without making me guilty of an inconsistency, and that cannot come to pass, seeing that I have no desire to confide in anybody, and am not likely to make the mistake of supposing that I ought to go forth to proclaim this parsimonious closeness instead of being close myself. For let man be close, then God alone is openhanded.

I have learned this best, but also in the hardest way, through my relationship to her, in which yearning sympathy constantly desired to make her an exception, and in which I have wished to the point of desperation to be everything for her, until I learned in pain that it is infinitely higher to be nothing for her. It comforts me that in my relationship to her I never fancied that I was a teacher or was called upon to say a few admonishing words. Though the wisest man were to devote six hours a day to a person, and were to devote six more to consider how he might do it best, and were to keep this up for six years, he would be a deceiver, if he ventured to say that essentially he had done him good. And for me at least, this thought is the deepest source of enthusiasm. Language, arts, handicrafts, one man can teach another, but in an ethico-religious sense one man cannot essentially benefit another. Hence it is beautiful and it is uplifting to give expression to this by the extremest effort of deception, for a deception under ethical responsibility is anything but an easy matter, and it is always able to hold its own with the admonishing word. It comforts me now, when all the subsequent things have occurred, that she never stood to me in the relation of pupil, which might have been upsetting to her. What I have uttered I have uttered as if it were to myself I was talking, and I made neither gesticulations nor applications. If she appropriates it, she does it of her own accord, not relying on "his word and gown." It is convenient enough to jump into an omnibus and ride around and say a few admonishing words, there may be something pretty implied in the wish to do it, but it is stupid to be capable of teaching that "a man can do nothing whatever," and then at the same time to be capable of ascribing to a few admonishing words such a prodigious effect. To God is due the thanksgiving of wonder and admiration for the effects. For each man is to look to himself in life, in eternity there will be time to see what God brought out of this. And this applies not only to the conspicuous influence of single individuals, but to the slightest fraction of effect ascribable to the most insignificant man.

So it is I have sought to understand existence. He who has understood it in the same way will surely behave in the same way, and above all will constantly express himself so cautiously, and in the form of deceit, that he may avoid the danger which everybody in our time, down to the most insignificant newspaper reporter, must be aware of, namely, that there are a few men who have conceived the desperate idea that the thing directly uttered is the truth, and that it is their task to sally forth into the world, etc. But to sally forth into the world may well be left to the knights errant; the true seriousness is attentive to every danger, and to this among others, that one may in bona fide become an unreasoning pupil, a thing which is best prevented by employing contradiction as the form of presentation. In my view no one (with exception of such authoritative individuals as the Apostles, whose dialectical position I do not comprehend) has been more serious than he who clad his thought in the form of jest, and who loved so sympathetically his fellow men, and no one who has so profoundly admired the Deity. So let the chroniclers tell of kings who introduced Christianity; my notion is this, that a king can introduce a better breed of sheep, and railways; but Christianity and spirit (ethically understood) not even an emperor need put himself to the trouble of introducing — that is to say, in the essential sense.

A change is now being effected in my relationship to her. Till now I have remained perfectly quiet and respected the infinity in her. Now I come out with an explanation. This I regard as a deceit. In the earlier period the form was deceit, and the content was interest for the infinity in her. Thus my quietness, my silence, my self-effacement, was the form in which deception expressed an infinite interest in her. Now it is different. What I say, I do not mean; but neither do I mean that the form of deceit adequately clothes my real meaning. Whether in reality it influences her, is not to the point. I have to do only with the essential, and the essential point is that this is my intention and purpose. The explanation I give, that I repent but cannot undo what I was at fault in doing, is sheer nonsense. For in case I am unable to allege reasons why I cannot undo it, I ought never to talk about my repenting, least of all allege pride (i.e. that I will not) as the reason, for that simply is making a fool of her. Therefore until now I have never represented myself as repentant, although in fact I am repentant and have repented of entering into that relationship, and I am humiliated by the fact that I cannot undo it, precisely as my pride prompts me to do, since now it is broken by the experience that I, who have had an almost foolhardy conception of what the will can accomplish, must here writhe at the thought of something which I will, and will passionately, but cannot do. Why I cannot (that being something implied in my relation to the idea — until that is changed or I am) it is impossible for me to tell her in such a way that she could understand it; but this precisely is the reason why I have never said to her that I repented. Such was the intention of my conduct. But to repent, and to allege pride as the impediment to the expression of repentance, is lèse-majesté against God. How anybody can understand it and find it plausible, I cannot conceive; but then in turn most people would say the same about my way of regarding it.

Perhaps for the first time I am doing something which I myself regard as senseless. I have done many things which the plurality perhaps would regard as senseless; but that has not disturbed me, since this might also be because the plurality has not understanding enough to think the thing out, nor courage enough to venture out to the extreme positions where I lead my life. I have done many things, too, which I myself have afterwards perceived to be foolish, and although repentance when it makes inspection has no respect for excuses, there is yet a sort of comfort in the fact that when I did the thing I did not know that it was senseless. Unqualified as I am to comprehend such problems as the future of humanity as a whole, or what it is the age requires, I have absolutely collected myself within myself. When the rights of the case seemed to me doubtful, I have been accustomed to pronounce my name aloud to myself and say, “One may die, one may be unfortunate, yet one can preserve sense in one’s life, and faithfulness to the idea.” Now that is no more. And who is at fault for it? Another would perhaps say, “It is she, under whose slipper you still remain.” That, however, I would not say, for I fain would refrain from such senselessness as this, that another is at fault for the fact that I get into a scrape. I will say rather that I myself am at fault, the fault is mine, it lies in my weakness, and the difficulty is that my understanding vouches to me for it that my conduct may be beneficial to her in a finite sense, while my sympathy would prefer to love her in an infinite sense. This relationship has humiliated me, and now, whether she reads my letters or no, whether they have an effect upon her or no, she now triumphs over me in a way which makes me despondent.

May 21. Midnight.

THERE is nothing new under the sun, says Solomon. Well, that may be so, but it is worse when nothing happens at all. By this consideration alone I assure myself of the absurdity of seeking any confidant. Of course if my pain were rich in episodes, in changes of scenery and decoration, it then would be interesting. But my suffering is boring. In fact I am still constantly engaged in expounding this nothing, and the scenery is unalterably the same.

If I were to travel in order to make time move, per mare tristitia fugens per saxa per ignes — but it cannot be done. I must still keep perfectly quiet. A journey, which she would easily get wind of, might possibly upset her and prompt her to entertain an illusion, namely, that I, after a certain length of time in foreign parts, had become changed. But time must be dealt out to her as stingily as possible; and I only wish that a providence would often bring our paths together, for she is the better for seeing me, and so having opportunity to assure herself that I am here and live here unchanged, that I am not sitting in a foreign land — possibly thinking about her and getting homesick. If I were to make a journey, I ought to have gone away long ago, giving out a false report of the duration of my journey, and coming back suddenly. Perhaps it would have occurred to her that this suddenness had something to do with her, until she saw that it had nothing to do with her — that possibly might have been good for her. The time for such a thing has passed.

The clock just now struck one. This disconsolate indication of time! For twelve strokes are many, one notes that time is indicated, and even two is a number to be counted; but one is suggestive of eternity. If there be such a thing as an eternity of punishment, and the unfortunate man who suffers it were to make complaint to someone, how surely one would turn away from him, for not only is he unhappy, his suffering is boring — if it were not boring one might show him sympathy.

For my part I crave nobody’s sympathy. God in heaven is not disgusted by the boring. They say that it is a duty to pray, that it is profitable to pray, that there are three grounds for it, maybe there are even four. I have no intention of taking away from anybody his grounds, he is more than welcome to retain them, if only I may retain the thought of daring to pray, as something, so inspiring that, in a deeper sense than did Plato and Aristotle, one can say that wonder is the beginning of knowledge. With respect to this matter I have no confidence in many arguments and sixteen grounds; perhaps it would be better, with a view to the prosperous classes (for the poor, the unfortunate, the simple classes, have no such difficulty about prayer) if a regulation were introduced making it cost something to get permission to pray — then there might be a run on it. If it is true of earthly love that it seeks privacy, it is even more true of prayer that it prefers loneliness and to be as much hidden as possible, in order that it may neither be disturbed itself, nor annoy others by its emotional character. There is not the least need of having witnesses to it, and they don’t help any. A prince who travels incognito can at any moment put off his incognito; and it seems to me likewise that the outward semblance of the man of prayer is an incognito, which he cannot indeed put off in order to become an object of worldly admiration, but which he can lay aside when in the act of prayer he is raised to the infinite by wondering at God, by wondering at the fact that God is the only one who does not grow tired of listening to a man. And in turn this holy wonder will prevent the man of prayer from reflecting whether he is getting what he prays for. It is not a pretty love affair where one is looking out to see if it pays, and even if he sees that it pays capitally, it is not a happy love affair. Prayer was not invented to bring suit against

God, but it is a favor graciously granted to every man, and which makes him more than a nobleman. But if one understands with wonder, yea, with a wonder which shipwrecks his understanding, that prayer is a favor, then it is apprehended that arguments are not necessary at all, for it is only the doubtful that is recommended by arguments. Every extraneous reflection has eo ipso the effect of nullifying prayer, whether it be a reflection which looks from the corner of the eye to temporal advantage, or a reflection upon the individual himself and his relation to others — as if a man were so serious that he could not pray within and for himself, but must come forward and do the whole congregation good by his intercession and by his example as a man of prayer. Thus there are men also who cannot speak except before a general assembly, and Madame Voltisubito cannot ride unless she hears the whip crack.

Ah, but for her! If she will not in herself understand, but would rather seek temporal consolation! It is hard on a man who has not dissevered his soul in dissolute concern for Tom, Dick and Harry, or for the whole human race, to dare only in loneliness to express his concern for himself, and not to dare to do all that, which to be sure is in a higher sense a mere nothing, but which nevertheless is some assuagement for sympathy.

May 22. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. Laughter, after all, is the best means for exploring. She joins in the laughter, but then she can endure no more, her laugh breaks. So then after all she has no infinity of passion, but has it only to a certain degree. Then I shudder, for I know what is about to come, there will come prayers and tears until again she is weary; but my twaddle has not grown weary, it goes on indefatigably.

To be pricked where the most delicate nerves are located is dreadful, but still more dreadful it is not to dare to change an expression while that is happening, but to have to sit perfectly calm and continue to chat.

Only for ten minutes today was I serious. I propose to behave in the same way every eighth day. I said to her calmly, “Hold up, break it off, thou canst not hold out with me in the long run.” But with that passion flames up most hotly, she declares that, she would prefer all this to not seeing me. This is only a passionate outburst, and its very vehemence indicates to me that my line of action will be conducive to setting her afloat.

May 25. Midnight.

REMEMBER her — I dare not. Had death separated us as it separates lovers, had she broken with me, then I should have dared to remember what was beautiful and lovable, to remember every instant which was a happy one for us. When spring burgeons in youthful vigor I should remember her, when the leaf gives its shade I should repose in the memory of her, in the evening when the summer mists collect I should see her image, by the quiet lake, when the reeds rustle, when the skiff approaches, I should imagine that I was about to meet her, until the monotonous waves would rock me away into remembrance, at the shop of my old pastry cook I should seek a trace of her, and often, often deceive myself by the thought that I was going to her. But I dare not. There is no change of seasons for me, as in me there is no change. Remembrance does not blossom in my hand, it is like a judgment on my head, or like an enigmatic sign the significance of which I do not know. Did Adam dare to remind Eve, did he dare when he beheld thistles and thorns before his feet, did he dare to say to Eve, “No! It was not like this in Eden. Ah, dost thou remember?” Did Adam dare? Still less do I.

May 27. Midnight.

FORGET her? — that is impossible. The whole structure of my life has collapsed. I was melancholy, but in this melancholy I was an enthusiast, and that disconsolate thought of my youth, that I was good for nothing, was perhaps only a form of enthusiasm, because I required an ideality under the weight of which I sank. This secret I wished to keep within myself, and within this secret a glow, which indeed made me unhappy, but also indescribably happy. Early, all too early, I thought I had perceived that the enthusiasm found in the street and in the market is of a kind I should not wish to have part or lot in. So I desired to make my exterior cold and heartless, so as to have no fellowship with an enthusiasm which was deluding or self-deluded. That was a proud idea, such as might occur to a melancholy man. But though people were to cry against me loudly as an egoist, I was not willing that anyone should get the better of me. All this is brought to confusion, I am disarmed. I have been taken prisoner by the appearance I sought to conjure up. I have in fact treated a person shabbily. And although I have a different understanding of it, and although I am certain — as certain as that the sun rises in the east — that whatever I do I shall always have enthusiasm on my side — I cannot make any man understand me.

Providence has taken me captive. The idea I cherished of my existence was a proud one, now I am crushed. I know well enough that I can hide it from others, but I have lost the real pith of my existence, the secure stronghold behind the deceitful appearance, I have lost what I shall never regain, what I myself must prevent myself from regaining, for my pride is still left, but it has had to referre pedem, and it has the task, among other things, of never forgiving myself. Only religiously can I now understand myself before God, in relation to men misunderstanding is the foreign language I speak. I desired to have it in my power to be able to express myself in the common tongue any moment I would, now I cannot.

Ah, blessed is an understanding with God, but the fact that by providence or by my own act I am so surrounded by misunderstanding that I am constantly forced back to the lonely understanding with God has also its peculiar pain. Who would hesitate to choose a confidential relationship?

But my choice is not free. I am aware of freedom in my choice only when I surrender myself to necessity, and in surrendering to it forget it. I cannot say, “To whom should I go but unto Thee,” for I cannot go to any man, since one cannot confide oneself to the intimacy of misunderstanding; I cannot go to any man, for I am a prisoner, and misunderstanding, and misunderstanding, and misunderstanding again, are the iron bars before my window; and I do not elect to go to God, for I am compelled. But then comes the instant of understanding, and then it is blessed again after all that there are iron bars before the windows, for this brings it about that the understanding cannot be a deception, cannot be something traditionally acquired, a result at second hand, and that it cannot be some sort of chatty babbling — for to whom am I to talk?

My idea was to construct my life ethically in my inmost being, and to conceal this inwardness under the form of deceit. Now I have been forced farther back within myself, my life is constructed for me religiously, and so much farther back in inwardness that with difficulty I reach actuality.

Who would ever think of assuming an air of importance directly before the face of God? But my situation is as if God had chosen me, not I God. There is left to me not even the negative expression of being something of importance, namely, that it is I who come to Him. If I will not submit to bearing the smart of necessity, I am annihilated, or have no place to exist except among men in misunderstanding. If I bear the smart of necessity, then there will come about the transformation.

I shall never recover my loss, it may be long enough before I learn to bear it. As I go about amongst men putting my best foot forward, it seems to me as if my lost pride passed me by as if in the look of another I could read that he condemned me as one who had lost pride and honor. Then like a desperate man I could wish to run in among men to grasp my lost shadow, to claim it again, to revenge myself, to console myself with revenge, until I should sink down exhausted. Yea, woe to the woman whose glance might move me in such a way! Upon a woman at least one can take revenge. I know that there are horrible thoughts which may find place in the man who discovers a stone of stumbling in a situation due to nature. How was it that Richard III could overwhelm the woman who was his sworn enemy, and transform her into a lover? And why, I wonder, did he do it? Was it state policy? Can we also ascribe to state policy the scorn with which he reflects upon the facility of victory? Was it to prove to himself that he was fit to be a king, when with the lust of despair he dwells upon his own deformity? No, it was hatred of existence. With the power of spirit he would mock at nature which had made mock of him, he would turn it into ridicule along with its invention of love and of love for the beautiful; he who had been wronged, he the cripple, he the man of despair, he the devil, would prove that he, in spite of language and natural law, could be loved. So he learned, so he discovered, that there is a power which has upon women a sure effect, namely, untruth and lies, when they vibrate with the flame of wild enthusiasm, with the unwholesome heat of lust, and yet with the icy coldness of the understanding, as we are bidden to cool the best wine with ice. He himself hated, and yet he generated love, even though woman does not love such a man, but feels disgust at him, and only in dizziness and stupefaction sinks into his arms. There is such an evil spirit, and it offers big earnest money, the presentiment of superhuman powers, and it tempts by illusion, as if a mad revenge were the true way to rescue one's pride and to avenge one's honor. And the way must be hard, even if it is possible, the way back across the yawning abyss which also in time separates good and evil, the transition from being supernatural in greatness through the power of evil, to being nothing, nothing whatever, less than nothing, in repentance.

"What is honor?" says Falstaff, "Can honor set a leg? No. Ergo it is an imagination, it is a painted scutcheon." No, this ergo would be a crazy inference; for even if honor can do nothing of all these things when one wins it, yet when it is lost it can do the opposite, it can amputate an leg and an arm, yea, it can maltreat a man worse than they do in Russia, and send him to Siberia. If it is able to do that, it is surely no mere imagination. For go to the battlefield and consider the fallen, go to the soldiers' hospital and consider the wounded — never didst thou find there a dead man, never a mutilated man, so maltreated as he whom honor made away with.

Then comes understanding again within the iron bars. Where then is the field of honor? It is wherever a man falls with honor. But the man who, rather than slink through life with honor, preferred to lose honor and to give it all to God, he also falls upon the field of honor. If we are to expect a new heaven and a new earth, so also we must have a new honor. So then if I fall where no one dreams a field of honor can be, even if I am buried in the unconsecrated ground alotted to the dishonored, yet in case an individual, who perhaps passed by my grave with other thoughts, were suddenly to halt and address to me this funeral oration, "How comes it that this man lies here? Can one without infamy lie among the dishonored? And he indeed lies here with honor" — I demand no more than that. I will conceive the case clearly and more decisively than the crisis of my life illustrates it. Take Mary Magdalene, suppose that no one was privy to her shame, that she could have sneaked through life with honor, and in death could have sneaked out of the world with a myrtle garland upon her brow — it seems to me that by her courage she won a very different honor, it seems to me that in death she lies without the myrtle garland more illustrious than with it.

So it seems to me also that after all he did not lose his honor who admitted that he had begun what he could not finish, it seems to me that he preserved his honor better than if he had taken at a good bargain what he would give everything he had to possess, than if he had sneaked through life as a girl's benefactor, when not even to himself he dared admit that he was the more modest figure he alone desired to be, instead of holding the girl at a high valuation when in a spirit of youthfulness she overvalued herself, and holding her at a high valuation when in distress she far undervalued herself, and holding her at the highest valuation as her deceiver, when for the lowest price he might have been her husband; it seems to me that the benediction of gratitude pronounced upon him would have been like a mockery, and that the revered name which then would have designated his relationship to her would have been an abomination, but that the severest condemnation of language and of wrath pronounced upon his conduct would have been a reparation of honor.

May 30. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. Could it be possible that she might conquer and get her wish? Let us see. What I cannot get over is that my whole view of life, which is not snatched vainly from the air but is essential to my individuality, can no longer pass muster. I cannot be happy, she cannot be happy, a marriage our relationship cannot become. She cannot be happy — what is the meaning of that when she herself so passionately desires this thing? But what good does passion do when it is questionable whether she understands herself? Her passionateness simply shows that she has not enough freedom of thought to entertain another point of view. If we separate, and I employ force to break away, she will become unhappy. But in that case there is nothing to give color to the notion that she is happy, and so her unhappiness and my guilt make sense. But if by remaining with me she becomes unhappy, it is nonsense; and then when passion is over with because the inciting opposition is no more, what then? — Our relationship cannot become a marriage. Why not? Because in my melancholy I am morbidly reserved. That I knew in the beginning, and I believed that the task was to conceal it. It was in this way I understood the matter, but such a situation is not marriage. But if she is willing to put up with being married to me with the left hand, as it would be substantially? But I will not put up with it, for as I now see it this would be an affront to her. Is one to ask then only whether one can put up with something, and not ask what this something is, whether it is true, whether it is beautiful, whether it is in conformity with the idea? About this she asks nothing — she who once was proud. This shows that she is too passionate to have any judgment. — For a marriage the wedding ceremony is requisite. What is a wedding? It means taking an oath which is mutually binding. But for a mutual obligation surely mutual understanding is requisite. But she does not understand me. What then is my oath? Nonsense. Is it a wedding? No! It is a profanation. Though we were wedded ten times, I should not be wedded to her, whereas she would be wedded to me. But if she does not concern herself at all about this? Is one then only to ask for one's passionate wish, and not at all about the idea? Is one to believe merely in one's passion, and have not the least faith or trust in the thought that he whom one loves, as one says, may mean well, although he is not of the same opinion? Does not this demonstrate her passionateness and the contradiction implied in it? Precisely in the act which is to bind us most inwardly together I perceive a divine protest against the whole thing. At the moment of the wedding we do not become united, but I learn to know what I knew beforehand, that we are separate. Is this a wedding? Or am I wedded to her for the reason that she dwells in my house, and because I desire no other woman? In that case I am essentially wedded to her now, for after all she does abide with me, and I shall know well how to honor myself and her by seeking no new love — as though I had weighed and rejected her, as she doubtless imagines, showing again by this that she does not understand me, and showing also that in her passion there smoulders a hidden pride.

A woman after all is a marvellous being, and love a strange power! I cannot give up loving her, and yet her faithfulness is of a dubious sort. To love as she does at this moment, is that a difficult art? No, it is weakness. Is it beautiful? No, it is unfree. Is it a power? No, it is impotence. Is it altruistic? No, it is self-love. Is it faithfulness? No, it is innate craftiness. And yet when it is a woman who does this, then.... But no, I do not believe I should think thus in the case of any other; but when she does it, she does it in such a way, or I see it in such a way, that she loses nothing in my eyes. She employs every device against me, and it never occurs to her to hint by a single word that she could believe me and therefore would yield, that she will resign and thereby give me my freedom, that she will despise me and on these terms let me go. In a way we have exchanged rôles, for in a certain sense she is the strong one and I the weakling, inasmuch as I am constantly fearful on her account. And truly, one against one, I should not be a match for her; but the misfortune is that I am more than one, inasmuch as I have the category and the idea on my side. A hero therefore I am not capable of becoming, for it is not my victory I seek, but that of the idea, and I am willing to be brought to naught. So when I have conquered and the thing is decided, I shall not say like Pyrrhus, "One more such victory, and I am done for," for this victory is conclusive.

June 3. Midnight.

So then I am on the lookout. If I were to say this to another person, it doubtless would require explanation; for it is easily understood that the pilot coasting the shore, that the watchman on the pinnacle of the tower, that the lookout at the bow, that the robber in his lair, are on the lookout, since there is something to peer at — but he who sits alone in his chamber, what can he be peering at? And he who expects that everything (i.e. the insignificant affair which nobody else perhaps would heed) will pass off quietly, is in fact peering at nothing. What wonder then that this strains his soul and his head; for to look at something is good for the eyes, but to look at nothing is a strain on them. And when for a long while the eye looks at nothing, it sees at last itself, or its own faculty of seeing — so it is that the emptiness around me forces my thought back into myself.

So I begin again from the start to examine the dialectical difficulty of my expectation. The culmination of my life, that almost mad wish, the utmost effort and the last longing of my enthusiasm is that the whole thing might be made good. I have held my soul upon this supreme point.

I feel indeed that now by the weight of the temporal I am at times dragged down from that point. So then, new exercises. From this wish the paths diverge: the wish is one thing for her and another for me. Autopathically I must wish that she might become another's. For my person in its egoism this is the easiest way out. Sympathetically I do not wish this, unless it were to come about in a way that is inconceivable by a return to a first love; for otherwise it is a temporal healing which is not the highest. On the other hand, for her to be infinitized in a religious sense would be and is the highest, and that too I must wish, although, autopathically understood, such an existence would be a heavy burden for me. It would not be difficult for her to find a religious way out. She has nothing to reproach herself with, she can live in blissful friendship with the eternal, she can die quietly and placidly in God, "as mild and gentle as the cradle-babe dying with mother's dug between its lips." For me such an existence on her part would be a condemnation to penitence in perpetuum. As the next best thing to being religiously infinitized, my sympathetic wish would be that she might be raised to a higher power in temporal existence, become something great and uncommon in the world. If this were to occur my life again would be laid under embargo. — The catastrophe of horror hardly needs to be again brought up, it may be regarded as a thing of the past.

In spite of this long scala, there is sense and meaning in my existence. What I have done hitherto, until these last letters, is consistent. I have kept entirely quiet, mute, as if nothing were going on. What an effort it has cost me, only he can know who comprehends my sufferings, no one else. How truly does Heiberg say in a masterly novel: “However strong one’s reasons may be for regarding a person as inwardly unhappy and broken-hearted, yet if he looks composed, cheerful and merry, all our reasons are put to flight, and we believe rather what we see than what we know.” — We have often laughed at the bear which struck its master a fatal blow to chase a fly away. This is indeed comic, but the situation can be made to appear profoundly tragic. Suppose that the bear was aware what the consequence would be if it exerted all its force as it alone could, suppose then that it saw its master tormented and that it must sit still and repress itself so as not to make everything worse. This might be trying and very difficult, for it knew that it could easily kill the fly.

The art of the actor consists in seeming to be deeply moved when he is untroubled (if he is really troubled, it is a fault); the art of the reserved man consists in seeming to be untroubled although he is deeply moved. If he is not deeply moved and shaken, his art = o, and he is not reserved.

June 5. Morning TODAY a year ago. I might in fact get along without the marriage ceremony, and plan for an erotic union such as we have examples of. She is willing to put up with anything — but shall one not raise any question about what it is one is willing to put up with? The situation is so desperately topsy-turvy that I could easily entice her to seduce me. But though she believes now (alas, in her pain!) that I can readily find a finer girl, or though she believes (alas, in her delusion!) that I so easily could forget her and find in other ways new and ever new joy in the world, she ought then also to believe that I rate my honor so low that for a fancy I would be willing to forfeit what never can be regained. For honor I shall never acquire again, or as the last thing of all, sooner will she acquire a new love. But to live outside of wedlock, whether she would put up with it or not, whether she could rely upon my faithfulness or not, is from an ideal point of view an indignity. And she might die, and she might bring down upon my conscience a murder, and she might curse me, and she might abhor me, and she might write an epigram upon my melancholy when she is consoled by a new love, and I am unaltered in that place where she imagined herself to be. But no indignity shall be put upon her — least of all in such a way that I thereby become a knight.

If there were any man I could turn to, I would go to him and say, “Oh, please, please supply a little meaning for me in my bewilderment.” The most dreadful meaning is not so dreadful as meaninglessness, and this is the more terrible the more meaninglessly it smiles.

Laughter explores in all directions, and by its aid and under its false flag I introduce everything into the conversation, in order that my reflection may inspect the thought-paths in her soul and her powers of resistance. I perceive this much, that she does not possess the proper ideal conception of what it is to sorrow. In a finite sense she is in sound health, and after all it is by the finite she must be saved. She must be brought to the point of being disgusted with the whole thing, then we part, then she lays her down to sleep, then she sleeps it out, and then she is saved again for time. It is not with the powers of ideality she has to fight, she has a finite hope to which she holds fast, and my presence helps her. The fact that I am here and must look on, gives her an importance in her own eyes which she will not have when I am gone.

If I were not sure of myself that I suffer more than she does, and that the worst awaits me when I have to do only with myself, I could not hold out. However, it goes on, and one can become accustomed to every suffering. What I shuddered at as at entering a fiery furnace, I am becoming accustomed to. I am so extraordinarily successful in bosh and drivel that at home I have to make the opposite motions in order that the whole thing may not dissolve in galimatias. If she had infinity in her soul it would be an easy task for her to be magnanimous towards me (Oh, invidious situation!), to give me my freedom, to take the pain and get a religious equivalent for it, and so to make me her debtor, a debtor in respect to magnanimity. These terms have been offered her, I did not dare to refuse them to her; but verily it would have been upon me a terrible punishment. What does all her anger and contempt amount to in comparison with magnanimity!

June 5. Midnight.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR

(Daniel)

1. RECOLLECTIONS of my life when I was a beast and ate grass, I, Nebuchadnezzar, to all peoples and tongues.

2. Was not Babel the great city, the greatest of all the cities of the nations? I, I Nebuchadnezzar, have built it.

3. No city was so renowned as Babel, and no king so renowned through Babel, the glory of my majesty.

4. My royal house was visible unto the ends of the earth, and my wisdom was like a dark riddle which none of the wise men could explain.

5. So they could not tell what it was I had dreamed.

6. And the word came to me that I should be transformed and become like a beast which eateth the grass of the field while seven seasons changed over me.

7. Then I assembled all my princes with their armies and disposed that I should be forewarned when the enemy came as the word indicated.

8. But no one dared approach proud Babel, and I said, “Is not this proud Babel which I have built?”

9. Now there was heard a voice suddenly, and I was transformed as quickly as a woman changeth color.

10. Grass was my food, and dew fell upon me, and no one knew me who I was.

11. But I knew Babel and cried, “Is not this Babel?” But no one heeded my word, for when it sounded it was like the bellowing of a beast.

12. My thoughts terrified me, my thoughts in my mind, for my mouth was bound, and no one could perceive anything but a voice in likeness as a beast’s.

13. And I thought, Who is that Mighty One, the Lord, the Lord, whose wisdom is like the darkness of the night, and like the deep sea unfathomable?

14. Yea, like a dream which He alone understandeth, and the interpretation of which He hath not delivered into any man’s power, when suddenly He is upon one and holds one in His powerful arms.

15. No one knoweth where this Mighty One dwelleth, no one could point and say, “Behold, here is His throne,” so that one could travel through the land till it was said, “Behold, here is the confine of His dominion.”

16. For He dwelleth not on the confines of my kingdom as my neighbor, neither from the uttermost sea unto the confines of my kingdom like a bulwark round about.

17. And neither doth He dwell in His Temple, for I, I Nebuchadnezzar, have taken His vessels of gold and vessels of silver, and have laid His Temple waste.

18. And no one knoweth anything of Him, who was His father, and how He acquired His power, and who taught Him the secret of His might.

19. And He hath no counsellors, that one might buy His secret for gold; no one to whome He says, “What shall I do?” and no one who says to Him, “What doest thou?”

20. Spies He has not, to spy after the opportunity when one might catch Him; for He doth not say, “Tomorrow,” but He saith, “Today.”

21. For He maketh no preparations like a man, and His preparations give the enemy no respite; for He saith, “Let it be done,” and it cometh to pass.

22. He sitteth still and speaketh with Himself, one knoweth not that He is present until it cometh to pass.

23. This hath He done against me. He aimeth not like the bowman, so that one might flee from His arrow; He speaketh with Himself, and it is done.

24. In His hand the brain of kings is like wax in the smelting oven, and their potency is like a feather when He weigheth it.

25. And yet He dwelleth not on earth as the Mighty One, that He might take from me Babel and leave me a small residue, or that He might take from me all and be the Mighty One in Babel.

26. So did I think in the secrecy of my mind, when no one knew me, and my thoughts terrified me, that the Lord, the Lord was such as that.

27. But when the seven years were past I became again Nebuchadnezzar.

28. And I called together all the wise men that they might explain to me the secret of that power, and how I had become a beast of the field.

29. And they all fell down upon their faces and said, “Great Nebuchadnezzar, this is an imagination, an evil dream! Who could be capable of doing this to thee?”

30. But my wrath was kindled against the wise men in the whole land, and I had them cut down in their folly.

31. For the Lord, the Lord possesseth all might, as no man doth possess it, and I will not envy Him his power, but will laud it and be next to Him, for I have taken His vessels of gold and vessels of silver.

32. Babel is no more the renowned Babel, and I, Nebuchadnezzar, am no more Nebuchadnezzar, and my armies protect me no more, for no one can see the Lord, the Lord, and no one can recognize Him, 33. Though He were to come, and the watchmen were to give warning in vain, because already I should have become like a bird in the tree, or like a fish in the water, known only to the other fish.

34. Therefore I desire no longer to be renowned through Babel, but every seventh year there shall be a festival in the land, 35. A great festival among the people, and it shall be called the Feast of the Transformation.

36. And an astrologer shall be led through the streets and be clad like a beast, and his calculations shall he carry with him, torn to shreds like a bunch of hay.

37. And all the people shall cry, "The Lord, the Lord, the Lord is the Mighty One, and His deed is swift like the leap of the great fish in the sea."

38. For soon my days are told, and my dominion gone like a watch in the night, and I know not whither I go hence, 39. Whether I come to the invisible land in the distance where the Mighty One dwelleth, that I might find grace in His eyes; 40. Whether it be He that taketh from me the breath of life, that I become as a cast-off garment like my predecessors, that he might find delight in me.

41. This have I, I Nebuchadnezzar, made known to all peoples and tongues, and great Babel shall carry out my will.

June 7. Midnight.

WHEN I was a child a little peat fosse was my all in all. The dark tree-roots which protruded here and there in the profound obscurity were vanished kingdoms and lands, where every discovery was as important to me as are antediluvian remains to the scientist. There was eventfulness in plenty, for if I threw a stone, what prodigious movements it caused, the one circle greater than the other, until the water again stood still; and if I threw the stone in another fashion, the movements were different from these and in themselves were enriched by many diversities. I lay by the edge and looked out across the surface, seeing how halfway out the wind first began to ripple the water, until the rippling waves vanished among the rushes on the opposite side. Then I climbed up into the willow which leaned out over the fosse, sitting on the extremest branch I could reach and weighing it down a little so that I might stare down into the obscurity. Then came the ducks swimming to strange lands and climbing the small tongue which jutted out from the land and formed with its rushes a bay where my boat of driftwood lay. But if then there flew out of the woods and over the water a wild duck, it awakened by its cry obscure memories in the heads of the tame ducks, so that they began to flap their wings and fly wildly along the surface — then it awakened also a longing in my breast, until again I stared myself into contentment with my little peat fosse.

So it always is, so compassionate is nature, so rich: the less one has, the more one sees. Take for example a book, the most mediocre that has been written, but read it with the passionate feeling that it is the only one thou wilt read, then out of that book thou dost read all things, i.e. as much as there was in thee, and more thou didst never get out of any book, though thou wert to read the best.

The period of childhood is now long past, hence on the score of imagination I have less to contribute — so greatly am I changed. But the object of my contemplation has not become very great in proportion to advancing age. There is one person, one only, about whom everything turns. Upon that girl I gaze and gaze until I produce out of myself what perhaps I should never have managed to see, though I had seen ever so much, for it would not follow that by seeing much my inwardness would have become transparent to me. If she had been uncommonly talented in spirit, she never would have had such an influence upon me. She is just enough for me as a responsibility, and the responsibility again is mine, and yet it is she who by this responsibility brings out before consciousness my inwardness. I was far too much, and much too definitely developed for her to influence me by imparting anything, nor was she equipped to enrich me in a spiritual sense with new content. But, in the last resort, for understanding oneself one has to be in the right situation. This she has helped me to reach by responsibility. From this point of view all my suffering is directly favorable to me. The searching quietness of responsibility teaches one the necessity of helping oneself by force of spirit. Achievement, action, activity, which so often are praised, and deservedly, may easily have, however, an admixture of distraction, so that one does not get to know what one is capable of by force of spirit, and what part the manifold external impulses play; by them one is also spared many terrors, which do not get time to reach one; but being spared does not mean to overcome them or to understand oneself. By the responsibility she will help me further, for I shall not be through with the thing when she is. Suppose she were to become the wife of another man, and I free; with that I am not through with it, I still should have left the possibility that it suddenly might dawn upon me (perhaps owing to the guidance of some thinker, perhaps by a casual word, which sometimes has such great power) — that it suddenly might dawn upon me that a marriage might have been constructed out of our relationship. Precisely because in such a case I should not have the sympathetic dread on her account, pain will grip me again, but then autopathically. What then will responsibility be to me? It will be my comfort, and precisely in the responsibility I shall learn to know myself.

As viewed from this standpoint of self-understanding, I comprehend very well that as a man I am far from being paradigmatic, I am rather a sample man. I indicate with fair precision the temperature of every mood and passion, and while I produce my own inwardness, I understand these words: homo sum, nil humani a me alienum puto, But in a humane sense no man can fashion himself after me, and least of all in a historical sense am I a prototype for any man. I am rather a man such as might be needed in a crisis, an experiment which existence uses to feel its way before it. A man half as reflective as I, would be able to acquire significance for many, but precisely because I am wholly reflective through and through I acquire none at all.

As soon as I am outside my religious understanding I feel as an insect must feel when the children play with it, for existence seems to have acted just as mercilessly with me. As soon as I am within my religious understanding I understand that precisely this has absolute significance for me. That which in the one case is horrible jest, is in the other sense the deepest seriousness.

At bottom, seriousness is far from being a simple thing, a simplex, but is a compositum; for the true seriousness is the unity of jest and seriousness. Of this I can best convince myself by contemplating Socrates. If in accordance with one of Plato’s interpretations we ingeniously explain Socrates as the unity of the comic and the tragic, it is quite right, but the query remains, Wherein does this unity consist? It cannot be a question of a new kind of poetry or anything of that sort; no, the unity consists in seriousness. Socrates then was the most serious man in Greece. His intellectuality stood in absolute proportion to his ethical nature (where this is not the case one can be serious about trivialities), his comic sense was precisely as great as his ethical pathos; his seriousness was hidden in jest, hence he had freedom in it, and to be serious he did not need the least outward support (which always detracts from the specific worth of seriousness).

In the case of an immediate existence it is important not to see the contradictions, for with that immediacy is lost; in the existence of spirit the important thing is to hold out and to endure the contradictions, but at the same time to hold them off from oneself in freedom. Hence the narrow-minded seriousness is always afraid of the comic, and rightly so; but the true seriousness itself invents the comic. If this were not so, stupidity would be the privileged caste with relation to seriousness. But seriousness is not mediation — that is a poor jest and a new motive for the comic. Mediation has no place in the existence-sphere of freedom, and only in a ludicrous way, coming from metaphysics, can it intrude into the sphere where freedom is constantly in process of becoming. Seriousness fathoms the comic, and the greater the depth out of which it fetches itself up out of this sphere, so much the better for it; but it does not mediate. What it seriously wills it does not regard as comic inasmuch as it wills it, but for all that it is well able to see the comic side. Thus it is the comic purifies the pathetic, and conversely the pathetic lends emphasis to the comic. Accordingly that comic construction will be the most annihilating which is so fashioned that indignation is latent in it, though no one observes this for laughter. Vis comica is the most dangerous weapon and therefore is entrusted only to the hand of him who has a pathos which completely corresponds to it. The man who could thus make a hypocrite truly ridiculous would be able also to crush him by his indignation. On the other hand, the man who would employ indignation, and does not possess the corresponding vis comica, will easily fall into declamation and become himself comic.

But here I sit and forget her! No, certainly not; for the unity of the comic and the tragic concerns me closely. My belligerent understanding has often wanted to whirl the whole thing away in laughter, but precisely out of this whirlwind has my tragic passion developed more strongly. Thus it is that I understand myself better, and understand that I have held fast to seriousness. If it had not been so from the beginning, if step by step I had not seen the comic, and under its supervision preserved the tragic, then if it turns out that she becomes another man’s wife, presumably a certain passionateness (which is not seriousness in spite of its vehemence) would have got the better of me, or else laughter (in a way that is unbecoming in its separation from the pathetic). For this is comic, that I am a scoundrel, and she the one who will die — now that the situation is inverted. But this shock I can well endure, for from the very beginning my pathos is saved. My pathos has not its origin in her or her vehement outburst, but is my soul’s inwardness. Hence transformation cannot make me its plaything, for I hold fast to the idea, and the comic from without has no power over me. The fact that I believed everything, every word of hers, as seriously as a person possibly can, is not at all comic. Whether she did not mean it, has nothing to do with the case; whether like Jacob von Thyboe she says, “We have reconsidered that,” makes no difference whatever. True, if I had believed it merely in virtue of her, because she said it, if I had believed it merely in reliance upon her trustworthiness, I should then be comic, and in a certain sense I should have been comic from the beginning. But I believed her because she stood in an ethical relationship to me, so that it was my duty to believe, it is I who have given her word the weight of eternity for me, because I showed respect to the relationship; never have I relied “upon her word and gown” in planning my life. Hence I have seen the comic from the very beginning, and just for this reason I cannot to all eternity become comic. I can produce the comic any moment I will, but I will not, and this will controls my pathos, so that it is not vehement and blind and thereby comic.

So the matter stands, even in case that “if” comes to pass. I am and remain unchanged.

June 11. Midnight.

TODAY I saw her. But this seeing is of no great service to me, for I dare not believe what is commonly accounted the surest thing, my own eyes. But today circumstances favored me. I was walking with another man when we met her. I knew that he was not acquainted with her. As we were approaching I said to him, “How suffering the girl looks!” That maybe was an untruth, but what will a man not do to get ocular demonstration? He replied quite apathetically, “It doesn’t seem so to me at all.” It is an odd thing to talk to a person in such a way; I doubt if ever in his life he will chance to say a word to me which is so important, although for him it had no importance at all. It didn’t stop there, however, for we had something to talk about and therefore walked back and forth in the street, and half an hour later she returned by the same path from a shop. While she was passing us (which she could not avoid doing, because there was no side street, and she had seen us too late) I called his attention to her again, and when she had passed I said, “You really are right, she looks blooming.” He replied, “Yes, that’s what I said; but I cannot conceive why you concern yourself about it.” It is an odd thing to talk to a person in this way; I doubt if he ever will make a remark which touches me so closely, and yet he thought nothing much about it. I explained to him that it was one of my diversions to pay attention to peoples’ exterior in order to infer their interior condition. So I was quite ready to concede to him that the last time she looked well, but I was convinced that in the course of her walk something must have occurred which produced this effect, for the first time she looked unwell. He became a bit angry and maintained that he could read faces as well as I, and that both times he had seen one and the same thing. I stood as upon hot coals, lest I might have compromised myself; but to save myself from the snares of imagination when in loneliness it would distress me with the fear that he might have noticed her particularly and would later learn to know that it was she, I then risked the utmost: “Well, we shall soon have the case decided. Do you believe you could recognize her again, for I am not sure that I could, although I looked at her more attentively than you did. Let us go together and procure some information about her.”

“Evasions,” said he, “evasions merely for the sake of carrying the point. How should I recognize her again, since I only looked at her cursorily, though I saw enough to vouch for what I have said.” It is an odd thing to talk to a person in this way; for I doubt if he ever will utter a word which so relieves my concern as does this word, which he uttered however only for the sake of getting the better of me. This is like an official survey. The person I walked with was truly an impartial man. So I dare to believe it. — When one must thus steal up to a thing, one appreciates it the more. — To steal up to a pleasure is natural enough, but not to dare to be concerned, to walk in the path of concern as though it were a forbidden path — and now if the result had been that she looked unwell, I should have had to steal up to that.

June 12. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. If then a marriage could be constructed in spite of my morbid reserve, this union is my wish. Quite certainly, even though I cannot at this moment decide in how far it is purely erotic, or has an admixture of emotion prompted by her pain in conjunction with my pride, which in a sense she has on her side. So I might indeed try to imagine that my break with the idea was praiseworthy, since it was for her sake; without concerning myself about her, I might take her at her passionate word, and thus have as much as possible of the joy I wished for myself and which is always in her possession — and thus be unrepentant and free from all difficulties and terrors. When I look away from the idea, I seem to be very well off with this. And now when she not only will put up with everything, but will thank me for it as for a charitable deed, consequently — I cannot endure this confusion. Where can my weary thought find a place to repose? Circumstances change, and my head swims. It was my wish that she might become mine, it is my pain to relinquish it; it was my duty to remain in the relationship, it is enough to consume one's strength that I have broken a relationship of duty — but, God in heaven preserve my understanding, save me from one thing, let me not become her benefactor; I cannot live without having some sense in my life, I must have a little, it may be little enough. Let me become her murderer, if so it must be; I understand then that I have pressed forward where I ought not to have ventured, when I make an effort I can understand that it is a heavy punishment inflicted upon me, and the thought-life in me can again draw breath — but to be her benefactor! No, that is impossible. Avaunt, crazy senselessness with thy smiling phyz, make me miserable, but so that there is some sense in it, but beatify me not in nonsense. If I cannot do it though it is my wish, if I cannot do it though it is my duty, there is nothing more to be said, the rest is not only of the evil but of insanity.

Happen what may, though I fall dead today, it is after all not so terrible to go hence with a homicide upon my conscience, as to live as her benefactor. There must be a fault on her part: such terms should never have been offered me. This implies an insult to us both, for it is as if she said "Thou dost not love me, thou hast no regard for thy duty, but after all thou art miserable enough to let thyself be moved, and I am weak enough to will this."

Perhaps she suffers for the fact that her breast is burdened by suppressed sighs, that she cannot weep; so does my consciousness suffer for the same cause, that it cannot manage to take breath, but groans with suppressed thoughts and perishes in meaninglessness. As a fish when it lies upon the beach gasps in vain for the sea wherein it can breathe, so do I gasp in vain for sense and meaning.

She suffers, it is evident, and he who sees it is I. No one else has a notion of what is going on between us. When anyone is present my bearing is as it always was. She remains quiet, and I keep watch with a hundred eyes over every word that is spoken, lest suddenly there might come an explosion. She would find relief by talking to somebody, but it would merely have a cooling effect, and the worst symptoms perhaps would come over her in loneliness; she is much better off in holding out with me.

A casual utterance may cause the worst disturbance of all. When one is keeping everything in check by one's calculations, suddenly somebody may let fall a remark which, without having any intention of the sort, touches one sensibly. Yesterday we were at a dinner party. There was talk at table about engagements. A lady remarked that "engaged persons always lose weight." How strikingly applicable! For her and for me it was a harrowing truth. When I already was trying to distract attention from this subject, in order that no further application of this dictum of experience might be made, a gentleman continued it: "But in requital people commonly become fat when they are married." Poor girl! I however retained sufficient composure to adjoin, as lightly as a heavily armed man can, "But yet there are instances of the contrary," and mentioning the name of a man which was enough to produce laughter, I said "He has been married three times, and yet is thinner than I." People were pleased to laugh. She had time to collect herself. But such a torture destroys both soul and body.

Moreover, she is and remains without resignation. She underbids and underbids, but to conceive the problem sympathetically does not occur to her. When she is willing to cast herself away like a slave, like a naught, like a burden, it appears to her that she is carrying resignation to extremes. God knows that in a way the thing is carried to very much greater extremes than I can bear to see it. On the other hand, she either cannot or will not understand what she ought to do, and that she tortures me in an unjustifiable way, for there never has been any dispute about her loveliness, and then too such conduct confirms me in my resolution, precisely out of solicitude for her.

What I fear most of all is that in her imagination she has concocted something great out of me. If that be so, then this humiliation of herself is the worst of all misfortunes. Here I have found a limit for my deceit. If in the form of bosh I were to talk about my insignificance, it would only confirm her in such an imagination, if she has it. Therefore, just as every eighth day I seriously challenge her to break the engagement, so too I have opened to her a little communication with my inmost thought with regard to this last hazard. Next to becoming her benefactor I rank the absurdity that I might be something great and disdain her. This communication is opened only for an instant, for as soon as I have said that she is always plenty good enough, the bosh begins again. I comfort myself in this respect by the thought that when I have forsaken her she will find the opinion confirmed by everyone that it was no great loss. With regard to my heartlessness in treating her thus, it is to be hoped that she will also find confirmation in everybody's condemnation of me.

It would be splendid if she could be brought to the point, or herself get the notion, of breaking the engagement. She would thus be spared the humiliation. I throw out hints of it, for with a whole voice and full passion I dare not talk of it, for thus she would discover how much she concerns me, and so would try all expedients over again. Hence I must talk with half a voice and a fictitious passion.

June 14. Midnight.

IN the Middle Ages people saved their souls by repeating the rosary a certain number of times. If I could save my soul by repeating to myself the story of my sufferings, I should have been saved long ago. If my repetition is not always prayerful — oh, yet preferably it ends in the consolation of prayer. In this she aids me in a singular way. If I were not to maintain myself in the passion of action, if this were past and I quiet, i.e. if in repose I dared to reflect upon the whole situation, then I would say that she has done me a good turn for the fact that in my humiliation at seeing her subject herself to me I find all the more joy in subjecting myself to a higher Power. Her misfortune was that she had nothing higher than a man. As the Scripture says that an idol is nothing in the world, so it may well be that I shall end by being nothing, because to her I was an idol.

But how strange the whole thing was, the situation is so dialectically illusive that any instant it might, as it were, escape me, so as to seem as if I had not left her because I loved her but because I loved myself! I find everything just as I wished it, her whole environment just as I had imagined it from first impressions. It suits me like nothing else, I might travel the world around and perhaps not find a situation so propitious for me. If another step is required before marriage, namely, a rational deliberation, then I venture to bear witness on my own behalf that I thoroughly tried out myself beforehand. Only I did not wish to offend her by reconnoitring. I find her rather different from what I had imagined, a little scene helps us, and she becomes in my eyes more lovable than ever — and then, behold, the whole difficulty comes from my side. But then perhaps I am light-minded? All my deliberation about her situation and that of her family before ever I took the step is proof to the contrary, and I dare testify on my own behalf that I entered into the relationship with an entirely honest will, convinced that I knew wherein the problem consisted, and perhaps a bit proud of being able to resolve it, by mastering my reserve and keeping it to myself — and, lo, precisely this is my downfall, not meaning by this that I cannot do it, but that this is not the solution of the problem. After that little incident her devotion becomes more and more unrestrained in its expression, and becomes proof to me that my reserve means absolute incompatibility, that her union with me would be a mésalliance for her, even if she does not understand it so. That such is the state of the case is my pain, and yet for all that I cannot give up my reserve. I have employed fifteen years to form a life-view for myself and to attain proficiency in it. It is a life-view which stirred my enthusiasm and was entirely in accordance with my nature, and so I cannot suddenly be made over. I cannot even tell her that I wish such a thing, because such a wish is an undetermined determinant which cannot presume without great light-mindedness to dispose of her life. In proportion as she has struggled with all her might to show her devotion she has labored against herself with all her vital power.

And now I see clearly that my melancholy makes it impossible for me to have a confidant, and I know well that what the wedding ceremony exacts of me is that she should be precisely this. But this she never has been, and could not be even if I were to open myself ever so thoroughly, for we do not understand one another. This is due to the fact that my consciousness has one more register than hers. In the lower court of appeal, which properly is the sphere of everyday life and what is called reality, in that court where she essentially has her life, as surely the majority of men have, I am more than a little queer. Only by a long detour do I become again secure and composed like other men. I am not actually crazy, for I am perfectly capable of looking after myself, I have need of no confidant, I burden no one with my unhappiness, and it does not disturb me at all in my work. My melancholy searches in every direction for the dreadful. Then it grips me with its terror. I cannot and will not flee from it, I must endure the thought; then I find a religious composure, and only then am I free and happy, as spirit. Although

I have the most enthusiastic apprehension of God's love, I have also an apprehension that He is not a dear old grandpapa who sits in heaven and indulges people, but that in time and in temporal existence one must be prepared to suffer everything. It is my conviction that it is only a Judaizing reminiscence, a petty particularism in Christianity, or habitual cowardice and indolence, to think that one enjoys a special relationship to God and is exempted from such things. Bustling spiritual and worldly expedients for keeping the terror away are a disgust to me, because these expedients have no understanding of what the terrible is. True, he who is busy in willing to be or has become something in this finite world does well to keep the terror away, and he is compelled to do so lest it should transform his aim into nothing and prevent him from attaining the imagined greatness. But he who wills in a religious sense must have a receptive attitude to the terrible, he must open himself to it, and he has only to take care that it does not stop halfway, but that it leads him into the security of the infinite. This comes about little by little through the instrumentality of the particular terror. He becomes familiar with it, familiar with the thought that what he most fears will happen to him, but he also becomes expert in drilling this thought into conformity with his assurance of God's love. So the thought visits him perhaps off and on, but it lasts only a minute, that very instant he is religiously oriented in it, and the thing disturbs him no more. But then comes another terror, and he does not prate about it to men, but attends to his business, and in this case too he succeeds, etc.

If she had become mine, I am convinced that I should have stood beside her with the thought that one of us would die before night, or with some similar foreboding. I vouch that neither she nor anyone else would have observed it in my looks. Within myself too I should have been composed, but religiously composed, and yet I should have had the thought all the same. Lo, this is a deceit. In case I had a confidant, I would make this inquiry of him: “Is it not a shame for a man who is melancholy to torture his wife with his melancholy ideas?” And he would reply, and with him perhaps all men: “Yes indeed, a man ought to repress himself and thereby show that he is a man.”

“Very well,” I would answer, “that is what I can do, I can look like a smiling hope; and yet it is precisely upon this I have come to grief, for it is a deceit which marriage does not tolerate, whether the wife in question understands it so or not.” And the misfortune is that I believed this was the task, until I learned to perceive that the wedding is a divine protest against it.

As for talking with a confidant, that I cannot do. A confidant will not think my melancholy idea so passionately as I do, and so will not understand that for me it is a religious starting-point. In order to live in intimacy with another person it is requisite, either that one has not such thoughts, that one’s world of consciousness ends with the “systematic,” hardly Greek and still less Christian, board fence, “the outward is the inward and the inward is the outward”; or else that such thoughts are not too stoutly held to yield to what one calls reasonable grounds. For most men have a fractional conception of the deceitful appearance of life; but then experience and probability come along and rivet the loose ends together, and so they attain security and have reasonable grounds for it. I know all about that. An elderly woman once got the idea that she would be buried alive. She confided in me. Quite naturally she had thought out three precautionary measures, but as she was distressed by melancholy, her distress had naturally taken all three away from her again, i.e. she could imagine the possibility that they might not suffice. Had she not been melancholy, she would have remained blissful in the assurance that there are such prudential rules and priceless truths which are able to secure something for a person in the finite. Then I had to help her to become blissful in galimatias; for as I perceived that the infinite would perhaps put her to complete confusion, I chose the finite. I myself had once been worried by the same idea and so was bountifully supplied with prudential rules. This abundance had not helped me, for my melancholy had taken it from me, until I found comfort in the infinite. I suggested to her then the fourth and the fifth precautionary measures which she had not dreamt of, and she has never ceased to thank me; but I have never known whether I should laugh or weep at it.

If then I were married and my wife were my confidant — what then? I will suppose that it was that old woman's melancholy idea which worried me, and that it was in the period of suffering, before I had got myself into perfect training. So then I would talk and initiate her into this idea. Then as a matter of fact she would likely laugh, for it would be inconceivable to her how a person could get such ideas. Now in case my melancholy were not constantly the starting point for a religious satisfaction, in case it were an empty whim or crotchet from which nothing resulted, then perhaps this innocent laughter would be precisely the most healing medicine, for a lovable youthfulness has also a great power. But the religious satisfaction is to me of more value than all youthfulness, and therefore this would not help me, except to the point of sadly rejoicing in her happiness, which nevertheless I do not covet. But talk I must, for the easiest thing for me is to keep silent. So she would surely become concerned, and then she would make trial of the reasonable grounds. Suppose then she thinks out five precautionary measures which should take the wind out of my sails. The whole thing is so clear to me that I should like to hear her voice to convince myself that I have done right in preventing myself from hearing it. So she would enumerate the five precautionary measures, and then would say, "And finally thou hast me, who would then do everything for thee, trust me, I promise that it shall not occur, everything shall be done, as if the salvation of my soul depended upon it — so be joyful again." It seems to me that this situation must be enough to make the stones weep. The poor wife! She has suggested everything she could think of. If I were to oppose her, she would believe that I have no confidence in her as being what she would seem to be, and this grieves her. And on the other hand, this then is the dialectic that is to bind me. Even the simplest objection, which would occur to everybody, that she might in fact die before me, she would not understand; for just because it is essentially characteristic of her to look forward to everything happy, and that it is in this "immediate" hope and faith and confidence she has her security in life, she would be speaking from the bottom of her heart were she to say, "How couldst thou think that? I know now why the notion of my dying before thee is so momentous to thee," etc. She would again make the stones weep by her genuine and heartfelt emotion; but on the other hand, this is the dialectic which is to bind him who for fifteen years, day and night, has practised himself in wrestling dialectically with thoughts, as an Arab manages his steed, as a juggler plays with sharp knives. What would be the end of it? That I could not bear to see her distressed, could not find it in my heart to let her go off with the mortification of thinking that I had no confidence in her. And what then? Why then I would let a day intervene, and then I would assume my disguise of deceit, would look as friendly as possible and say to her, "Yes, my dear, it is just as thou didst say. It is true, I have thee, and thou hast convinced me, if not by thy reasons, at least by what thou didst say about thyself." And then she looks so happy and delighted, she who is the joy of my eyes — and I have deceived her. And this I cannot endure, because in her place I could not endure it, and because I will and must love her as greatly as myself, which I do only by leaving her. In relation to other people a deceit is permissible, for they are not tied to me, and not divinely installed as my confidants; and if they are tired of me, they can go, as she cannot, if one day she obscurely comprehends the incompatibility. — The question whether I really was composed when I talked to her thus is not to the point, for if I was composed, it would have been within myself. In this instance the incompatibility shows itself again. A melancholy idea cannot acquire for her the significance that it becomes the starting point for a religious satisfaction. If she has one opinion about a theatrical piece and I another, if the difference of opinion proved perhaps that I am an aesthetic critic and she anything but that, this by no means constitutes an incompatibility, and if it came to that, I would gladly give up my opinion for her sake. But the strange ideas of melancholy I do not give up; for these, which perhaps a third person would call crotchets, which she perhaps would sympathetically call distressing fancies, I call pulls — if only I follow them and hold out, they lead me to the eternal certainty of the infinite.

In my loneliness therefore these ideas are dear to me, even though they affright me; they have the utmost importance for me and teach me, instead of congratulating myself and rendering mankind blissful by peerless discoveries in the religious field — instead of this they teach me to my own abasement to discover as it were, and with endless contentment to be satisfied with, the very simplest things. — In the concept of godly fear it is surely implied that He is to be feared, and if it is dangerous for a man's soul to make God a despot, it is also dangerous for his religion to make Him a subject in reduced circumstances; and if it would be alarming to a man's soul if God were shut up in eternal silence, it is also dangerous to audit speculatively God's accounts and to prance prophetically through world history. Why is it indeed that in remote places where half a mile separates the little huts there is more godly fear than in the noisy town, that sailors have more godly fear than the inhabitants of the market town — why indeed unless it is because such men experience something, and experience it in such a way that there is no escape? When at night the tempest rages and the hungry cry of the wolf is ominously heard therein, when in peril upon the sea a man has saved himself upon a plank, that is to say, must be rescued by a straw from certain destruction, also when no one can send a message to the next hut because no one will venture out at night, and one can spare oneself the trouble of shouting — then one learns to possess one's soul in patience, relying upon something else besides night watchmen and the police and the distress-gun of the life-saving station. In the great cities both men and buildings are crowded too close together. If one is properly to receive a primitive impression, there must either be an event, or one must have another way, as I have in my melancholy. If not, there is danger that the total outcome may be as follows: he had been young and still recalls many pleasant experiences of that time, many joyful days, then he was married, and all went well, only one time he was seriously ill, and at once a messenger went for the doctor, one fetched in haste whoever could be found, and so came Professor D., and one learned to know in him a very careful physician, who therefore became the family doctor; also in Pastor P. one found a serious spiritual guide, of whose deep religiousness and genuine piety one was more thoroughly convinced than of one's own religiousness, for which one valued him more and more and more highly from year to year; then one learned to know several like-minded families, attached oneself to them, and then died. And why should it not be a pretty thing to have had a happy youth and to remember it, why should it not be a joyful thing to have learned to know Professor D. and Pastor P. — but is this then the maximum when all is said and done? If so, I would prefer not to incommode either the professor or the pastor, but to have heard the howl of the wolf and to have learned to know God.

In love stories the messenger whom the lover employs is often a dwarf, a deformed person, an old crone. Who could believe it was a love message? So for me my melancholy ideas are messengers from my first love, from what always must remain my only love. They terrify me, but they have never had permission from the sender to destroy me, to enfeeble my spirit, to let me become burdensome to others. Whether this is some time to occur, I do not know, whether it shall occur soon or late, I do not know, but this I know, that these messengers have led me on to the most blissful certitude — and so it may be the same with promotion, “whether one came limping or came hobbling, without glamor of pleasing appearance.” Even at this very instant the thought overwhelms me that I have been able to hold out. Oh, in loneliness I never have wished for death. I do not understand how men can suddenly become torpid enough to wish for death. For me on the contrary, the more it grows dark around me, the more I wish to live, in order to hold out by myself, to see if my enthusiasm was an empty word or a power, whether it was the strong drink which foams of itself or penny beer, which foams indeed — but by a foreign admixture. And if a man can understand how dreadful it might be for one who fights to become a king to think of the inopportune arrival of death just when he was nearest the goal, then I can understand that he whose life was troubled to the core, that he who had no confidant at his side and no impressa vestigia before his feet regards it as of the utmost importance for him that death may not come and render it impossible to get to know whether along that path he might press on, or whether he was infatuated by an illusion, whether his resolution which renounces declamation was just as completely fudge as that of the declaimers.

June 18. Midnight.

AM I guilty? Yes. How? By the fact that I began what I could not carry to completion. How is it thou dost understand it now? I understand now why it was impossible for me. What then is thy guilt? That I did not understand it earlier. What is thy responsibility? Every possible consequence that may follow in her life. Why say “every possible,” for this seems an exaggeration? Because here there is no question about an occurrence and its consequences, but about an act and about ethical responsibility, against the consequences of which I dare not arm myself by being courageous, since in this courage consists precisely in laying myself open to them. What may serve as thy excuse? That my individuality as a whole disposed me to conduct which on all hands I find confirmed and which, were I to seek a confidant, I should find corroborated: "that a melancholy person should not worry his wife with his sufferings, but should keep them closely to himself like a man." What is thy comfort? That while recognizing this guilt I have likewise a presentiment of a divine governance in the whole affair. Precisely because I have considered the matter to the best of my ability and have acted as honestly as I could by virtue of this recognition, precisely for this reason I perceive a co-operation which led me on to a point where I understood myself as perhaps I never could have done in any other way, but also taught me this in such a way that I shall not become arrogant. What is thy hope? That it may be forgiven — if not here, at least in eternity. Is there no hitch with regard to this forgiveness? Yes indeed, there is the fact that I have not her forgiveness; and she is and remains a court of first resort which cannot be ignored. Her forgiveness cannot indeed justify me eternally, any more than a man's implacability can injure anybody but this man himself, but her forgiveness is part and parcel of the divine juridical procedure. Why hast thou not her forgiveness? Because I could not make myself comprehensible to her. It would indeed have been far easier for me if only I could have secured that and been exempted from the dreadful hovering in which I find no foothold but by assuming the utmost possibility of responsible obligation. No question was asked thee about the easiest or the hardest, for a man may choose the wrong even when he chooses the hardest — so then, why dost thou not possess it? Because I could not get it. When I dissolved my engagement to her by my letter I made request for that. This she would not understand and therefore compelled me to employ the only means left for rescuing her, namely, to put the misunderstanding of deceit between us. My continuation in this course showed me that the deceit itself really expressed the truth, that she did not understand me. Her opinion of me was that I had more inclination for the world, that I wanted to have my freedom because the relationship was too narrowing for me. Precisely because this was her opinion it offended her pride, and therefore she was reckless in employing every expedient. To win me back again she had to rely essentially upon bringing me back to my duty and touching me sympathetically. If at that juncture I had talked plainly and said, “The maintenance of this relationship is my own wish” — then I would not have been allowed to say more, but she would have exulted somewhat in this fashion: “O my dear, thou dost not know how happy thou hast made me. It is thine own wish. Ah, I had given up hope of it and had learned to content myself with something less until it might again become thy wish; but now all is well, indeed it is splendid. It is thy wish and my wish, so every obstacle is removed.” What does that mead? It means that she does not understand me. So I did not elect to make myself understood, but understandable to her, for she could understand that I was tired of her, that I was a deceiver and a twaddler. Her salvation depended upon my holding fast to this. But what then would it signify if I were suddenly to beg for her forgiveness? It would sound like making a fool of her. The word forgiveness uttered between us puts everything upon a religious basis. To trick her out of an expression of forgiveness is not what is required of me. If I were to talk, I must admit my fault, but also, if the thing is to be serious, she must be able to understand my justification. As soon then as the talk began she would confine herself to understanding the first half, and thereupon understand nothing of the rest, that is to say, she would misunderstand the first part as well. If I could have been comprehensible to her in my whole construction, and her forgiveness could thus be something more than a situation in comedy, her conduct towards me would have been so shocking that she rather would have been in need of my forgiveness, and so I did enough with that letter. But as the case then stood, every utterance of mine could only contribute to make the two months still longer, for she would be led thereby to become more and more vehement in her attack — although without gaining anything. Hence the few serious words I stealthily mingled with the confusion are what I most have to reproach myself for. So then I have no forgiveness. An official forgiveness between two persons who do not understand one another is an empty ceremony and as questionable as a written contract made between two persons of whom one can neither write nor read writing. The great reciprocal security of having a written rather than a verbal agreement vanishes in a double way: he who cannot read writing has nothing to rely upon but what he has heard, and whether it stands written as it was read to him he does not know; the other has the onus of vouching for both, although the document should be mutual. Before I can have real forgiveness she must be able to put herself in my situation, otherwise her forgiveness is like a written declaration by one who cannot read writing, indeed her forgiveness is still less than that, because the man who cannot read writing can nevertheless understand very well what the question is about, but forgiveness by one who cannot or will not understand what the question is about is just as meaningless as a grant made in response to a petition by one who does not know what the petitioner asked. Lo, it is for this reason I have no forgiveness. I believed that I did her more honor by not getting such a thing out of her by craft, I have done what I thought I owed to her, or rather the thing was done for her sake: forgiveness has been made as difficult for me as possible. My break with reality was of such a sort that it is a simple consequence from it that a genuine forgiveness on her part is unthinkable, for this would define me as in continuity with reality.

This is the position of the case in time. As for eternity, it is my hope that we shall be comprehensible to one another, and that there she will forgive me. In time it remains a dialectic sting in my pain, which wounds me in many ways, inasmuch as it brings to confusion my life-view, as well in the direction of sympathy as in the direction of deceit. There is something alarming in the thought that a deceit, be it ever so pious and well meant, should have the ascendancy, and there always remains open the possibility that the deceit may acquire an epigrammatic power to satirize. The most poetical act is also the most ethical. On her part it would be the most poetical thing to remain devoted to me or to remain true to herself in her love, and this would also be the most terrible revenge upon me. Every prosaic revenge makes eo ipso my responsibility lighter, because it is less ethical.

How consistent existence is! There is nothing true in one sphere which is not true in the other. What a deep responsibility, that the laws of existence are such that everyone must serve them whether he will or no. The Governance which requires placability of every man knows also how to revenge itself, for precisely when the individual would revenge himself the case becomes easiest for the guilty one; and on the other hand, when the offended man chooses to be placable, Governance lays the emphasis of revenge upon this gentleness. Caesar performed many glorious deeds, but if there were recounted only one single word he is reputed to have said, I should admire him: “Cato deprived me of my most beautiful victory, for I should have forgiven him.”

What I demand of existence is that it would let it become clear to me whether I was ensnared in an illusion or loved faithfully, more faithfully perhaps than she. How long I am to hold out is not known. If the age of oracles has long ago vanished, there is yet one thing about which the simplest and the profoundest man when talking of it must talk enigmatically, and that is time. It undoubtedly is the most difficult enigma, and is also to be accounted the profoundest wisdom, to arrange one's life as if today were to be the last one has to live, and at the same time the first in a series of years.

June 19. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. Yet these tears which torture themselves out of her eyes, torture out the possibility of impossibilities from my brain. Even though it be a superfluous ceremony, I cannot help it. So I shout out into the world if anyone were to hear me: "I make my bid, I bid half my life for half a year of happiness with her, I bid it for a fortnight, I bid it for the marriage day — does not the hammer fall?"

No! — But I must to work. He who has a life sentence is employed in labors dangerous to life. So it is also with me and with my labor.

Today there fell from her lips the most remarkable line I have ever heard from any actress. In a sense it was a shot straight at the heart. In target shooting, when a shot falls in the center, the umpire first takes the precaution to ascertain whether it was not an accidental shot, a shot in the air, a shot without aim, a gun which perhaps went off without anybody firing it. She said to me that she really believed I was mad. But then upon examination it proved to be a wild shot; and there is perhaps no word of hers which more plainly proves to me our diversity. Yes, it is true, a melancholy man is in a certain sense mad, but it requires a great deal of dialectic and a great deal of pathos to comprehend this madness. One who makes this remark pretty much as one might say of a man ridiculously dressed, “Oh, he’s mad,” proves eo ipso that he has not a trace of a presentiment as to what madness really is. The whole thing was a false alarm. It was a quick-tempered outburst which in its precipitancy didn’t know what else to say. And a little quick-tempered she is now and then. She says that I ant malicious, not kind. That she said again yesterday. Such a thing is desirable as an incitement to my palaver, which at once seized upon it. “Yes, I see that now. We understand one another. The thing is perfectly simple. Thy declaration is pretty much to this effect: ‘So help me God, the undersigned declares, I do indeed feel esteem, do utter and subscribe esteem’... or what was it I wanted to say? It was in fact esteem thou dost not feel, I am getting all muddled, in romances the lovers always have esteem — so then what thou wouldst say is, ‘I feel no esteem, genuine love cannot be conceived without esteem, therefore’ etc. That as thou dost perceive, can be argued in two ways. For when esteem and love combine against a man, then good night, Ole. On the other hand, either by the help of esteem or of love one can get out of the fix quite well. For if one will consider what esteem properly is” — here I was interrupted. She cannot help laughing when I am thoroughly launched upon the sea of galimatias. This comforts me. At bottom she suffers from this less than I who in a desperate way must work her loose.

June 24. Midnight.

NOT even what I write here is my inmost meaning. I cannot so far trust myself to paper, although in the writing I see my meaning. Think of what might happen! The paper might get out of my hands, a fire might break out where I dwell and I be left in uncertainty whether it was burned or whether it existed, I might die and so leave it behind me, I might become insane and my inmost thoughts fall into the hands of a stranger, I might become blind and not be able to find it, not know whether I was holding it in my hands without asking another, and not know whether he lied, whether he read what was written there or something else for the sake of inquiring into my affairs.

I can remember it, however, and more swiftly than the briefest fraction of an instant passes. Lessing was wrong after all when he said that the swiftest thing, swifter than sound or light, is the transition from good to bad. For still swifter than that is the zugleich, the "at once." Transition itself is a time, but that which is at once is swifter than any transition. After all, transition is a determinant of time, but the haste with which that is present which once was and never is forgotten, this haste, in spite of the fact that the thing is present, is the swiftest of all things, for it is so swift that its being gone was only a delusion.

June 20. Morning.

TODAY a year ago.

I bid my whole life for the wedding day; and indeed we are two who bid. No, that we are not, for she is willing to strive but would also have a future. Naturally she must not leave her honor and pride in the lurch. The hammer does not fall.

Day before yesterday the small talk kept on indefatigably as usual. We talked about my discharge, "and that would be the wisest thing she could do, if I might advise. The consequence would be that I should come back like a wet dog." This advice she received with a laconic "Indeed!," to which she added, "No, I don't trust thee over the threshold." I can see from this what a poor opinion she has of me after all, and what a mistaken overestimate she has of the importance of her personal presence. That is lucky. But then, just as the small talk was going on at its best, she burst into tears. He who is in desperate danger always possesses supernatural powers, and therefore my mien remained entirely unchanged. Thereupon she said, "Let me weep, it is a relief." All torture is forbidden by law, but verily this is a dreadful torture. But I must show respect for the argument — only not in such a way that it disturbs me. And there is also a comfort in the fact that I did not shirk the sight of a thing from which ordinarily a man in my position who is about to appear in a despicable rôle would be inclined to excuse himself. Then the small talk got started again, and the whole thing certainly signifies not so much to her as to me.

Not to dare to utter a serious word! — for it would be crazy for me the guilty one to admonish or console. But is it not also crazy for me to sit here and look on? But one good thing about it is that it furnishes her with an incitement, even though it be against her will, to come out with such utterances. When I am away she would hardly do it, and perhaps would feel no impulsion to do it.

Suppose a third person had been a witness of this situation! Suppose that one who never did anything else but write riddles and one who had grown old in guessing riddles were to combine and make a guess which of the two suffers most, upon whom it makes the deepest impression! Tell me then, thou man of wide experience, about a whirlwind which brought existence to confusion — yet I have seen a confusion where it was as if the tumult would not harken to a rower of honest will. Talk about a dead calm which reduced all effort to despair — yet I saw a dead calm where a lover labored and labored and almost became the murderer of his beloved, not for maliciousness, not by accident, but in conformity with his most honest conviction.

June 30. Midnight.

WHAT is my life but a striving after wind? My existence is nothing but molimina, useless effort; I cannot return to myself. Whether in time that ever shall come about, I do not know. And if I become free, so that again I can collect myself, I shall have trouble enough in separating from me the heterogeneous, which after all I do not wish to separate. If I become free, then in my close reserve there will still remain the distress that she has become changed.

So it is a mussel lies on the seashore; it opens its shell in search of nutriment, a child sticks a twig into it, so that it cannot shut. Finally the child grows tired of the play and would pull the twig out, but there remains a splinter. And the mussel shuts its shell; but deeply within its shell it suffers and cannot get the splinter out. That there is a splinter, no one can see, for the mussel has shut itself, but that it is there, the mussel knows.

But away with despondency. It is a fraud against her and is essentially foreign to my soul. If the Jewish high priest was forbidden to rend his garments as a sign of mourning, because this was too passionate and strong an expression, so also am I forbidden to be despondent, because it is too apathetic and too weak. But the fact that for an instant I have become despondent shows me that for the first time in my life I have trusted my common sense against her. What it might say to me I have always known, but I have not been willing to hear it. The impression of that meeting has given my common sense the predominance.

Yet sympathy reduces me at last to beggary. I am like that Englishman who got into pecuniary embarrassment although he had a five-hundred-pound note in his hand — but nobody could change it in the village where he was. But should the expression of sympathy be comparable to exchanging a coin of great value and paying it out in small bits? I supposed that sympathy was like that shilling in Fortunatus's purse, one constantly gives it out whole, and one constantly has the whole left, and if one would convert it into change, the magic vanishes. Behold, this consoles me.

July 2. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. An eyewitness of my situation would say to me, “Thou dost not know what love is, seeing thou dost behave thus.” Maybe, but this much I know, that I am acquainted with its pain. Its pleasures I am acquainted with also, but at a distance, at a very great distance. If it were possible, if only it were possible — I should wipe away every tear from her eyes, ah, as schoolchildren do, so that no one shall see that they have wept. Then the pain is forgotten, more than forgotten. Swiftly, by the omnipotence of love, as swift as the growth of the plant which is tended by fairies, she develops, more charming than ever, by her own force, by the burgeoning power of love, and by my breath upon her, and by the word which is whispered in her ear; then I take her upon my arm and rush out with her through the world — so far at least I understand love. But precisely this understanding I have of love might easily make me lose my understanding and go mad. Never in all my life until now have I felt the temptation of suicide. But the anguish of sympathy! — and with that to be the guilty one! This contradiction has just such an effect upon my soul as when in a physical sense a man’s joint is twisted out of its natural position. But what would be the use of suicide? Yes, it would prevent her from being mortified, for then she could live on as mine, if she would. But suppose one day she were to get to know it — that would be still more terrible. If she had understanding, she surely would perceive that she never ought to have brought me to this extremity. And so I would have made her guilty. And by such a step I perhaps would have determined her whole life, so that in finite existence she would not seek healing where properly she must seek it.

Spiritually speaking, she does not suffer so much. She is not so much exhausted as she is tired, with a little touch of feeling bored. Humanly speaking, this does not surprise me, for she has no confidant, and I am untiring in nonsense.

The days are numbered. Suppose she were now to fall ill before the last day had come. Suppose that in the delirium of fever she were to betray what was passing between us. Her closest kindred would believe that this was imagination — and I who knew that it was reality! And then when she recovered and we had to begin all over again.

July 3. Midnight.

WHEN shall we see one another again? In eternity. So there is time enough for reaching an understanding. When does eternity begin? What language is spoken there? Or is perhaps none spoken? Might there not be a little interim? It is continually bright daylight in eternity? Might there not be a morning twilight when one would find understanding in intimacy? What is the judgment of eternity? Is the judgment complete before eternity begins? How is eternity represented? Like the wide horizon where one sees nothing. So it is represented in the picture of the grave: the mourner sits in the foreground and says, “He went hence into the beyond.” But in the wide horizon I see nothing at all. So neither do I see her. This is impossible! I must see her. Is this no argument? Or is it a better argument, that whether I will or no, I must see her? Suppose she had forgotten me. Can we then see one another? Suppose she had not forgiven me. Then indeed she had not forgotten me. But can we then see each other? Suppose she were standing beside another. When she stands thus in time, I am in the way, and therefore I will withdraw. But if I stood in her way in eternity, whither shall I go away? Is time then stronger than eternity? Has time power to separate us eternally? I supposed that it only had power to make me unhappy in time, but must let me go as soon as I exchange time for eternity and am where she is, for eternally she is with me. If so, what then would time mean? It would mean that we two did not get a chance to see one another yesterday evening; and if she were to get another man, it means that we did not get a chance to see another yesterday evening because she was out somewhere else. And who was at fault? Yes, the fault was mine. But would I or could I now act otherwise than as I did, if it is assumed that the first thing had come about? No! I regret the first. From that moment I acted in accordance with the most honest premeditation and with all my might, as I also did in the first act, until I perceived my error.

But does eternity talk so lightly about guilt? Time at all events does not; it still will go on teaching me what it has taught me, that a life is something more than a yesterday evening. But eternity will also heal all sickness, give the deaf hearing, the blind sight, and the deformed man bodily beauty, and so it will also heal me. What is my sickness? Melancholy. Where is the seat of this sickness? In the power of imagination, and possibility is its nutriment. But eternity takes away the possibility. And was not this sickness hard enough for me to bear in time, that I not only should suffer but become guilty through it? The deformed man has after all only to bear the,,pain of being deformed, but how dreadful if being deformed made him guilty!

So then, when for me time has come to an end, let my last sigh be to Thee, O God, for my soul's blessedness, the next to the last for her, or let me for the first time be again united with her in the last sigh.

July 6. Midnight.

TODAY I saw her. How strange a chance! A thunder shower obliged me to take refuge in the shop of my old pastry cook, where I had not been since those days of waiting: erat in eo loco vicinio tonstrina quaedam. Such a barber shop is the nearest equivalent, said the teacher, to what we know as a coffeehouse. Eo sedebamus plerumque dum illa rediret. The shower was soon over, the air mild and inviting, everything refreshed and rejuvenated. If I had not been absorbed in recollections, I scarcely would have stayed so long. The old pastry cook came out to greet me and entered into conversation. Everything combined to benumb my senses. I sat in my old seat and sometimes cast my eye out of the window — then she came walking by. She was walking with another young girl, both engaged in lively conversation, she merry and hale and happy. Was she coming perhaps from her singing, my beloved songstress? Is she taking up her singing again? Is the song merely a different one?

Would that for half a year I might be transformed into a woman in order to understand her nature! The scale I apply is perhaps too great.

It seems like old times, she goes to her singing, she comes away from it, joyful as she used to be. But there is no one waiting for her. Here in the coffeehouse there is in a sense no one, but perhaps elsewhere. After all, one often hears of a girl overcoming pain and falling in love again. And in this case indeed the situation precisely prompts some such course, for in fact I was not her lover but a deceiver. One often hears also that a girl could not live without a man, and it was true, only it turned out to be not that man but another.

Thus we are back in the old situation, with an alteration, and I remain unaltered in it. I can truly say, “I remain,” etc., but it is not easy to say what I remain. I assume that she has become another’s, but what then do I remain? And yet not thus! I cannot thus let her go! That almost crazy wish to see the relationship reestablished is now resolved into another like it, that if she is to become another’s, this other might be her first love. Thus she has not broken with the idea and not lost my esteem. True enough, what does she care about losing my esteem? But she should not think thus, for my view is more considerate of her than is that of any other. Though all the rest of the world has another view, that is merely a signal for battle. But the misfortune is that I know nothing at all about such an earlier love. However, it must be remembered that I was too much absorbed in myself and too much occupied ethically to learn to know about such a thing. So it might be possible. It is a bit of a satire upon me if something of the sort was the case and I remained unaware of it. She did not feel called upon to say anything, and perhaps my reserve influenced her in this way. So it might be possible. Would it were also actual! And if it were actually so, how lucky I did not know it. Perhaps I might have taken the affair too lightly, and the event would not have assumed for me the importance it has assumed.

What do I remain? Yes, that is not easy to say. But in case it were not I myself that had experienced this history, and another were to relate it, I should believe that he was talking about me, so perfectly does it fit my case.

With her I should less than ever be able to talk if she were to become the wife of another. Am I to modify the deceit a little and seek a mutual understanding based on the fact that so does Jack and so does Gill and so do they all? That indeed would be a new untruth, for I am entirely unchanged and it has never occurred to me to think of any other girl. Might I speak with the passion of truth and be satirical against my will? She herself is at fault for a part of the confusion, for she disturbed the erotic by playing false in the religious sphere. She would not rest satisfied with the erotic, with being loved or not loved, and what for her was the logical consequence of this, but she grasped at the religious sanction and became for me in responsibility a gigantic figure. Notoriously it has brought about a war between great powers that a prince sent back a king's daughter; for me my strife was still more terrible when I rejected her, for it was God who had betrothed her to me. So I have regarded the case. But the dreadful seriousness transforms the erotic into something almost comic; for, thinking pathetically, I might say that though she had been as ugly as original sin, as ill tempered as the day is long, yet for me she would have had the same significance — but this is speaking entirely unerotically. And whose fault is it that I must speak thus? It is hers who transformed an erotic relationship into a religious.

Only when I am silent can I keep my soul pathetically behind the deceit of the comic, or behind the cover of the pretense that I have long forgotten the whole thing.

July 7. Morning.

TODAY a year ago. Let us see. My philosophy of life was that under my reserve I concealed my melancholy. It was my pride that I was able to do that, it was my determination to keep that up with all my might. I have come to wreck. Upon what? Upon the incompatibility of individual disposition and upon the wedding as a protest in virtue of that. What is it that confounds my life? That to me the maxim becomes meaningless: ultra posse nemo obligatur. What is my guilt? That I have ventured upon an undertaking I could not achieve. What is my fault? That I have made a person unhappy. In what way unhappy? In possibility — in such a way that I have a murder upon my conscience in consequence of her utterance and by virtue of possibility. What is my punishment? To endure this consciousness. What is my hope? That a merciful Governance will in actuality make this punishment less by helping her. What does my understanding say about her? That there is not exactly any probability of the worst. What consequence has this for me? None at all. An ethical obligation cannot be discharged by any calculation of probability, but only by assuming the utmost possible limit of responsibility.

I went to her. I approached her with an unusual appearance of gladness and declared that it was possible to do as she wished. It is easy to explain that so long as one is fighting, even if one is capable of understanding what sympathy enjoins, one can forget this consideration precisely because one is fighting. When one has conquered, sympathy commonly awakens most powerfully. I thought I ought to make trial of this extremest possibility, that maybe she, being moved to sympathy at having conquered, might resolve to give me my freedom. No! she accepted this declaration, but without a word in the direction of sympathy. She even accepted it rather coldly. I am glad of that, for it proves that she is tired of the thing.

I went away. At noon I returned. An absolute resolution bestows calmness, the resolution which has gone through the dialectic of fear makes one unafraid. Coldly and decisively I announced to her that it was over. She wanted to abandon herself to the most vehement expression of passion, but for the first time in my life I spoke in a tone of command. It is dreadful to take that bold step, but it was the only thing. Though she had come near dying before my eyes I should not have been able to alter my resolution. My inflexibility helped her, and what was the rashest undertaking went off in due order. One more effort still she made to move me sympathetically. It was without effect. Finally she begged me to think of her sometimes. Perhaps she meant nothing much by it, but I in my turn meant it seriously.

So it is over. If she chooses to cry, I choose the pain; and one grows tired of crying aloud, perhaps she already is; for me the turn of pain will come and come again.

What does my understanding teach me with respect to her about the use I made of the two months? She will not sorrow dangerously. In part, her passion is not very dialectic in inwardness; in part, no one will be able to provide her with so favorable a situation as she has had — for affrighting me the guilty one, for moving me by her suffering. The concern of a sympathizer cannot give such emphasis to the pain as my presence did. Reflection will not easily get a hold on her, for she has now gone through a considerable course of it. What she herself may hit upon will not be much in comparison with what I already (to the point of disgust) have perfected her in. She will not be able to arouse in herself any sympathy for me, and if there is a little left, it will soon be quenched. It will never occur to her to ask whether she might have something to reproach herself with. Perhaps she will fall ill, as one who has read too strenuously for examination falls ill after the examination is over. Of such a sickness one might die, but from this there follows no certain inference as to the propter hoc. — So far as I am concerned, she, by driving me to extremes, has helped me to withdraw my personality as far as possible out of her. If she, tired of the whole affair, were to find herself a new love, not only will I be extraneous to it, but so will be every picture of me, for she has none, at least none which has a trace of truth.

July 7. Midnight.

Lo, now I leave off for this time. My dormant period of repose with reference to her now begins. I have my discharge. The third of January the disquietude begins again. When one is discharged the command is: right face — left about — march! That is a bit satirical, for my misfortune is that I cannot do either right face, left about, or march.

The period of disquietude is the half year, which returns again and again until I become free. It is well that it was not a whole year, for then I should have had a sorrow-year in the sense that one has a church-year — the instant I was through with the old I should have to begin with the new.

An old woman used to say of the watchman when he shouted, “There is a man who is lost.” And indeed the man who is lost also shouts. So I in the period of disquietude am a shouter, a man who has lost his way.

My resolution, in faithfulness to her, is to remain faithful to the ideas and to my spiritual existence with all my might, that by experience I might be convinced that it is the spirit which giveth life, that the outward man may perish and the spirit triumph, the creature groan and the spirit exult, that I might become comforted and become joyful in spirit, renouncing all the consolations of finiteness, that I might hold out and not let the magniloquence of words end in the pettiness of deeds, and not make a deposition in high phrases and contradict myself in the deeds of finiteness. I should have been more complete if I could have remained faithful to her, it would have been something greater if my spiritual existence had had the accompaniment in daily life of marriage, and I should have understood life more surely and more easily. This is first in the order of precedence. Next comes what I do. If she were to bleed to death in useless passion, if she were not to be saved by a help which is nearer than I know of, or at least comes near enough when it is needed, then I must so labor that my existence may count for two. If she helps herself in another way, my labor is superfluous.

Suppose there was a book which was already printed and could not be reprinted, and there was no opportunity to make corrections in it, but in the list of errata there stood a phrase which surpassed in significance what stood instead of it in the text — it might be satisfied to stand among the errata, but to stand there with its great significance. Suppose there was a weed which was separated from the useful plants, so it stood in fact apart, was in fact a weed, was in fact ashamed — but suppose its name was Der stolze Heinerich.

Here ends the diary for this time. It deals with nothing. But not in the same sense as the diary of Louis XVI, the alternating contents of which are said to have been: one day, "At the chase"; the second day, "Rien"; the third day, "At the chase." It contains nothing; but if, as Cicero says, the easiest letter is the one which deals with nothing, it is sometimes the hardest life which deals with nothing.

EPISTLE TO THE READER from Frater Taciturnus

MY DEAR READER,

In case thou hast any technical competence, thou wilt instantly perceive that the figure which here is conjured up is demoniac in a religious direction, i.e. with an approach to it. How honestly, how copiously indeed, he does his part by talking to enable thee to see him (loquere ut videam), no one knows better than I, who often exhausted, often bored, have been tempted to let him alone and lose patience, which means the same thing — whence also, by observing the stars and reading the future in coffee grounds, by virtue of my inspiration as a scald and my falcon eye, I make public the peerless prediction that of the few readers of the book two-thirds will fall away before they are half way through, which may also be expressed in this wise, that they will stop there and throw away the book for boredom.

Inasmuch as he stands upon the extremest dialectic pinnacle, one must be capable of reckoning with infinitesimal quantities if one would make observations upon him. No one for a round sum (be it never so great, if only it is round) can purchase entrée to his dialectic performances, and hence in such case one would do well not to consider it worth the trouble to make observations upon a manikin like this. And yet for all that there may be some significance in observing him, because in aberrations one can make a study of the normal, and always can learn this much, if nothing else, that religion is not a thing to be poohpoohed, or something for stupid people and unshaven striplings, seeing that it is the most difficult of all things, although absolutely accessible to all — which in itself is a difficulty for the understanding, like the contradiction that the same water at the same place is so shallow that a sheep can wade it, and so deep that an elephant can swim.

The girl I have represented quite generically (as a special characteristic I have only let her lack religious presuppositions), and this I have done intentionally, in order that she might the better illuminate him and teach him to exert himself. It would require frightful exertions, it might perhaps even be impossible, to lift a small object with a jackscrew, or with a ship's derrick to hoist half a pound — and so I have reflected that if it were to come to a misunderstanding, it should be a thorough one.

However, the erotic and the erotic relationship is of minor concern to me. Essentially I employ it for orientation in the religious sphere, in order that one may not get all mixed up and suppose that religion is the first immediacy, a bit of one thing and another: instinct and natural impulse and youthfulness in which, by the addition of a little dose of spirit, fermentation has begun. — The girl is what one rightly calls a nice girl. In novels and in the drama, and that properly only in the fifth act, "such a girl" makes a man happy; in the fifth act of reality she does the best she can for him; in the psychological experiment she is unable to make him happy, not because she cannot do it (for she can), but because she cannot get to that point — hence they make one another unhappy. By equipping her differently I should merely have prevented my chief character from being adequately illuminated. By her lovableness she did him considerable service, more than any maid-of-all-work could, and that in itself is saying a good deal for a generic girl in a psychological experiment, for there she is out of place.

As a lover, the male figure would hardly get on in the world. His attitudes and his fidelity are so grandiose, so unpractical, and so awkward, that one might be tempted to ask in the words of a French writer, I think it is, whether he became mad because he was faithful to the girl, or whether he was faithful to the girl because he was mad; for as a lover he is mad. If he really existed, and if I were capable of bestowing flesh and blood upon the figure in the experiment, if he lived in our time and with his introversion manifested in his external appearance and not disguised by deceit, it would be a comedy complete. How droll it would be to see such an owl, troglodyte, cave-dweller, come sneaking out, after listening to men's romantic talk, and lay claim to be an unhappy lover of the first rank! He would have the street urchins following him, that is perfectly certain. Such an anachronism in the nineteenth century! — when everybody knows that the unhappy lovers are like those serpents with seven heads which Lineus proved to be nonexistent, a mere cobweb of the brain. To take seriously all that which everybody knows about loving only once, making one another happy; and to act in virtue of it with the utmost expenditure of exertion, in such a way as only in a very young man might be pardonable, and that only for half a day; to work oneself to death in such an empty ceremonious service which aims at introducing ways and customs which are entirely antiquated — that indeed would be rich material for laughter. It is a matter of course that just as one learns languages in one's childhood, so also in one's youth one lays up provision for a whole lifetime, including a little store of pretty phrases and exalted turns of expression wherewith one serves oneself and others throughout life and is sociable in friendship and friendly in society and constantly friendly. That the phrase lasts through a whole life is quite natural, all the more because it performs a rather various service, is rather fantastically dressed up for youth in its happiest day, is a pleasantry when mamma says it, a witticism in the mouth of the old man; but that love has the same imperishable quality (not to speak of an unhappy love) betrays a negligent upbringing; I at least would say with Pernille, "I give thanks in my grave to my parents that I was differently brought up." Who indeed in these days would buy, as they did in the old days, one umbrella for a lifetime, or a silk dress, a thoroughly good piece one can wear as long as one lives, or a serviceable cloak for eternity? One may willingly admit that the quality perhaps is not what it was in the case of that Chinese satin, one may willingly admit that the owner does not treat her clothes with the care which was shown for that Chinese satin, but the advantage of being able to procure the dress three or four times over, and the advantage of being able to treat one's clothes negligently, is after all very obvious. This wisdom must not be regarded as peculiar to elect individuals, fortunately (to the glory of our century) it is common among men. Hence, as rarely as one sees a cloak of Chinese satin, just so rarely does one see an unhappy lover. And then for this man to want to be an unhappy lover (although perhaps he isn't), to stake his honor upon it in fact, that is simply in sheer madness to want to take the world by the nose; the only insanity higher than this would then be that he supposed he was not the only one, but that there was a whole tribe of such people. Don Quixote believed, as is well known, that he was a knight errant. But this was not by any means the culmination of his madness. Cervantes is more profound. When Don Quixote was cured of his illness, and the Licentiate already began to hope for the recovery of his reason, he wanted to test him a bit. He talks to him about various things and suddenly intermingles with them the news that the Moors have invaded Spain. "Then," said Don Quixote, "there is only one way of saving Spain."

"What is that?" asked the Licentiate. Don Quixote will not tell him, only to His Catholic Majesty the King of Spain will he reveal his secret. Finally Don Quixote yields to the Licentiate's prayer, and he under oath of silence and with the gravity of a father-confessor receives the confession of the renowned knight: "The only way is for His Catholic Majesty to issue a summons to all knights errant." To be oneself a knight errant is, if one will, the act of a semi-lunatic, but to populate the whole of Spain with knights errant is verily delirium furibundum. In this respect my hero is more reasonable, for he has so understood the age that he remains the only knight of unhappy love.

The erotic, as was said, is of minor concern to me. I have used it as Constantine Constantius attempted to do in a work entitled “Repetition.”

(Copenhagen, 1844), but he without success because he remained within the aesthetic. The collision that through a girl a man becomes a poet and therefore cannot become her husband lies within the aesthetic. The collision is one which can arouse concern only in a young man, and I do not understand why Constantine concealed from the young man what every practitioner knows, that the collision can be resolved without the least difficulty: he marries her, and so does not become a poet. That in fact is what he fears, he does exactly the opposite, and thereby perhaps become a poet. If not every girl can make a man a poet, it is certain that every female can prevent a man from becoming such if he marries her. That I vouch for — and especially and best of all the girl who was by way of making him a poet. For the poet’s intercourse with the muse is exceedingly different from the marriage relationship, and muses, as well as whatever other fanciful beings are associated with them, do well to keep themselves at a distance; and as there is nothing so embarrassing for a being having flesh and blood as to be a muse, the object of adoration will do everything to prevent him from becoming a poet, and second every attempt on his part to become a real husband. This whole collision is the sort of thing that might have been invented by my hero, something he had happened to think of to show civility to the girl. With this it is not my intention to disparage the young man, for in his youthfulness he might have had the best of intentions. My hero on the other hand could not entertain such a fancy, he was far too much developed for that. All the better, i.e. all the more strongly, does the misunderstanding reveal itself.

Fortunately my hero does not exist outside of my thought-experiment. He cannot be exposed to ridicule in real life. This in itself is fortunate enough, but still more fortunate it is for me that it cannot be my task to dispute with him or to dialecticize him out of his dialectic difficulty. Such a person as he in actual existence would be a handful for a doctor seraphicus and a doctor contradictionum combined into one, and in the end they would perhaps be unable to accomplish anything. Whatever they might hit upon, he would answer, "I have thought of that myself; now you have only to listen" — and with that he would develop the dialectic objection until little by little he had brought out of it a variation in his favor. Neither would it be of any use to affright him with pathos, for he is also man enough to give expression to the most opposite pathetic point of view.

It is therefore by no means my purpose in what I have written to convince him, but to remark upon something true in him and in much that he says. I let him pass for what he is, an enthusiast, and an enthusiast of a peculiar sort — not only for the reason that he arrives a few centuries too late. It has been well said by Borne that "the individual enthusiasts are related to one another like the sharers in a tontine insurance policy — in proportion as they die off, the share of the survivors is greater." What wonder then that as an enthusiast he is uncommonly enthusiastic, since the whole capital with accrued and compound interest fall to him. Yet it is not only in this degree he is an enthusiast of a peculiar sort, but also for the fact that he is not an enthusiast in the form of immediacy but in the form of deceit, under which he lives freely in his enthusiasm. This is a new expression for the degree of his enthusiasm, and it proves that his is the highest sort. An immediate enthusiast (and to this class belong substantially all known examples) will either press on jubilantly through all human opposition and plant the banner of victory, or he will weigh upon existence by his suffering, i.e. in spite of all his enthusiasm the enthusiast cannot get along without the world. My hero has no desire for this. On the contrary, he would conceal his enthusiasm by an exterior the very opposite to it, and is so sure of his cause that he does not even have a mind to utter it, or, as he thinks, does not dare to.

I let him pass for what he is, and I go on to the matter I am concerned with. I will discuss it by directing attention to definite points, and in this I always have him in mente.

§ 1. WHAT IS UNHAPPY LOVE, AND WHAT IS THE VARIANT FORM OF IT IN THIS EXPERIMENT?

In unhappy love poetry has from immemorial times possessed a foil for its happy love. If, as someone has said, it was a mother at the sickbed of her child who invented prayer, which indeed is precisely apt for such a sufferer, so one might almost suppose that unhappy love was the invention of poetry. But then it is only fair that poetry should come to the aid of unhappy love, and it is not asking too much to expect that it would do so willingly.

Now it is characteristic of unhappy love that, love being assumed, there is a power which prevents it from expressing itself happily by the union of the lovers. Nothing is easier said than this, but from this trivial statement the distance is as long as the diameter of the earth's orbit to being a poet who fills this nothing by his divine pathos and his creative breath. Without pathos no poet. Pathos is primary, but the next thing, Standing in an essential and absolute relation to that, is to excogitate a profound opposition. If one were to enumerate all the obstacles to love's happiness, there would be, as on the scale of a thermometer, a plus and minus series. Beginning with the insignificant obstacles, one would reach a point where the change occurred and everything became different. For one can think of obstacles of such a sort that one might say "The task of love is to overcome them." If a poet makes choice of such obstacles as constituting unhappy love, he is no poet, but is a satirist against his will. So then it must not be in the lover's power to remove the obstacle.

So the case stands, or rather, so it remained standing many years ago. Our later age has the general fault of limping on both sides: neither believing in love as an absolute passion, nor choosing obstacles of prime quality. People offer to compound with the creditors, and they agree to it — and the article "unhappy love" drops out of circulation, and instead of it there remains "tolerably happy love," there remains equality and eins Bier for everybody.

Poetry deals with immediacy and cannot therefore think an ambiguous situation. If for a single instant it is put in doubt whether the lovers are solvent qua lovers, are absolutely ready within themselves for the union of love — a single doubt of this sort, and with that poetry turns away from the guilty one and says, "To me this is an indication that thou dost not love, hence I cannot have anything to do with thee." And in this poetry does well, if it would not become a ludicrous power, as in these latter times it often enough has been through a mistaken choice of its task.

Without passion no poet, and without passion no poetry. If then one is to press out beyond the limitations of poetry, and if this exodus is not to mean that one is lost in common sense and pitiableness, it must come about by virtue of a higher passion. To take passion away from poetry and make up for this loss by decoration, charming rural scenery, much acclaimed sylvan picnics, enchanting theatrical moonlight, is perdition, just as it is to make up for the worthlessness of a book by the elegance of the binding, which properly is of no interest to readers, but at the most to bookbinders. To take away passion from the lines of a play, and to make up for that by letting the orchestra scrape a little, is a prostitution of poetry and is comic, just as though in real life a lover, instead of having pathos in his breast, were at the decisive moment to have a music box in his pocket.

Only when to the passion of poetry there is added a higher passion have we the ambiguous situation of which we are speaking here. The task then becomes dialectic in itself, and this never can or should be the task of poetry. It is true that unhappy love, for example, has its dialectic, but it does not have it in itself but outside itself. That which in itself is dialectic contains the contradiction within itself. On the other hand, the task of the poet is simple, because the contradiction comes from without. Left to himself, the unhappy lover must be happy. To the poet this is a certainty, but the misfortune is that outside there is a power which would hinder it. In poetry therefore love does not relate itself to itself but to the world, and this relationship determines whether it is to become unhappy. As soon therefore as the sonorous note of passion ceases to sound from a single source, as soon as there is conflict in passion itself, yea, even if a higher passion announces its presence by a new sonorous note, as soon as one senses in it the concurrent sound of ambiguity, the poet can no longer deal with it. If the passion is love, this must be undialectic in itself if poetry is to see in the man an unhappy lover. If the passion is patriotism, this must be undialectic in itself, and if the hero sacrifices an erotic relationship by virtue of his patriotic passion, he is not called an unhappy lover, but is named after the passion which is undialectic in him. Thus the patriotic hero in his enthusiasm for his fatherland does not relate himself to himself but to the world about him, including a relationship of love and a relationship of patriotic piety. Thus it is that poetry must understand it. The aesthetic hero must have his opposition outside himself, not within himself. The fact that this is not the case with Hamlet is perhaps precisely the trouble with him. But of this more hereafter.

To return to unhappy love. If one will observe the outstanding figures among those unhappy ones, the men and women whom song and legend have rewarded with renown, one will at once perceive that the passion is immediate and the opposition is from without — pretty much as the priest in pronouncing the banns of betrothal thinks only of external impediments why they may not lawfully be joined together, for he too does not reflect that in the lover's own passion there might be a contradiction, for in that case he might like the poet feel prompted by a poetic vocation to say of the guilty one that he does not love. Petrarch sees Laura united to another; Abelard does not feel separated from Heloise by his clerical order (for love is the absolute passion), he is separated by Fulbert's wrath, and, alas, by his cruelty; Romeo does not feel the family hatred as the separating factor, as if through filial piety towards his father it became active in him, it is the family feud which objectively separates him from Juliet; Axel feels no scruple of conscience on account of the close kinship, and Valborg understands only that they love one another, it is the Church which separates them by its external power. Take away the impediments, and those lovers would have been the happiest of all lovers.

In our time unhappy love makes a sorry figure. One sees Romeo and Juliet but does not know quite what to make of it, at the most it is the gallery that really weeps, and moreover it is to Shakespeare rather than to Romeo and Juliet one sacrifices a tear, and at the theater one feels oneself in an almost painful situation. This is due quite simply to the fact that love, like all passion, has for the existing generation become dialectic. One cannot comprehend such an immediate passion, and even the grocer's apprentice could tell Romeo and Juliet astounding truths. It might seem then as if this inconvenience could be obviated by introducing the modern apprehension into the play and bringing it to consciousness, so that the public would not feel entirely foreign in the theater but would recognize itself at least in the grocer's apprentice. The misfortune is that this would be of no avail, for in that case the apprentice, a jejune philosopher, a director of sanitation, or whatever other representative of common sense one would cite, must come off victorious. For the seamy side of the matter is that this is precisely the truth. If this were to occur, Romeo and Juliet would not only seem foreign to the spectators, but they would lose all esteem in their eyes as stiff-necked persons whose death was not tragic but well merited for contumacy against reason. Shakespeare, it is true, has opposite points of view represented in his drama, but his definite pathos makes him just as secure in dealing with them as Romeo and Juliet were undialectic in their passion.

So when men disdain poetry and yet have no higher passion, what consequence may follow from that? Naturally, that one runs wild in half-thoughts and is beatified by conceit and self-delusion, and becomes the most boastful but not the most judicious, the generation which above every other is full of promises and lies — a thing which could easily be proved a priori. Whereas now one almost never hears tell of an unhappy lover, there is all the more competition in the claim to have been such a thing, to have suffered — even more than once — what those unhappy ones suffered, but also to have overcome these sufferings, etc., etc., etc. Poetry can make no use of such people; it demands an essential expression for what one essentially has suffered, and is not satisfied with the asseverations of a few female friends that they had witnessed her sufferings, nor with the testimony of a clergyman, even if he had a speculative eye and had gone through the requisite development. Oh, tempting fruits for a comic poet! And if some day he comes, my only concern is lest he himself, enchanted by the sight of the inexhaustible theme, might die of laughing, and so be prevented from accomplishing anything. Precisely a poet would be an apt figure for the leading rôle in such a comedy, precisely Scribe, e g., is comic in spite of his perhaps peerless talent, and comic for the fact that he has not understood himself, that he would be a poet, and yet has forgotten that poetry and passion are inseparable, and comic for having satisfied the age as a poet — the whole thing is comic in the sense of Aristophanes. Scribe's entire existence is a contradiction like that which is so often found in his plays. I will take for example La Cameraderie, his drawing-room piece, the masterly effect of which one cannot sufficiently admire. Here is described the base accord among a lot of ugly customers who in all sorts of despicable ways know how to push themselves forward by their effrontery; but a young advocate despises these ways, he therefore becomes the object of ill-natured and lying persecution — what comes of it? A young lady is so good as to take an interest in him, she is not unpracticed in intrigue, she succeeds completely, and the advocate comes to honor and high estate. So the result is that one coterie triumphs over the other, one intrigue gets the better of the other. Just as the rubric "unhappy love" went out of use, and instead of two opposites we got one single sort, "the tolerably happy love," so too has the opposition, honesty/dishonesty, virtue/baseness, gone out of use, and we get one sort, the tolerably honest, or the pretty nearly honest.

Now that love itself has become dialectic, poetry must give it up; for the fact that it has become dialectic signifies: first, that the poet cannot get at his task, cannot get to the point of beginning, because the introduction is such that the issue is critical; second, because there is no assurance whatever that the issue will be happy if only all outward obstacles are cleared away; and finally, because in case of death there is no assurance whatever that it is a heroic death for love's sake and for passion, since he dies perhaps of a fever incurred from catching cold.

If then the fact is brought to consciousness that love has been given up as an absolute passion, poetry must give it up, and where the carcass is, there will the vultures be gathered together — here in the form of novelists, feuilleton writers, hermaphroditic tragi-comic poets who do not definitely know whether they want to be authors of tragedy or comedy and hence are neither the one nor the other, for without passion no poet, not even a comic poet. If poetry is to continue to exist, it must discover another passion which is just as legitimate a subject of poetry as love was. It would not be difficult to show that no such substitute exists because of the peculiar synthesis of the erotic. However, I will not develop this theme here, but neither will I require any man to believe that I can do it, seeing that I do not do it. Yet there are also other passions which in the eyes of poetry are legitimate. But the same thing which weakens men's faith in love, namely, a lack of a sense for the infinite, will also weaken faith in the other passions. Forsaken then by poetry men will work their way down in finiteness till they get to politics in the bad sense. If politics is conceived with the passion of infinity, it will of course be able to furnish heroes such as there were in old times when people also believed in love. In the world of infinity it holds good that he who offends in one thing offends in all; for he who has a sense for infinity has a sense for every infinity. The same reflection which has demolished love will also demolish the infinite passion of politics. The heroic man in such an age is the man who wants to labor for a finite aim, is ready, he says, to sacrifice his life for it, perhaps through an inadvertence actually comes to that, and through a new inadvertence is canonized as a hero. Such a figure, however, is quite unserviceable for poetry (unless he were to be used as the sausage maker is used by Aristophanes), he is unpoetic and contradicts himself. It is quite consistent of politics that in our day it does not prompt its votaries to enthusiasm for sacrifice, since it prompts no enthusiasm at all. With enthusiasm the sacrifices would come of themselves. It is a contradiction to sacrifice one's life for a finite aim, and such conduct is in the eyes of poetry pure comedy, just as it is to dance oneself to death, or to want to walk with spurs when one is bow-legged and trip over them and depart this life — rather than give up wearing spurs. Oh, tempting theme for a comic poet! He shall not lack material, for politics does not lack servitors. An apt figure for the principal rôle might be a politician who in spite of all his shrewdness wants to be enthusiastic, wants to be a sacrifice, but is not willing to sacrifice himself, not willing to fall, but would himself be witness to the applause, and hence cannot get to the point of falling, and perhaps in the last resort is the only man who stands in his way — an enthusiast who has no inkling of what enthusiasm is. His pathos would culminate in this sentence, which inconceivably enough was not long ago posted in a public place: "I would sacrifice my life, no one shall say that I do not possess heroic courage, but this blind courage is not the highest, therefore I restrain myself" — and continue to live; therefore I restrain myself and let another less important person fall in my stead. Plaudite. It is natural that a shrewd politician is shrewd enough to perceive (what is hidden from simpler minds) how important his life is for the state, that if he lives long no one will come to want; but enthusiasm this is not. All enthusiasm is a consequence of the passion of infinity, where this great man and that for all their shrewdness vanish as a thing of naught. God help poetry! By the aid of politics it is put on a diet of bread and water. Already Aristotle has divided men into θεολογοι, φιλόσοφοι, πολίτικοι. Politicians come last — not to speak of the politicians of finiteness, who renounce the passion of infinity, they come last of all, or rather trailing on behind — that always makes pretty thin beer. There is no enthusiasm in believing in oneself, still less in believing in one's bit of shopkeeper-shrewdness; all enthusiasm is a consequence either of faith in one's passion or, more deeply, of faith in a providence which teaches one that even the death of the greatest man is a mere jest for a providence which has legions of angels in reserve, and that therefore he shall walk resolutely to his death, leaving his good cause to providence and his posthumous fame to the poet. As one rarely sees an unhappy lover in our time, so it is just as rare to see a martyr in the world of politics; but on the other hand there is a general competition about, "The devil take me if I'm not willing to be that, yes, to have been that, if one did not perceive that it is greater," etc.; and politics has innumerable hosts of titular heroes and volunteer martyrs, not under arms but inter pocula. They all have that magnanimous willingness for heroic death, but with an equally heroic wisdom have perceived "that it would be better on the whole, for the community; that one owes it to mankind to live... and carouse." There is still one step left, and that is a veritable ne plus ultra — this is when such a life-assuring generation of parlor-politicians conceives that it is an injustice on the part of poetry not to choose its heroes among the worthy contemporaries. But it does poetry an injustice, or rather, it had better not stir it up too far, lest the thing end with its taking by the collar the first sausage maker that comes to hand and making him a hero à la Aristophanes. In no other way can poetry show its enthusiasm for swearing and bluffing at the card table.

So it seems as though the age of poetry were past, and especially tragedy. A comic poet will lack a public, since not even the public can be in two places at once — on the stage and in the audience. Moreover the comic poet has his stronghold in a pathos which lies outside the play, and he proves by his existence that the age of poetry is past. He who would set his hope upon a speculative drama serves poetry only in so far as he serves comedy. If a wizard or a sorcerer were to bring such a thing to pass, if by the support of a thaumaturge (for a dramaturge would not suffice) it were to satisfy the requirement of the age as a poetic work, this event would indeed he a good motif for a comedy, though it would attain the comic effect through the medium of so many presuppositions that it would not become popular.

That the age of poetry is past signifies essentially that immediacy is no more. Immediacy is not entirely devoid of reflection; as poetry conceives it, it has a relative reflection by having its opposition outside itself. But only then is immediacy really at an end when the immediate infinity shall be grasped by an equally infinite reflection. That very instant all tasks are

To return to the subject of love. When love is not secure in itself, this means that it is not simply a given fact, as in poetry, having its obstacles outside itself, but finds its obstacle within itself. There thus presents itself a task which every poet must discard, but which nevertheless is very important. It is a problem which can be conceived in various ways, and one of these I have chosen in my psychological experiment. There love is assumed, no obstacle is to be seen, on the contrary there is peace and security, a dead calm favors it. But in the fact that it has to be introduced into the infinite reflection it stumbles upon difficulties. Thus the difficulties do not arise from collision with the world, but from the fact that love has to reflect itself in the individuality. The problem is so dialectic that the fact of love encountering in itself a stumbling block may tempt one to affirm that it is not love. In fact, if this is not a religious collision, the problem has no existence whatever except as prattle; for poetry is glorious, religion still more glorious, but what lies between them is prattle, no matter what talent is wasted upon it.

Love then encounters a stumbling block, or so it seems to the individual, and he says to himself that his is an unhappy love. I express myself very dubitatively and do not for my part possess the passion of my knight but am trying to understand him. The poet would now ask him, “What is the obstacle, is it cruel parents who must be mollified, is it a family feud which must be conciliated, is it a papal dispensation which must be obtained, another man who must be done away with, or (alas, I have reason to feel sorry for myself and for my poverty) is it a mite I must throw to thee, art thou in need of money in order to be happy? Very well (unless thou dost prefer to be in one of the first four cases), I will make thee unhappy but a hero. The man in question answers, “No.” Then the poet turns away and says, “Well, my dear friend, then thou art not in love.” Poetry is willing to do everything for love, willing to beautify the happy, willing to chant the praises of the unhappy, but in its amiable naïveté it must know one thing surely, namely, love, lest when it has done everything, it might suddenly discover that was all in vain, because there were other obstacles.

In order to hold the problem fast one must continually perform double-movements. No one who is unable to do that can see the problem at all, and good luck to him if he has not also lost his pleasure in poetry. But if a man can do it, then he knows also that the infinite reflection is not something heterogeneous to him but is the transparency of immediacy to itself.

If it be assumed that love has happily passed through the infinite reflection, then there is something else, there is religion; if it comes to grief by the way, it comes to grief upon the religious. Perhaps this may not be perceived at once, because often enough under the name of infinite reflection one thinks of finite reflection. In comparison with every finite reflection immediacy is essentially the higher, and it feels offended at the assumption that it has to deal with such a thing. The poet understands this very well, and for this reason the obstacles come from without, and tragedy consists precisely in the fact that such obstacles as these have in a sense the power to triumph over the infinity of immediacy; and only Philistines and hermaphrodite poets think otherwise. But an infinite reflection is infinitely higher than immediacy, and in it immediacy relates itself to itself in the idea. But this phrase, “in the idea,” denotes a God-relationship in the widest circumference, and within this circumference there is a multiplicity of more definite determinants.

In immediacy there is the idea, the poet in fact sees it, but it does not exist for his hero, or he in his relation to it is not related to himself. Precisely on this account he is not free in his passion. Freedom indeed does not mean that he is to give up his passion, but freedom means that he uses the passion of infinity whereby he might give it up in order to hold it fast. Such a thought the poetic hero is quite unable to think, and the poet does not allow him to think it, for that very instant he ceases to be a poetic figure.

So in the infinite reflection freedom is won — a freedom which may be affirmative of love or negative. In my experiment I have chosen protestation against the immediate passion of love, and with this the double-movement is clearly visible. At one and the same time he is holding fast to his love, encounters no opposition from without, where on the contrary everything smiles favorably and threatens to be transformed into horror if he does not follow his wish, threatens him with certain loss of honor, with the death of the loved one — so at one and the same time he is holding fast to his love, and yet in spite of all that he will not, he cannot realize it.

The situation is so dialectic that one must not be in too much of a hurry, for that would only produce confusion. But if it is true that the time of immediacy is past, then the thing is to win the religious, nothing intermediate is of any avail. And for the man of whom it is true that the time of immediacy is past the most difficult dialectic movement will be popular, though I am very willing to concede that in any other case my experiment is far from being of a popular character. People generally believe that what makes a presentation of thought unpopular are the many technical terms of scientific phraseology. That however is an entirely extrinsic sort of unpopularity, which scientific speakers have in common, e.g. with sea-captains, who also are unpopular because they speak a jargon, and by no means because they speak profoundly. Therefore time and again the phraseology of a philosophy may penetrate even to the common man, proving that its unpopularity was only extrinsic. A “systematic” handicraftsman may be unpopular, but he is not intrinsically unpopular, because he does not attach much thought to the exceedingly strange things he says (and, alas, this is a very popular art); Socrates, on the other hand, was the most unpopular man in Greece, precisely because he said the same thing as the simplest man, but attached infinite thought to it. To hold on persistently to one thought, to hold on to it with ethical passion and intrepidity of spirit, to see the essential duplicity of this one thought without loss of equanimity, and at one and the same time to see in it the deepest seriousness and the highest jest, the deepest tragedy and the highest comedy, that at all times is unpopular for everyone who has not comprehended that the time of immediacy is past. But what is intrinsically unpopular is not a subject to be learned by rote. But of this more hereafter.

So this is the problem I have propounded to myself: a story of unhappy love where love is dialectic in itself and in the crisis of the infinite reflection acquires a religious aspect. One easily sees that this presents a different problem from that of any other type of unhappy love; one sees this easily when one sees both of the contrasted sides, otherwise one sees perhaps neither of them.

§ 2. MISUNDERSTANDING EMPLOYED IN THIS EXPERIMENT AS THE TRAGIC AND COMI-TRAGIC PRINCIPLE.

When Claudius says that misunderstanding is essentially due to the fact people do not understand one another, in this naïve humor which simulates immediacy, there lie hidden the distinctions which on being educed characterize the tragic and the comic; and hence this naïve pronouncement takes on a different significance according as one or the other of these opposite passions gives emphasis to it. The tautology in this saying may be an incitement to the comic as well as to the tragic passion. In itself, however, the saying is simply humorous. So Socrates might well have said ironically in the indeterminate situation of a colloquy, “By the gods, it is very strange, dear Polos, that we do not understand one another; there must be some misunderstanding." An enthusiast would exclaim tragically, "Oh, misunderstanding! Oh, that we are not able to understand one another!" Viewed from the uniting point of the comic and the tragic the saying would not be humorous but profound. That is to say, a misunderstanding being posited between two people, they will not be able so long as they misunderstand one another to allege any other ground for it but misunderstanding. If the ground of misunderstanding is given, the discrimen of the misunderstanding is resolved. Hence the two might well continue to misunderstand one another, but yet understand one another fundamentally.

Now misunderstanding exists wherever the heterogeneous is brought together, but observe that it must be a heterogeneity such as does not exclude a relationship, for otherwise there is no misunderstanding. It can therefore be said that at the bottom of misunderstanding lies an understanding, i.e. a possibility of understanding. If impossibility is present, misunderstanding is not. But along with the possibility there is misunderstanding, and dialectically seen it is both comic and tragic.

Poetry cannot deal with this duality; it must employ misunderstanding either comically or tragically. To this extent it is justified in putting the ground of misunderstanding in an external factor with the removal of which the parties to the misunderstanding understand one another. For if the misunderstanding is implicit in the very relationship of the heterogeneous parties to one another, the relationship is dialectic, and the misunderstanding is just as comic as it is tragic. On the other hand, when it is an external factor which separates the two in misunderstanding, these two, essentially conceived, are not persons who misunderstand but who understand, as one sees when the external factor is removed.

Not to multiply examples and comparisons, I remark merely that when poetry employs misunderstanding in connection with an unhappy love it places the misunderstanding in a fatal event, a mysterious occurrence, a wicked or foolish individual who by his interference puts misunderstanding between the two. Poetry must know that it is thoroughly assured of the possibility of real understanding, for otherwise it cannot begin at all. Take away therefore that event, that occurrence, that individual, and they understand one another, for the obstacle has merely the effect of keeping them from getting to that point. A misunderstanding such as that is not at the same time comic and tragic. The reference of the misunderstanding is plain, and what makes it tragic in the case of unhappy love is the fact that the content of love is given in the lovers' passion. Take from the two the substantial content, and then the misunderstanding is comic, the parties who misunderstand one another are precisely by the misunderstanding revealed in their emptiness, and the laughter visited upon them is the judgment by which existence is propitiated and appeased.

The fact that these two opposites exist at once is too dialectic for poetry. Even though romantic poetry puts the comic and the tragic together, it does so in the form of contrast, and at the utmost it finds a unity which is not furnished by poetry but is vaguely sensed as the negative unity of a particular philosophy of life. But this is not the same as being at once comic and tragic; on the contrary, the contrast is the separating factor which by the same pressure whereby it thrusts down the burlesque lifts up the lyrical. — In immediacy one of the two is regularly present, and the highest form of cohesion it knows is that when one has been the other follows. In the "Phaedon" this succession is beautifully expounded by Socrates, and that in a situation which made it perspicuous in the instance of a sense impression, the impression of the agreeable and the disagreeable, for one could see him sitting there and rubbing with delight the leg from which the fetter was removed and by its removal gave him delight, whereas it pained him when it was there; and he thought it would have been a task for Aesop to compose a fable about how the gods, when they were not able to unite those contending powers in any other way, had tied them together at their extremities. It is true that with this Socrates admits that the agreeable and the disagreeable do not exist at one and the same time, but for his ironic consciousness they have a negative unity. The contrasts of poetry likewise merely resolve one another. Socrates' death therefore could never be conceived by poetry. Here everything is complete, and yet poetry would only be able to see the one side, in this case of course the tragic side. At the utmost it would be able to produce a comic contrast, though this perhaps is not easy. One cannot deny that Xanthippe constitutes a comic figure with her screaming and noise-making, and that her behavior recalls many a shrewish widow's contrite advertisement of the deceased, neither can one deny that Socrates very ironically lets a comic light fall upon the scene when one beholds Xanthippe transported out of doors with all her tenderness and the screaming emotion which for many years had been saved up and hidden away for this solemn moment; but this contrast would be rather unjust and inadequate. Perhaps it would be better to form a fantastic chorus of a certain class of philologists whose "tear-compelling" observations about this paragon of virtue and his martyr-death form a good contrast to Socrates' whole view of the case. But with that the historical reality would disappear. Even Socrates' friends are farther along than poetry can go; for Phaedon himself says that as a witness to the event he was in a strange condition, an uncommon blending of joy and sorrow, in fact that those present laughed at one moment and wept at another, especially Apollodorus. And what of Socrates himself? The fact that those present laughed at one moment and wept at another shows that they had not completely understood him. Socrates in fact exemplifies a duality which poetry cannot express. If poetry would take the pathos of tragedy in order to depict Socrates as suffering like a martyr, it had better beware, for in fact he does not suffer, he already had conceived the drollery in the fact that such an ‘άτοπος τις comes to his end by being executed. Poetry cannot interpret him comically, for the fact that he himself has thought of all the comic in the situation proves precisely that he is not comic, and if ever there was a man who was not comic, it was Socrates. A tragic death as a hero is something simple, and that is what poetry loves; but if it gets an inkling at the same time that the man himself assumes that the case might also be comic, poetry must declare itself insolvent.

Before I bid farewell to poetry I must make still another observation about misunderstanding when it is employed aesthetically. Poetry may also employ misunderstanding in such a way that it applies to a single individual just because he has no point of connection with one person or more who misunderstand him. This may be either comic or tragic, according to the quality of the situation and the character of the passion involved, but it cannot be at once comic and tragic, because there is lacking the point of connection which would combine the parties to the misunderstanding in a unity, or whereby they combine in such a way that they at once hold together and yet fall apart in misunderstanding, yet cannot separate because there is this connection, and the fact that this connection is there makes the relationship at once comic and tragic. — It is tragic when an enthusiast talks to a race of old fogies and is not understood; but it is tragic only because there is no point of unity between them, for the old fogies pay no attention to the enthusiast. Gulliver's Travels is comic by reason of an imagination which verges upon madness, but the effect is merely comic, and it is comic because the content of qualitative passion is not present in the misunderstanding, even though in the poet the passion exists, for without passion no poet, not even a comic poet. If the misunderstanding has to do merely with things of no importance, it remains an idle jest. Life is rich in examples. A deaf man enters a hall while the meeting is going on, he does not want to disturb it and therefore he opens the big folding doors very slowly. Unluckily the door possesses the property of creaking. This he cannot hear, he thinks he is doing so well, and by his slow movement he produces a protracted creak; the people become impatient, one of them turns and cries “Hush.” He thinks that possibly he has moved the door too rapidly, and its creaking continues. This situation is a jest, and hence neither comedy nor tragedy can make anything out of it. Yet there is in this case a point of union remotely suggested: he does not want to make a disturbance, the meeting does not want to be disturbed, and he disturbs it. By the addition of a little more emotion and other such elements we get the many situations in which one knows not whether to laugh or weep. This is the tragi-comic, in which, since no essential passion is involved, neither the comic nor the tragic is essentially present. In the comi-tragic they are both involved, and the spirit dialectically infinitized sees both aspects in the same thing all at once.

Now for my experiment. I have brought together two heterogeneous individualities, a male and a female. Him I have treated as impelled by the intensity of the spirit towards the religious, her I have kept in aesthetical categories. Here there is plenty of room for misunderstanding so soon as I posit a point of unity, that is, that they are united in loving one another. Here the misunderstanding is not referable to any third party, as though they understood one another and were separated by a foreign power. No, ironically everything favors their misunderstanding, there is nothing to hinder them from talking with one another intimately, but precisely with that the misunderstanding begins. If I now remove the passion, it is all an ironical situation with Greek Heiterkeit] if I posit passion, the situation is essentially tragic; if I contemplate it, I declare that it is at once comic and tragic. The heroine of course cannot see it thus, she is far too immediate for that. If she sees the comic side at all, this according to the law of succession must occur at a later moment, when her own laughter would make her comic, for to laugh at a real error proves that one has fallen into a new error, and by laughing thus one is no more healed than "he is free who doth his chains deride." The hero indeed is promptly aware of the presence of the comic, which is what saves him from being comic, but for all that he is not able to see the thing as I see it who am the experimenter and have planned it all. This is due to the fact that he is in a state of passion, and the degree of his passion is showed best by the observation that because he is aware of the comic he confirms his pathos. He is in a state of passion. If I were to say to him, "Try to get out of it," he immediately would fall into another passion and say that it would be behaving basely towards the girl. So he is quite able to see the comic element in the relationship, and he can also see the misunderstanding, but he regards this view of it as a factor of subordinate importance, and out of it he develops his passion with more and more pathos. The conjunctive particle in their misunderstanding is that they love one another, but in their heterogeneity this passion must express itself in ways essentially different, and so the misunderstanding does not have to come from without but develops between them in the relationship itself. The tragedy is that two lovers do not understand one another, the comedy is that two who do not understand one another should love one another. That such a case might occur is not unthinkable, for indeed love itself has its dialectic, and even if it is a thing unheard of, an experimenter surely has plenary power to experiment. When the heterogeneity is presented as I have presented it, both parties have a right to say that they love. Love has an ethical and an aesthetic side. She says that she loves, and she possesses that love aesthetically and understands it aesthetically; he says that he loves, and he understands it ethically. So both of them love, and they love one another, and yet it is a misunderstanding. The heterogeneous is kept apart from other species by category, and so the misunderstanding is not like that of novelistic barter and exchange or of reconsideration within the aesthetic categories.

The male figure in the experiment therefore sees the comic, but not as a hardened observer sees it. He sees the comic and is thereby confirmed in the tragic. That is what interests me especially, for thereby the religious is illuminated. By force of spirit to see at once the comic and the tragic in the same thing is the culmination of paganism. In the loftier passion which out of this unity elects the tragic, religiousness has its beginning, I mean the religiousness for which immediacy is a thing of the past — and indeed it is assumed that in our age it is for all men a thing of the past, so they say. As an animal, man has two legs (extremities), and likewise the comic and the tragic are extremities necessary for movement in the case of one who would exist by virtue of spirit after having given up immediacy. And one who has only one of these legs and yet would be spirit by virtue of spirit is ridiculous, however great a genius he may be. In the equable proportion between the comic and the tragic is to be found the condition for the proper gait; the disproportion can therefore be described here as lameness, bowleggedness, clubfootedness, etc. — My knight's misfortune is that when he is about to collect himself in religiousness he becomes dialectic at the extremest point. About this more is to be said in another paragraph. Here I say only that he does not become dialectic by reason of the fact that out of the comic and the tragic he grasps the tragically higher passion (for in that case I could make no use of him), but he becomes dialectic in the last expression of this very passion. Except for this I could make no use of him whatever; for precisely in this there is discoverable a demoniac trait approximating the religious.

In order to illuminate the experiment I will examine the structure of it.

By the form of the project the duality is exhibited. In the morning he remembers actuality, at night he deals with the same story, but now as it is permeated by his own ideality. So this ideality is not an illusory anticipation which has not yet seen actuality, but it is an act of freedom after actuality. This is the difference between the aesthetic and the religious ideality. The aesthetic is higher than actuality before actuality, that is to say, in illusion; the religious is higher than actuality after actuality, that is, by virtue of a God-relationship. The duality is expressed. A poet or a lover may have an ideal conception of the loved one, but he cannot at the same time be conscious in actuality how far this is true, or be conscious in actuality how far it is not true. This contradiction is endurable only to the new ideality which comes after actuality.

So the story begins twice. I have allowed half a year to intervene, and I assume that during that time he has lived in a kind of stupor, until passion suddenly awakens on the third of January. Other interpretations might be advanced, my choice is made with a view to the general plan.

The two individualities are related to one another conversely. The critical point for her occurs in actuality, but he, who is essentially without any practical experience of the other sex, does not see this clearly, and only by theoretical exertion does he attain a presentiment of something of the sort. Shakespeare has said somewhere, I do not remember where, and I cannot quote, but it was something to this effect: The very instant before the healing of a violent disease, at the instant of convalescence, the fit is most violent; and every evil is at its worst when it takes its leave. The critical point for her, when the healing properly begins, is the moment when she has ventured everything to hold him fast, and when he thereupon, quite consistently from his point of view, ventures upon the extremest measures to fight himself free from her. The instant she felt the pain most deeply was the instant when, psychologically considered, her recovery began. His picture therefore fades even while he is present, and from the time of the separation it becomes more and more a recollection of the past. It is actuality which must help her. In the time of actuality he is strongest because he has only her as an actuality. On the other hand, the moment he sees her again, not in actuality but in the illumination of his own ideality, she is transformed into a gigantic figure. What he did in actuality, namely, the deceit whereby he actually profited her (for the relationship is so dialectic that fundamentally the deceit is her truth, i.e. what she can best understand), he cannot hold fast in her presence as he evokes her in his thought. In order to believe in the importance of the deceit he has to stand in actual relation to her and actually see her. Hence his critical moment occurs on the third of January the year following, for he has to be healed religiously, and in this regard her actuality disturbs him, he must have her ideally. Having misunderstood one another from the beginning, the misunderstanding continues after the separation and precisely then displays itself clearly. At the very moment when she is about to forget him and is well along in convalescence, and he has become unimportant to her, at that very moment she has become to him most highly important, just because he does not see her. Wheji he sees her, is with her, talks to her, he is in possession of his understanding and is strong; but as soon as he himself constructs her he loses his understanding, dare not believe in it, and the religious must more definitely work itself out. A specter is always terrifying, and that is what she is for him. But what a difference between a young girl for whom his understanding is a match, and an ideal form which advances to meet him terrifyingly, and against which his understanding is of no avail! His individuality was ethicoreligiously planned. This is what he is to become. She helps him also, but not by her actuality. Herein consists also the significance of his melancholy. His melancholy is the condensation of possibility. But when it signifies something of that sort, then of course all the talk about a young girl's cheerfulness and the tendency of marriage to disperse melancholy is an idle tale, for it should not be dispersed. On the contrary, the clouds should grow still darker before his soul, then he will be on the way to recovery. This she is unable to perceive, and she always acts in a manner consistent with her perception. Neither is he able to see it, for if he could, he would not receive the coup de grace in the way it falls with the most certain stroke by the force of his own guilt and of her peril.

The idea requires that he catch sight of her again, but in such a way, be it observed, that he does not see an actuality, for by that he would not be helped. Hence I have let him see her again several times. But these encounters were peculiar affairs. As he views the case, from his standpoint he is entirely consistent in holding the opinion that the infinity in her ought not to be troubled by intervening with half-measures. One can see at once that he is preoccupied with himself, and not with her as an actuality outside himself, for if he were thinking objectively of her, the deceit would again be in place. So then, lest he might trouble the infinity in her, he bewitches himself into a dreadful state of extinction or decease. From his standpoint this is just as energetic an expression of his love as was her vehemence, viewed from her standpoint. On both sides this of course was the most preposterous way they could behave to one another.

So then, he sees her again. But just because he holds himself like a departed spirit in order to be serviceable to her, he has prevented himself from obtaining a single direct impression. With this he is in the way of becoming normal, his aberration consists in the fact that he nevertheless concerns himself passionately about her. He never gets hold of any occurrence relating to her, or into direct connection with any such thing, never gets any certainty, but continuing passionately to concern himself about her, he picks up every report, even the most unimportant items, and he does not get a great deal more out of his dialectic exertions. [Note by Frater Taciturnus.] How exhausting such exertions must be I can see from the fact that it is exhausting even to construe the thing in thought without forgetting his dialectic difficulty at a single point, a single comma. In the entry of February 13, midnight, instead of the dialectic prolixity we find there, these words would have been enough: "The physician's report is to the effect that on the whole she is in good health." Of the few readers of this book the hasty ones have noticed nothing here, and even of the few discriminating readers perhaps only a single individual has asked, "How did he get such a direct report? He must indeed have asked somebody! And, after all, his tense passion did not prevent him from doing what in the form of possibility he must regard as the most dreadful thing." [The translator cannot suppress his surprise that Frater Taciturnus did not observe how Quidam got this direct report without asking anybody.] That is to say, he becomes more and more absorbed in himself.

So far as the meetings are concerned, they actually prove nothing to him. The inferences he draws, nobody but he would draw; and the paleness he sees I don't believe in at all, at all events I have many other explanations. That it was the third time he saw her in Hauser Square on a Thursday, no one else in his place would have discovered, still less would infer from a fortuitous circumstance what he infers. Even the encounter in church is nothing to rely upon, and actually he learns nothing at all. He notices this himself, but consistently with his standpoint he does not credit his understanding — and this to do honor to her, out of his pride in her. But at the same time something else comes to pass in him, he is more and more religiously absorbed in himself. If he had entered into conversation with her, he again would have been in possession of his understanding, and the religious progress would have been hindered. This he himself does not see, he acts as he does in order to sustain her. — The meetings therefore correspond to his psychic situation, and the contact with actuality whereby he merely grazes it tangentially in a direction away from it keeps him in the state of hovering suspense in which the religious must consolidate itself. He poetizes her now, but he does so by virtue of a religious ideality which comes after actuality. As a lover by virtue of an ideality which comes before actuality sees beauties in the loved one which are not there, so he, with the high-strung passion of repentance, sees terrors which do not exist. — Herein one perceives the good and uncommon qualities which distinguish him, but also the demoniac trait, the fact that he cannot attain rest and repose in the final religious resolution, but is kept constantly under tension. She decides his fate, he says, and that is true; but the untruth is that she is deciding it still, for it is decided. The fact that he remains in suspenso is at once a passionate expression of his sympathy and the demoniac trait. He ought to remain in suspenso, or at the apex of the wish, as he expresses it, but at the same time, in view of the fact that the decision is passed, he ought to possess his religious resolution in peace, and not let the decision remain dialectic by reason of her. But just because he is not like this, he illuminates by his hovering and aberration many a religious problem — though one must remember that his "lines" are the expression of an individual passion. — He had energy enough to maintain his deceit, energy enough to choose the religious, and up to the last instant, or in the utmost extremity of religious passion, he remains dialectic. It is as though there were a possibility that he would plan his life differently if he were free from the whole thing. Precisely here lies the daimonia, that because of a possibility vaguely sensed of healing for her, he would not relate himself to himself in the religious idea, but would conceive of her in aesthetic categories, and would defraud the ethical a little bit, as though he, if he were guilty, were less guilty because he got out of the scrape safely, less guilty even by reason of the fact that she perhaps was at fault in her treatment of him. But of this more in another place.

The heterogeneity between the two individualities is now to be shown in its decisive aspects. Heterogeneity will cause the relationship to be inverted constantly, as the reader will have observed in the book itself.

1. He is closely reserved/she cannot possibly be so.

Why can she not be so? All close reserve is due to a dialectic reduplication which is quite impossible for immediacy. The language of immediacy is easily pronounced, like a language rich in vowels; the language of reserve is a language only in silence, or at the most it is like the language which places four or five consonants before a vowel. Because she is immediate in this degree, attestation of devotion is quite rightly the medium through which she gives expression to her passion, after having for a long while been overwhelmed by him and suffered injustice, and thereupon been precipitated into a little incident. Upon this devotion his reserve runs aground, that is to say, he is so much more dialectical that he perceives the incompatibility.

Reserve, however, may signify various things. His reserve is essentially a form of melancholy, and again the melancholy in his case is the condensed possibility which must be gone through with in the experience of a crisis if he is to become clear to himself in the experience of the religious. As for his melancholy, there is no passage where he declares what its content is. I have so represented him intentionally, partly because I only needed reserve as the limit, as the limit of understanding which posits misunderstanding, and partly because not even he could say what its content is. His reserve is in fact neither more nor less than the condensed anticipation of the religious subjectivity. The religious subjectivity has one dialectic factor more than all actuality has — not as anterior to actuality but as subsequent to it. He can therefore perfectly well exist in actuality, and he is assumed to have done so, but his reserve is a presage of a higher life. It follows therefore as a matter of course that such categories as “the outward is the inward and the inward is the outward” are, when applied to religion, the inventions of Munchausens who have no understanding of religion, which I, an enthusiast for the understanding, can very well have without being religious. In these spheres they do just as much good as one who (to recall an old saying) sticks his tongue out of the window to get a taste of the weather.

His reserve therefore has for the time being no content, but it is there as the limit, and it holds him fast, and for the time being he is melancholy in his reserve. The most abstract form of close reserve is that which encloses itself. The psychologist knows well that the reserved man, although he can tell, and tell with ease, what made him reserved, does not tell and cannot tell what makes him reserved. Reserve therefore one hardly can take away from the reserved man, and properly he must be healed religiously in himself. This is the most abstract form of reserve when it is the anticipation of a higher life in the condensation of the possibility. Hence he never says what is the content of his reserve but only that it is a fact. From this standpoint of possibility one can strive after religious transparency, and this is what he must do. But this he does not know, and least of all does he suspect that the path of his development passes through the horror of giving up his relationship to her because of the incompatibility. If he had not found in himself strength for the desperate resolution, if he had not acted without understanding what significance his act had for himself, or rather without understanding anything else but that it was his own destruction, if he had not found strength for this act in sympathetic enthusiasm for her welfare, whether she understood it then or not, she would have conquered — and he would have been lost. The developing process of reserve would have been halted, he would have taken active steps with regard to his close reserve, would have closed it off, hidden it as a fixed idea in his inward parts' perhaps in the quiet form of madness, perhaps even in the form of guilt, for these are the two essential forms of the consolidated reserve. — He had her life upon his conscience, that helped him and will help him. She had upon her conscience his whole spiritual existence — a thing she never dreamed of.

In order to throw light upon his reserve I have introduced in the diary passages in which he gropes as it were after an expression for his own reserve. He never expresses himself directly but indirectly. These expressions must therefore be understood indirectly. One of them is called "A Possibility," his decisive category, which therefore must be followed to the extreme limit. In the end it appears that the sense of guilt was a vain imagination, a feverish dream. He is groping here after the notion of sin. If he had had a real sin upon his conscience, if I had conceived him thus, it would have been far easier to clarify him out of it; but then the whole plan would not have turned out as I would have it.

2. He is melancholy/she is light-hearted.

But if his melancholy is of a sort that ought to be checked, then that is up to her, for then she could help him, as he himself declares so ardently. But it is not so. He does not know that this melancholy signifies something different. Although he himself is brought to naught, the smart of sympathy on her account still prevails, and he resolves to leave her, without any presentiment that precisely this must be of help to him. On the whole, his concern for this girl is pure fanaticism, in itself ludicrous, tragic because of his suffering, comic for the fact that he does the thing in the craziest way.

There is a difference between melancholy and melancholy. There is a melancholy which in the case of poets, artists, thinkers, is a crisis, and on the part of women may be an erotic crisis. So the melancholy of this lay figure of mine is a crisis anticipatory of the religious experience. If I take for example an artist, his melancholy, this critical melancholy, does not straightway express itself in lamentation that he is no good as an artist. Far from it. Sometimes it is a suspicious sign that the sufferer is thus aware what ails him, a sign that perhaps his sufferings are only warmed-over sufferings. No, this melancholy may cast itself upon anything, the most insignificant thing, and only when the man’s essential destiny is determined is it evident that this was the secret of his melancholy. But the crisis must come later in the case of the religious man, that is to say, for the sort of religion in which immediacy has been overcome. This is because of the many postulates which this case exacts: he must be aesthetically developed in imagination and must be able to conceive the ethical with primitive passion in order to be properly offended at it, so that the pristine possibility in the religious man may break its way out in this catastrophe. Therefore melancholy must have accompanied him through the previous stages.

So it is with the personality represented in my experiment. It is precisely the horror of the situation which is to be of help to him. This he does not dream of, he thinks only of her and of his sufferings from a sense of guilt. His sympathy for her prompts him to enthusiastic punctiliousness in venturing the utmost. He leaves her — but not to give her up, rather to hold out in the hope that in the end this might be of help. This he will not say to her, for the hope is uncertain and insecure, it would be an affront to her to put her off with such a hope. This is entirely consistent, it is this that must help, but he knows not how. One word exchanged between them, and his development would have been disturbed.

The consequence will naturally be that in the mean while she reconsiders the situation. That is as it should be. His path does not point that way, and everything is so prepared for him that he may become a normal individual. — So it is I have planned the experiment, making it at once comic and tragic.

If she had conquered, he would have been lost. Even though her lightheartedness (which after all is a security which steadily depreciates) had been capable of making him a happy husband, this is not what he ought to be. But of this he does not dream, and he only feels deeply his misery for the fact that he is incapable of being what every man is capable of — of being a husband.

He has her life upon his conscience, she has had upon her conscience his whole personality, and of course did not dream of it.

3. He is essentially a thinker/she is anything but that.

The word "thinker" sheds a rather comical light upon him, for only the fact that he was busied with thoughts serves to explain that, as the experiment assumes, he had been able to live on without the least experience of the world and especially of the other sex. If he had had such knowledge, especially of the latter sort, the experiment could not have been carried out, for one does not have to look far to see what he had to do, and especially how one ought to treat the terrifying pronouncements of a young girl, which are most duly honored by taking as a rule of life an old verse:

Cantatur haec, laudanter haec,
Dicunter, audientur;
Scribuntur haec, leguntur haec,
Et lecta negliguntur.

In the experiment therefore there falls upon him, as the reflection of his lack of knowledge of the world, a rather ludicrous light, but on the other hand his inexperienced veneration for the other sex has something touching about it, and at the same time a certain pungency as an epigram upon worldly knowledge.

To say that he is a thinker does not mean that he reads many books and purposes to ascend the cathedra as Privatdocent. That sort of a thinker could well unite divers activities and so attain mediation. He on the contrary is essentially a self-thinker, and that in the sense of always having to have the idea on his side in order to exist. This preoccupies him with all the passion of a self-thinker, not with the affected assumption of solemn responsibility characteristic of the Privatdocent.

The girl has life and light for her part, with which she is graciously clothed. She has no objection to his studies though they were to include Syro-Chaldaic, but she cares not a pin for learned subjects, which in her is an amiable trait and not without charm. But what preoccupies him is not the Syro-Chaldaic tongue nor the Eleamitic; no, it is the very life itself in which he has his existence.

Consequently they cannot understand one another. What preoccupies him absolutely is entirely beyond her ken, and if he were to speak of it, she would be no more concerned about it than if he talked of Sennacherib and Shalmaneser. She requires nothing of the sort from him, and on her part this is an amiable trait, especially if her task had been the opposite of what it was, so that in order to be serviceable to him she should not concern herself about such things. Naturally she does not apprehend in the least that the things she requires of him and the things she dispenses him from have no weight in comparison with the ideas, and that not to express the idea is a thing which not only disturbs him but a thing which he regards as disparaging to her.

So it is he thinks. And he is capable of thinking that he may have a murder upon his conscience, but not to express the idea is something he is incapable of thinking. What a maiden's honor is means for the thinker consistency and idea, and for a self-thinker it means to hold fast to it in life. If he has her honor upon his conscience, she in turn has had upon hers his thought-existence. Naturally she had no inkling of it.

4. He is ethico-dialectic/she aesthetically immediate.

From each of these standpoints the conception of suffering is entirely different. He cannot understand what her suffering essentially is, if there is any involved in losing possession of another person; she does not understand in the least what his suffering essentially is, namely, a sense of responsibility and guilt.

So they both become unhappy, and each has done the best thing for the other by way of becoming unhappy — he by severing the relationship, she by laying a murder upon his conscience. In fact he would have had that burden all the same, but nevertheless she did it.

5. He is sympathetic/she is innocently self-loving in the sense of immediacy.

The unsightly form of self-love is always recognizable by the fact that it involves reflection. In her nothing of this sort is discernable, but rather the instinct of self-preservation, which several Greek philosophers have regarded as a moral principle. Their mistake was that as a principle this involves reflection. She is without reflection, hence this self-love is not an unseemly thing and is an indication of healthiness.

Notwithstanding the partiality he commonly shows in his interpretation of her, he nevertheless does her in a way an injustice by saying that she has not a trace of resignation. Not that the dictum is unjust, for it is quite true, but the reason for it is that she has no notion what it means — and that may be an indication of healthiness, but at the same time it may perhaps indicate an erotic modesty. Moreover he hinders her from getting a notion of it. He employs deceit to hide his own sufferings, so that she may not be moved sympathetically. But then he forgets to take into account the deceit which in fact prevents her from becoming aware of the promptings of sympathy. But just as there is a contradiction here, his position here is also so dialectic, so ambiguous, that one might assume he was just as loath for her sake to see her sympathetically moved as for his own sake he was loath to have a vigorous expression of her magnanimity. This, however, he himself perceived, for he says that he had proposed to her an opportunity to give him his freedom, as in fact he did, but it does not follow that at this point he was purely sympathetic, but rather that he was subjecting himself to what he considered a duty. Inasmuch as he made this proposition he is saved from becoming demoniac in the direction of the evil, but he is by no means purely religious, that is as yet only a possibility. The misfortune is that she will not understand him and only takes advantage of every new discovery of his feeling to cast herself upon him with her devotion.

It is sympathy for her (in the form, be it noted, which is consonant with his individuality, for his sympathy of course cannot talk in her idiom) which inspires him to take the step he otherwise would hardly have ventured to take. I might have left it at that, but in order to throw light upon him I allow the thought to enter his mind, and reality seemed to favor it, that the thing will end after all in a perfectly natural way by her becoming again freely at ease through a restitutio in integrum. Here it will appear whether he is sympathetic, or rather, since his disposition is by nature sympathetic, it will appear that he now almost suffers more than before because she seems to him to lose in ideality. His sympathy appears here in all its strength and in the way it must show itself in a thinker to whom idea-existence is the one and only thing. If he had possessed knowledge of the world and of the other sex, he would have got off more easily — supposing he was willing to make use of that knowledge.

So then he breaks off, and the wedding ceremony serves the strange purpose of being the separating factor. Misunderstanding appears again in the subsequent period. She, as was said above, was already on the way to recovery when he left her, and she recovers gradually; he suffers most afterwards. He is the active party, she the passive sufferer, so it seems; but in reality the inverse of this is true: he is the passive sufferer who would not venture to do what she did, to lay such a heavy responsibility upon another person. She thinks that he has affronted and mortified her by breaking the engagement, and yet he had affronted her only by beginning the thing. His fault is (apart from beginning it) that he applied too high a standard, and this precisely is his title to honor. He is guilty, she is entirely innocent, he thinks. This, however, is not true: if he is to blame for having begun, she too is to blame for taking advantage of the ethical side of the relationship so as to bind him to herself, and for venturing to take a step the consequences of which she neither dreams of nor can calculate. He sees the comic side of the situation, but he sees this passionately, so that out of the situation he thooses the tragic side (this is the religious trait which explains the ability I am unable to understand of seeing both factors in equilibrium); she sees the tragic side, and sees it so clearly that she makes it comic. He produces no outward effect whatsoever, except what every male could accomplish just as well, namely, that a girl "wants to die," etc., he cannot even make a girl unhappy; she produces an immense effect. Upon this she does not reflect at all, for she thinks that if she had been permitted to make him happy, she then would have been doing something. Nor does he think of the consequences for him, for he must think that he has crushed her. He is sure of one thing, that it is the ruin of the girl to be united to him; perhaps the girl is shrewder in holding the opinion that she could make good use of him. She is sure of being able to make him happy; and yet, as has been shown, this would absolutely have been his ruin. He makes a fool of himself by his humble veneration; she makes a fool of herself by her great words.

But how was it after all that he began such a thing? This, I believe, I have indicated clearly. He begins with a whole life-view which he had formed. I have to make out of him an approximation to a religious individuality, and hence this life-view of his must be an aesthetic-ethical one in illusion. So it is too, and it is quite natural that this must have satisfied his individuality. He sees the girl, gets an erotic impression, and no more than that. She becomes a part of his existence, and he is not willing, as he says, to affront her by learning to know more definitely about her. One perceives at once the fanatic enthusiast, and an enthusiast he is to become, but in another sphere. So time passes, he forms his resolve, but the erotic factor has not received due attention. Then he is in for it, and he conceives the situation ethically, whereas the religious possibility is constantly the deepest thing in his soul, as it already was in his first life-view, without his knowing it. The ethical now becomes clarified to him in reality, and he comes to grief. The offense he did her was not in breaking off, but it was that with such a view of life he wanted to be in love. The stages were arranged thus: an aesthetic-ethical life-view in illusion, with the dawning possibility of the religious; an ethical life-view which condemns him; he sinks back within himself — and there he is where I would have him.

I have now quite briefly made the circuit around my experiment. Round about it I am constantly moving; for I can well grasp the unity of the comic and the tragic, but I cannot conceive whence he gets the new and higher passion which is religiousness. Might it be the ethical which by its negative pressure helps him past the metaphysical (for that is where my place is) into the religious? I do not know.

The result of the whole process of misunderstanding is that after all they do not love. But this cannot be affirmed at the beginning, and each still retains a share of the factors of love. He fails to love because he lacks immediacy, in which love first has its place. If he could have become hers, he would have become a spirit who would have done everything to indulge her wishes, but not a lover. But if he lacks immediacy, he has the ethical, for which she has no understanding and no interest. She does not love; that is to say, she has the impulses of immediacy and perseverance in them, but in order to love she must also have resignation, so that it may become clear that she does not love herself.

With this the experiment is finished; but in another sense, even in this prolonged development of it, it is not finished or brought to an end. (As to the reason for this, more will be said later.) If I were to assume that what he had a presentiment of, and what in itself was probable enough, did actually occur, namely, that she fell in love anew — what then? Why then he possibly might have got over his aberration. I constantly put myself in his place and clearly perceive that he is not to be helped as I in such a case would long ago have helped myself. I have no mind to contend about that, I would only experiment. His aberration consists in permitting himself to be disturbed by her reality so that he cannot collect himself in the act of repentance, and so cannot attain peace in repentance because she makes this act dialectical for him. (About this more later.) As soon therefore as she is out of the way he will have only himself to deal with, and repentance unimpeded will acquire the ideality he has need of, without being disturbed by a pathetic passion which stimulates him to action or by comic visions which he himself does not produce. To definitely bound an individuality and set down the mathematical answer to the given problem is the task of great systematic thinkers who have such a broad field to hurry over. To allow him to exist in all his possibility is what interests the experimenter. Therefore, even if I were to relinquish this point of view, I can very well imagine that he might still become dialectic again. If this were to occur, he is in the way of becoming demoniac. It is not the dialectical which makes a person demoniacal, far from it, but it is persisting in this state.

The reader who is acquainted with the little book by Constantine Constantius will perceive that I resemble in a way that author but yet am very different, and he who experiments ought always to fashion himself in conformity with the experiment.

DISAPPEARANCE OF THIS DISTINCTION IN THE “EXPERIMENT.”

I have often reflected upon the fact that the tragic poets, in order to be sure of making an impression upon the audience, to win for the play their confidence and trust, and their tears for the performance of it, rely upon the fact that their hero had performed great deeds, even though the poet does not confine himself to history. That this is a fact surely no one will deny or be inclined to appeal against me to Lessing, since Amelie Galotti is the exception which proves the rule, and there are many utterances of this author which show that he viewed the case precisely in this way. The almost universal practice is to use historical material, and, with considerable reservation, to understand it in the Aristotelian sense, regarding the poet as a greater philosopher than the historian, because he shows how a thing ought to be, not how it is. On the other hand, the comic poet has no need of such historical support. He gives his characters just what names he will, he lays the scene where he will, and if only the comic ideality is present, the people are sure to laugh. And conversely, he gains nothing by using Harlequin and Pierrot if he only knows how to use them as names.

Is this because men are more inclined to see the weak points of people than to see their greatness? Is it because it is more natural to laugh at something without a sufficient guarantee than to weep over it, considering that a fool will laugh at nothing? Or is the reason perhaps this, that the light-armed comedy hastens past the ethical to the unconcerned position of metaphysics and wants only to arouse laughter by making the contradiction manifest, and that tragedy on the other hand, heavyarmed as it is, remains mired in the ethical difficulty that though the idea triumphs the hero is destroyed — which is rather discouraging to the auditor in case he would like to be a hero, and it would be something of a satire upon him if he reflects that he has nothing to fear for his life since it is only the heroes that die.

However, be the reason what it may, the thing that I am interested in is not the reason but the fact that tragedy seeks support in the historical. This means that poetry does not believe itself capable by itself of awakening ideality in the auditor, does not believe that it is present in the auditor, but in the historical — that is to say, poetry expects to derive it from history.

With regard to the comical, on the contrary, it never occurs to the poet to want to appeal to history or to support the comic figure by the aid of history; for the auditor says quite rightly, “Show him to us as comic, and we will cheerfully make thee a gift of the historical.”

But does it then help one to believe in greatness to know that it was historical? No, not at all. This knowledge only helps one into an illusion which beguiles by the material fact. What is it I know historically? It is the material fact. Ideality I know by myself, and if I do not know it by myself, I do not know it at all; all historical knowledge is of no avail. Ideality is not loose cash which can be transported from one person to another, or something which is thrown into the bargain when one buys a big consignment. If I know that Caesar was great, I must know what greatness is, and this is what I behold, otherwise I do not know that Caesar was great. History’s report that reliable men assert this, that there is no risk involved in the acceptance of this opinion, that it must be regarded as certain that he was a great man, that the outcome proves it, is all of no avail. To believe ideality on the word of another is like laughing at a witticism not because one understands it but because another man said that it was witty. In that case the witticism might essentially be left just as well unuttered in the presence of a man who laughs out of belief in and respect for another person, for such a man would laugh with the same emphasis.

The reader will easily see from the title of this section that it is not my intention to remain in the aesthetic sphere but that I would proceed to the religious. What the tragic hero is in the aesthetic sphere, that the religious pattern (I am of course thinking only of pious men etc., not of Christ) is for the religious consciousness. The poet in this case is an orator. Here again recourse is had to the historical. The pattern is presented, and now, says the orator, it is certain because it is historic, and the believing congregation believes everything, even that the orator knows what he himself is saying.

In order to grasp ideality I must be able to resolve the historical in the ideality, or to do what a pious expression says of God, "let light shine upon it." On the other hand I do not enter into the ideality by repeating the historical rigamarole. One therefore who in a given case cannot just as well grasp the conclusion ab posse ad esse as he can grasp the conclusion ab esse ad posse does not grasp the ideality in that given case. He feeds only upon imaginations. Ideality as the animating principle is as a matter of course not historical. What can be historically transmitted to me is a congeries of data which are not idealities, and so the historical is always raw material which he who appropriates it knows how to resolve in a posse and assimilate as an esse. There is therefore nothing more foolish in the religious field than to hear the common sense question asked when something is taught, "if the thing actually happened thus, for if so we would believe it." The question whether it actually happened thus, whether it was so ideal as it is represented, can only be tested by ideality, but this does not come conveniently bottled in history.

I have become conscious of this by composing the story of suffering which I have carried out in my experiment. Ah, if I were a renowned author, a reading world which is industrious in believing, indefatigably industrious, would be in a fix, for it would be concerned about the book and ask, "But then is this also actually so? — then we will believe it." What is it that it will believe? That it is actually so. Well, along that path one gets no further. In case an orator takes no account of this, he may perfectly well be able to make a profound impression upon his hearers but will also turn into a satire upon himself what Socrates says of eloquence, that it is a deceitful art. The more he emphasizes that it is historical, and therefore etc., the more he deceives; and if it is a small living he has, so that it is not worth while talking of the money he gets, it is just as certain that he gives out fudge, perhaps a great deal of fudge — alas, for scanty pay. Such a historizing orator only does his part to make the learners unintelligent. For intelligence asks about two things: (1) is that which is said possible? (2) can I do it? But it is unintelligent to ask about two things: (1) is it actually so? (2) has my neighbor Christopherson done it, has he actually done it? And faith is the ideality which resolves an esse into its posse, and then draws the conclusion inversely with passionate ardor. If the object of faith is the absurd, it is not the historic which is believed, but faith is the ideality which resolves an esse into a non posse — and then will believe it.

In order to secure the religious paradigm more thoroughly the religious is kept strictly apart and conceived exclusively in the pathetic categories of immediacy. Here the situation of the orator is like that of the poet with his tragic hero. He dare not permit the comic to appear. Therefore the hearer knows definitely that this is seriousness, and if it is seriousness, he can well enough believe it. But suppose now that this seriousness were jest. Religious seriousness is, like religion itself, the higher passion which issues from the unity of the comic and the tragic. This I know precisely for the reason that I myself am not religious and have reached this standpoint (that of the unity of the two) without leaping over any preliminary stage and without finding the religious in myself. — If such be the case, the historical need not incommode itself, for it never can be of any assistance in reaching an ideality, least of all a dialectic ideality. If I were a reliable man, the prospect would be pretty bad for a reading world which cannot learn beforehand to know whether the thing is jest or earnest. I would be required to give an explanation — there is some compensation after all for not being responsible.

They secure the religious just as they do the theatrical piece by the result — and my experiment in fact is not finished. So there is no result. "I beg a highly respected and intelligent public to consider what it means to publish a book without any result. Fortunately no one reads it since it is by an obscure author." Thus a reviewer would talk, in spite of the fact that I have besought him so imploringly to abstain — not to abstain from saying this, for if finally he has to talk, it makes no difference what he says. So then the result, which every bustling reader might reasonably require to have at his disposition in advance, does not come at all. Oh, that these considerations which I present here might make up a little for this lack.

Poetry depends upon the commensurability of the outward and the inward, and therefore it shows the result in the realm of the visible. The result is right there to be grasped. However, a little prudence is not out of place, for the result has the same dialectic as ideality. The religious lies in the inward sphere. In this case the result cannot be shown outwardly. But what does the orator do? He vouches for the result. Such a security must be regarded as satisfactory from every point of view — by serious and positive people.

The aesthetic result is in the realm of the outward and can be shown. It can be shown, and even by the nearsighted it can be seen by the aid of an opera glass that the hero conquers, that the magnanimous man falls in battle and is carried home dead (of course not all at the same moment), etc. This precisely is the defect of the aesthetic production. — The ethical result is already less visible, or rather it is demanded with such swiftness that one has not time to look around before it is there.

So when I make abstraction from everything else and think only of the ethical, I demand with ethical propriety to see the good'triumph with infinite swiftness and to see punishment overtake the evil with infinite swiftness. Now this cannot be represented, at least not in five acts, and hence the aesthetic and the ethical have been combined. The ethical thought as a totality has been retained, and the infinite swiftness slowed down by aesthetic categories (fate — chance), and then in the ethical thought as a totality is to be seen at the end a world-order, divine governance, providence. This result is aesthetic-ethical and hence to a certain degree can be seen outwardly. This result nevertheless is precarious, for the ethical cannot show respect for the aesthetic in any other way than by regarding a union with it as a mésalliance. (It is surely for this reason that Boethius is so wroth at poetic representations, in Book I, cap. 9; for this reason surely that Solon prohibited theatrical plays as a deceit; for this reason surely that Plato wished to exclude poets from his state.) The ethical inquires only about guilty/not guilty, it is man enough to hold its own with anybody, it has no need of anything outward or visible, not to speak of anything so ambiguously dialectic as fate and chance, or of the judgment of any formal tribunal. The ethical is proud and says, “When I have passed judgment nothing more is needed.” That is to say, the ethical desires to be separated from the aesthetic and from the outwardness which is its imperfection, it desires to enter into a glorious alliance, and that is with the religious.

The religious then plays, though in a higher sphere, the same rôle as the aesthetic; it spaces out the infinite swiftness of the ethical, and development can take place; but the scene is laid in the interior, in thoughts and the mind which one cannot see, not even by the aid of a telescope. The principle of the spirit is that the outward and visible (the glory of the world or its wretchedness, an outward result or the lack of it for the agent) exist in order to test faith, and hence not to deceive, rather that the spirit may be put to the test by setting all this at zero and withdrawing itself. The outward counts neither one way nor the other — and for one thing the result remains in the inward sphere, and, secondly, it is constantly deferred.

The aesthetic outcome is in the outward sphere, and it is this outward which provides assurance that the outcome is there; one sees that the hero has triumphed, has conquered the land, and then we are through with it. The religious outcome, indifferent to the outward result, is only assured in the inward sphere, that is, in faith. Indifferent to the outward which the aesthetic needs (that there must be great men, great objects, great events, so that it is comic when ordinary people are involved, or two shillings and eightpence) the religious is commensurable for the greatest man that ever lived and for the most abject, and equally commensurable; commensurable for the wealth of nations and for a farthing, and equally commensurable. The religious is simply and solely qualitatively dialectic and disdains quantity in which the aesthetic man discovers his task. Indifferent to the outward which the aesthetic needs for the result, the religious disdains such things and proclaims to each and every man that he who believes that he is perfected (that is to say, imagines it, since such a thing cannot be believed, because faith precisely is infinity) — has lost.

And now the orator who deals in results, what does he do? He does everything he possibly can to deceive the hearers. But the orator is "positive." Quite so — he also takes money for what he says, and this of itself is enough to inspire people with a certain confidence in him; for in case a man were to lay out money or to lose his reputation in order to speak the truth, what confidence could one have in him, indeed he contradicts himself, for might that be the truth which did not procure for a man money, reputation and similar things?

In case one were to say that to swim is to lie upon dry land and flounder about, everybody would regard him as mad. But to believe is exactly like swimming, and instead of helping a man to get to his feet on dry land the orator should help him to get out upon the deep. So then if one would say that to believe is to lie upon dry land and go through the motions, he says the same thing as the above, only people perhaps do not notice it.

What is said here about the lack of a result in the religious sphere may also be expressed thus: the negative is higher than the positive. How lucky to be an obscure author when one experiments with such thoughts! An author of repute would be put to embarrassment, for because of his repute the positive people would presumably perceive at once that this was a positive result he had reached, and his positive repute would become still greater. Positive people, or (to indicate by the definite article more definitely what I mean) the Positives, have a positive infinity. That is quite so, a "positive" is finished, and when we hear that, we also are soon finished with them. Here we have result in superabundance. If one would seek enlightenment from Hegel the Master about what is to be understood by a positive infinity, one learns much, with prodigious pains one succeeds in understanding him — the only thing a laggard perhaps does not understand is how a live man or a man in a living body becomes such a being that he can be tranquillized by the positive infinity, which ordinarily is reserved for the Deity and eternity and the deceased. Consequently there is no other way I can understand the thing but by supposing that a result is missing which the negative ones who are not finished might en passant look forward to eagerly, wondering if long after the System has been finished astronomy might discover on those distant stars higher beings who could make use of it. It must be left to the higher beings what they will make out of it, but for men it would be the part of prudence not to be too positive, for this really means to be made a jest of by existence. Existence is cunning and possesses many means of enchantment to catch rash adventurers, and he who is caught, yea, he who is caught, out of him is not made exactly what could be called a higher being.

For a finite being — and that after all is what man is (cf. Balle's Lesson Book) — the negative infinity is the highest attainable, and the positive is a precarious assurance. Intellectual existence, especially for the religious man, is not easy, the believer lies constantly out upon the deep and with seventy thousand fathoms of water under him. However long he may lie out there, there is no assurance that little by little he will find himself lying upon land, stretched out at his ease. He may become calmer, more accustomed to his position, and find a sense of security which loves jest and the joyous mind — but up to the last minute he lies above a depth of seventy thousand fathoms. If immediacy is done away with, as in fact everybody loudly requires, then this situation comes about. There are to be enough difficulties in life for everybody. Let the poor feel the hard pressure of poverty and anxiety about a livelihood, he who elects a spiritual existence by virtue of the religious will have the comfort, which I well understand he needs, of knowing that he too suffers in life and that before God there is no respect of persons. For to become "positive" does not procure for any man personal respect in God's eyes, even though this has been accounted wisdom since the time Speculation took charge of religion by taking its life.

This I have understood well in spite of the fact that I myself am not religious, but at least I do not presume to take religion by force and merely try to understand with the cunning of an observer the object I experiment with. The religious seeks no support in the historic, still less than does the comic, and for a higher reason; it presupposes the unity of the tragic and the comic in passion, and with a new passion or with the same it chooses the tragic, and this situation again makes every historic support meaningless; it is never finished, at least not in time, and hence only as a delusion can it be so represented. So then, in case a man who had been steadily listening to an orator who talked of things religious were to go to him and say, "Are you, sir, of the opinion that I now have faith, seeing that I have been listening to you so steadily?” Perhaps then the orator, in an access of what is called good nature, sympathetic concern, for which one receives thanks in letters to the editor, might reply, “Why, certainly that is my opinion. Only do not fail to hear my addresses, and come to me freely if again you are assailed by doubt,” etc. My experimental observation (devoid of all good nature and sympathetic concern) prompts me to the opinion that he would have done better to reply, “My dear man, would you make fun of me? I dare not even vouch for my wife, yea, not even for myself, for I lie constantly above a depth of seventy thousand fathoms of water.”

If only now no one would tempt me, promise me perhaps gold and forests green, the favor of maidens and the applause of reviewers — but then require an answer to the question whether my experiment is a real history, whether at the bottom of it there is something real. Why, yes, certainly there is something real at the bottom of it — namely, the categories. However, for an unknown author the temptation is not so great, everyone will easily see that the whole thing is a prank — which nevertheless it is not, for it is an experiment. Tragedy has the interest of reality, comedy has the disinterestedness of metaphysics, but the experiment lies in the invisible unity of jest and earnest. The dialectic tension between form and content and between content and form prevents any immediate relationship to it, and in this tension the experiment avoids the honest handshake of earnestness and the rollicking fellowship of jest. The experiment constantly addresses the reader as “you,” to indicate a ceremonious distance. The poetic hero would arouse enthusiasm by his triumph, would distress one by his sufferings (would have the interest of reality), the comic hero would awaken laughter, the quidam of the “experiment” desires nothing of the sort, without making any demands he is in every way “at your service,” he cannot annoy you, for in this respect also he is “at your service,” willing to be ignored without any risk whatsoever on your part, and that all the more because it is absolutely indeterminable whether one who paid attention to him gained anything by it or suffered damage from it.

§ 4. REPENTANCE DIALECTICALLY PREVENTED FROM COMING TO A HEAD; AND THAT THE LAST CONFINE BETWEEN THE AESTHETIC AND THE RELIGIOUS LIES IN THE FIELD OF PSYCHOLOGY.

Poetry can make no use of repentance, for as soon as it is posited the scene is transferred to the inward man. And the System of course can make no use of it whatever, for the System has to be finished, the sooner the better, it is unimpeachable only when it is finished, and in order to get finished it takes pains to be rid of repentance. The Systematic abbreviation of the pathological factors of life is simply ridiculous if it claims to have anything but a metaphysical significance. The System is therefore merely metaphysics, and that is all right, but it is not a system which embraces existence, for in that case the ethical must be included in it, and to abbreviate the ethical is to make a fool of it.

On the Systematic “gliding track” (as the quidam of the experiment expresses it) the thing goes on as follows: § 17. Repentance; § 18. The Atonement; § — . System Finished — concluding with some hints to the bookbinder about how it is to be bound: in half calf it is metaphysics, in full calf it is the System. So then one does not linger over repentance. No one, not even the man whose business requires the utmost haste, has cause to complain that “one paragraph need not be an eternity.” I on the other hand propose to linger a little instant over repentance. An experimenter has more time.

The demoniac trait in the quidam of the experiment is essentially this, that he cannot withdraw himself in repentance, that at the extremest point he remains stuck in a dialectic relationship to reality (see above). It is well known that Juno sent a gadfly to persecute Latona so that she could not give birth to her child — so is the girl's reality a gadfly, a perhaps, which teases him, a nemesis of reality, life's envy, which will not let him get away and thereby get absolutely into the religious.

When repentance is treated less systematically, i.e. more effectively, one generally has one's eyes opened to get the atonement brought forward all the same. This may be all very good, but existential difficulties lie also in another quarter. When repentance is posited, guilt must be presumed as clear and well ascertained. But the difficulty arises precisely when guilt becomes dialectic. Therefore I said before that if the quidam of the experiment had had an actual sin, it would have been far easier to clarify him out of it, for then one would have been able to avoid the dialectical.

It makes no difference to the experiment whether such a case occurs rarely or not at all. It might be possible, however, that this dialectic situation occurs very frequently but comes to nothing at all. For the strictly normal occurs perhaps solely in textbooks and lectures of men who do not exist at all in themselves, nor know how to peer into life and into other men.

The experiment has made the existential position as dialectic as possible. He may have a murder upon his conscience, or the whole thing may be wind; he has this burden for the fact that a young girl lays it upon him, and if there should be a little galimatias in this, then he has no murder upon his conscience. What is to determine this? Reality. But reality takes a little time, and when I experiment I am not in a hurry like the Systematic writer of a paragraph. How does he exist all this time? It is a thing to drive repentance to despair. With me the case is different, for I sit at my ease, cheerfully employed with my calculations, and look out over the tragic and the comic: the tragic girl who dies, and the comic sinner who becomes a murderer, the tragic sinner who suffers, and the comic girl who lives. "A word is a word, and a man is a man," but the proverb applies only to men, who ought therefore to be prudent about talking of death. For it is true indeed, as a deceased man said of death, that it recognizes no class nor age; but from this it does not follow that we are to believe everybody's word.

The dialectic reader will observe at once that there is a difficulty which the quidam of the experiment did not take into account, or at least not sufficiently. By means of a deceit he would cunningly take away from her every impression of him she might have had. This deceit he carries out, but he forgets to reckon its consequences. He is sturdy enough to defy the terrors of reality, but he has not the strength to maintain the rôle when it reacts upon himself. He is superior to reality, as he shows in carrying out the deceit, for he shuns no argument she advances but persists in his course. By reason of the deceit, however, the argument becomes different from what it otherwise would have been. The moment the deceit is effective he is in fact misleading the girl and inciting her to express herself unsympathetically. She has no suspicion that he suffers, she must suppose that he is bent upon seeing the end of the engagement and so triumphing over her. So there is nothing to restrain her utterances. To this extent it is his own fault that the situation becomes so terrible as it does. Only it must be remembered that he attempted a milder solution before he had recourse to the deceit. But the fact that he himself by the deceit contributes to make everything more terrible for him, and hence the fact that he did not gain deceitfully any advantage for himself but only discomfiture, is for me a very important factor in the experiment. In an external sense he has conquered, the power with which reality challenges him does not prevail against him — but then a half year later he begins it all over again within himself, wounded as he is by that experience, and now he must give in. This precisely is what illuminates the religious situation. The religiousness which is fetched directly from reality is a dubious religiousness; it may be that aesthetic categories are employed and worldly wisdom acquired; but when reality has not been able to crush an individual and he falls by himself, the religious factor is clearer.

In this fact then, which he does not sufficiently observe, I see again the unity of the comic and the tragic. The comic feature is not that he is a braggart, for then it must have been reality which made him bite the dust, but it is the fact that he survives the crisis of reality and then falls in conflict with himself. It is a problem for aesthetics to let one who imagines he is something become manifest in the face of reality as nothing. But if in the first instance the aesthetic has conceded that in reality he is great, it has then no superior power over him and must recognize him as a hero — but then the religious says, “Tut, tut, let us look a little more closely to see how it stands with him.” I am concerned about this in a thoroughly Greek way. I imagine the blissful gods creating such a man for the sake of enjoying a dialectic pleasure in observing him. They give him powers to deal with reality, but they give him also an inward disposition by which he gets into trouble. He really is capable of great deeds, but so soon as he has performed them the event is reduplicated within himself, and he topples over. And I imagine the gods saying to one another, “After all, we must have some sport for ourselves alone, and here is a thing which is not for the goddesses, who do not comprehend it and, if they did comprehend it, would not behold it without pity. This is not something to laugh at, like the inventions of a poet whom we honor with the guerdon of our laughter, and it is not a thing to weep over, as we do when the case deserves it, but this is a solemn pleasure, the dialectic pleasure of beholding equilibrium. He cannot complain of us, for indeed we have made him great, and it is we gods alone, in fact, who see at the same moment his nothingness.”

The quidam of the experiment does not see it thus, for in his passion he holds fast by faith to the Deity, and in his own annihilation he does not see as I do the unity of the comic and the tragic, and no more than that, but he sees his own resuscitation, he sees himself fall, not before reality but by God's hand, and therefore resuscitated. Speaking religiously, I might express myself in a different way, even though I speak in what to me is a strange tongue: Providence, which is infinitely concerned about every man, endows an individual with uncommon powers of dealing with reality; "but then," says Providence, "lest he might occasion too much harm I confine this power in melancholy and thereby hide it from him. What he is capable of he shall never learn to know, but I want to make use of him. He shall not be humbled by any reality, to that extent he is treated with more partiality than other men, but in himself he shall be sensible of annihilation as other men are not sensible of it. First in that position, and only there, shall he understand me, but then also he shall be certain that it is I he understands." As an experimenter I can well understand this, but not otherwise, for I am not tranquillized by passion but by dispassionateness.

So then repentance has become dialectic for him and remains so, because he must wait to be informed by reality what wrong he has actually done. The dialectic reader will of course be able to adduce many examples of such dialectic repentance, I would merely suggest one. David has resolved that Uriah shall be got rid of by the crafty means the Bible records so that Bathsheba may be his. I assume that he has sent a messenger with secret orders to the commander of the forces, I assume that it takes a messenger three days to reach the camp. The historic reality is a matter of indifference in this case. What happens? When David the very night the messenger departed would seek repose in sleep he does not find it, but horror awakens, it grips him, and he sinks down in repentance — in the next paragraph comes "The Atonement." No, halt! That same instant David perceives that it might yet be possible to prevent the murder. A swift messenger is sent out, and David remains behind. I assume that in this case five days are required for the return of the messenger. Five days — how much is that? Indeed it is not so much as a clause in the paragraph, at the most it is a particle, a “meanwhile” which is merely the beginning of a sentence. But five days might very well turn a man’s hair gray. After all, there is a great difference between having wanted to be a murderer and being one. David is now in dialectic suspense, and the experimenter who would describe his condition can have use for very many paragraphs. — Meanwhile everyone will easily see that this is a far easier case than that of my experiment. After all, David wished to make himself guilty of a murder, but the quidam of the experiment wished precisely to save life, inspired by pure sympathy he ventures the utmost, and, behold, he gets a murder upon his conscience, or rather he gets into the dialectic embarrassment here described. This also is more dialectic than David’s situation, because the comic element absolutely cannot emerge in David’s case. It might have been an alleviation for David if he had succeeded in preventing Uriah’s actual death, but a jest it never could have become. On the other hand, the quidam of the experiment may almost become ludicrous if he does not parry with the idea.

Here the dialectic form of repentance is this: he cannot get to the point of repenting, because it is as though it were still undetermined what he is to repent of; and he cannot find repose in repentance, because it is as though he ought constantly to be doing something, undoing what was done, if that were possible. The fact therefore that he yields to this is the demoniac trait in him; he ought to fix his attention merely upon the possibility and withdraw repentance from it entirely. Insofar as he is kept in suspenso for the first reason (that it is not yet determined what he is to repent of) he is ironic; insofar as it is for the other reason (that he constantly must be doing something) he is purely sympathetic. — There is still another factor, a third factor, in his situation as a penitent. In the System a man repents once for all in § 17 and goes on to § 18. But for the existing man, if healing is to come about, the moment must arrive when one lets the act of repentance go. This for an instant has a deceptive resemblance to forgetfulness. But to forget one's guilt is a new sin. Here lies the difficulty. To hold the guilt fast is the passion of repentance, and proudly, enthusiastically, it disdains the prate of forgetfulness about the alleviation it offers, and its deep concern makes it suspicious of itself. And the quidam of the experiment even thinks that by holding on to the sense of guilt he does honor to the girl — a seductive thought precisely for the reason that she is pretty. To let go of repentance, to put it at a distance, so that one does not have it equally near every instant, is a necessity for healing. Such a dialectic labor of treading water is not noticed when everything goes off so smoothly as when § 18 follows upon or out of § 17.

SUPPLEMENT. A SIDE GLANCE AT SHAKESPEARE'S HAMLET.

Börne has written a brief critical appreciation of Hamlet? It is only a concluding utterance of his which concerns me, and I do not know whether he attached as much importance to it as I do. In general, such writers as Börne, Heine, Feuerbach, etc., have great interest for an experimenter. They are for the most part very thoroughly informed about the religious, i.e. they know definitely that they want to have nothing to do with it. This is a great advantage over the "Systematic" writers who, without knowing in what the religious properly consists, undertake to explain it, at one moment deferentially, at another superciliously, but always incompetently. An unhappy, a jealous lover can know about love as well as a happy one, and so too one who is offended at the religious can in his way know about the religious just as well as the believer. Therefore, since our age furnishes few examples of men who in a great sense are believers, one has reason to be glad that there are some right clever men who are scandalized at religion. If a person, wishing to have something definitely explained, is so fortunate as to find one man who in the seventeenth-century sense is a strict believer, and a scandalized man in the nineteenth century, who both say the same thing (that is, the one says, "It is thus and so, that I know full well, therefore I do not want it," and the other says, "Thus and so it is, therefore I believe it," and these "thus and sos" agree completely), then one can confidently bring his observations to a conclusion. Two such consonant witnesses are more trustworthy than such as lawyers deal with.

Börne says of "Hamlet,"

"It is a Christian drama." This to my thinking is a peculiarly good observation. I would alter it only by saying "a religious drama," and then would say that its fault is, not that it is a religious drama, but that it did not remain such to the end, or rather that it ought not to be drama at all. If Shakespeare will not give Hamlet religious postulates which conspire against him to produce religious doubt (wherewith the drama should properly end), then Hamlet is essentially a victim of morbid reserve, and the aesthetic demands a comic interpretation. His great plan of being the avenger ("to whom vengeance belongeth," says Hamlet) he has conceived. In case one does not see him at the same instant sink under the weight of this plan (wherewith the scene becomes introspective and his unpoetic scruples, viewed psychologically, are a remarkable form of dialectic repentance, inasmuch as repentance comes as it were too early) — if this does not take place, one demands resolute action, for he has only to deal with outward circumstances where the poet puts no difficulties in his way. If the plan holds good, Hamlet is a dawdler who doesn't know how to act; if the plan does not hold good, he is a sort of self-tormentor who torments himself for and by wanting to be something great — and neither of these alternatives is tragic. Rötscher quite rightly regards Hamlet as a case of morbid reflection. Rötscher's explanation is capital, and it has at the same time another interest for one who wishes to see how even "Systematic" writers are compelled to employ existence-categories.

If Hamlet is kept in purely aesthetic categories, one must see to it that he has demoniac strength to carry out such a resolution. His scruples are in this case of no interest at all; his procrastination and delay, his postponement and his self-deceitful pleasure in renewing his purpose when at the same time there is no outward hindrance, merely abase him, so that he does not become an aesthetic hero, and so becomes nothing at all. If he is conceived religiously, his scruples have great interest, they insure that he is a religious hero. People have sometimes had an entirely external conception of the religious hero; especially in the Middle Ages, for example, there lived perhaps many a man who had for the Church the same enthusiasm a Roman had for his country and became a tragic hero for the sake of the Church as the Roman did for his country, and then was regarded as a religious hero. That is, by the help of purely aesthetic categories he passed his final religious examination. No, the religious is in the interior, and therefore in this case scruples have essential importance.

If Hamlet were to be interpreted religiously, one would either have to let him conceive the plan and then let the religious doubt take it from him, or else (the alternative which to my thinking illustrates better the religious, for in the first case there might possibly be mingled also doubt as to whether in reality he was capable of carrying out the plan) one must bestow upon him demoniac strength to carry out his plan resolutely and vigorously and then let him collapse within himself in the religious experience, until he should there find peace. A drama can of course never be made out of this, a poet cannot use this theme, which would have to begin with the last phase and let the first glimmer through it.

About a single point one may have a doubt, a difference of opinion, and yet agree with one opinion which has been the opinion of one, two and three centuries, that Shakespeare stands unapproached — in spite of the progress the world is supposed to have made — and that one can learn from him, and learn the more the more one reads him.

§ 5. ABOUT THE HERO. ABOUT SUFFERING. TRAGEDY WOULD PURIFY THE PASSIONS BY FEAR AND PITY. THAT THE PITY OF THE SPECTATORS VARIES IN CORRESPONDENCE WITH THE VARIOUS WORLD-VIEWS.

The aesthetic hero is great for the fact that he conquers, the religious hero is great for the fact that he suffers. It is true that the tragic hero also suffers, but in such a way that he at the same time triumphs in the outward world. It is this triumph which exalts the spectator, whereas he has tears for the dying man. If the quidam of the experiment were to have been a kind of aesthetic hero, he must have been such in a demoniac sense (in the direction towards evil), and he might thus have become a hero; for the aesthetic is not so material that it essentially gives attention only to the shedding of blood or the number of murders in order to determine accordingly whether one is a hero. It has regard essentially to passion, only it is unable, because it is not emancipated from the external, to press on to that merely qualitative act of determination which is reserved for the religious, where a farthing counts for just as much as empires and kingdoms. If then he were to have been a hero, he must have acted by virtue of this reflection: "I see the idea of my existence brought to naught by this girl, ergo she must be got rid of, over her destruction passes my path to a great goal." It is not at all difficult to construct for him one or another splendid ideal which he would desire to realize. One might then see him attain the goal and see the world-order bring upon him a nemesis. Above all he must be egotistically sure of himself, and this, one would perceive, accounted for his intrepidity and explained how it was he became supernatural — not like the religious man who becomes so by making sacrifices, but as the man who is demoniac in the direction of evil becomes so by demanding sacrifices. But above all he must not be, as in the experiment he actually is, a sympathetic nature, for then the aesthetic cannot comprehend his collision; and above all he must not, as in the experiment, regard it as a matter of prime importance that he manages to suffer more than she does and is assured, as he wishes to be, that even the step he takes will not be the girl's destruction but his own. The quaedam of the experiment lies essentially within the aesthetic sphere. The uncommon qualities which constitute an aesthetic heroine would in this case be: to have within herself sufficient ideality to hold fast to love, and through this strength which preserved love to be raised to something extraordinary and so to constitute herself a nemesis upon him. A girl of such quality of course I could not use in the experiment, where the important thing is to illuminate him and have the unity of the comic and the tragic as law for the construction. I chose therefore a girl of a more ordinary sort. His sympathetic nature has to be illuminated from all sides, and hence I had to have a feminine figure which is able to make the whole situation as dialectic as possible for him, and among other things is capable of putting him to the torture of seeing her, as he expresses it, break with the idea, although after all she does nothing more (if she does that) but to get for herself, sine ira et studio and without loss of her loveliness, a new cavalier for the dance of life. For if a person cannot get the one, then a person takes the other, without making any fuss about ideas, and precisely for this reason remains lovable. Such an event anybody could have foretold to him, but in his case that does no good. Of course like every girl she had the possibility of becoming something great, and there were moments during their engagement when I expected I might be able to bow before her in reverence. For I who am an observer, and hence poetice et eleganter a sort of public watchman, have great joy in bowing and have never envied Napoleon his greatness but have on the other hand envied the two chamberlains who opened the door for him their good fortune of being the only ones to throw open the folding doors, bow profoundly, and announce, "The Emperor!" For the sake of her relationship to the experiment I could not represent her thus, and it is in proportional relationships I find my dialect satisfaction. How they chanced to begin, the fatality which compelled each of them, is not my interest. The moment I went into that I should be essentially influenced by his passion, and that would be the end of my equilibrium. As soon as I put passion aside and regard each one separately and the fate of each, I must say of him that he is the one who suffered most. He it was who began it and by beginning it offended her, inasmuch as he did not comprehend the specific peculiarity of a feminine existence. He began it, and hence his suffering was deserved. About her I must say that she is the one to whom life does the greatest injustice in the experiment, inasmuch as in having to do with him she always appears in a false light from the moment he prevents her by the deceit from expressing what sympathy there may well have been in her. Do what she will, even though she were to choose to remain true to him, a comic light falls upon her because she has her existence in the deceit. This injustice he feels acutely, yet he behaves with sympathetic passion from his point of view, and it is one of the sources of his suffering that from his standpoint he does his utmost and yet does the maddest thing, because they have no standpoint in common, are not adjacent angles. Neither from his standpoint nor from hers is there any give and take: on the one hand feminine loveliness, charm — on the other spiritual existence by virtue of the dialectic. His most desperate efforts are of no avail, do not bridge the disparity, for feminine loveliness makes a claim which demands precisely what he lacks. In this his suffering consists. On the other hand, the opposite point of view might be maintained, that in relationship to feminine loveliness a spiritual existence by virtue of the dialectic might ask like the mathematician, "What does that prove?" This, however, he does not do, for he is not in equilibrium of spirit but in passion, and therefore concerns himself about the first (her legitimate claim) and chooses here his suffering.

Of suffering he has a plenty; but the aesthetic, by reason of the externality which is its element, has its own thoughts about suffering. Aesthetics says quite rightly that suffering itself has no significance and no interest, and only when suffering is related to the idea is it concerned with it. This is an incontrovertible truth, and hence it is quite right of aesthetics to reject such sufferings as toothache and gout. But when aesthetics has to explain to itself more precisely what it means to be related to the idea, it again must become evident, as was shown incidentally in § i, that it is only an immediate relationship which concerns aesthetics, in other words, that suffering must come from without, be visible, not having its origin and expression in the individual himself. Accordingly this view has been ably presented by accomplished writers on aesthetics and has become common property, accessible even to the lowliest newspaper scribbler, that not every suffering has aesthetic interest, for example, sickness has not.

This is altogether right, and the result of such reflections is that the aesthetic hero by reason of his quantitative differentiation must preeminently be in possession of the requisites for conquering, must be in good health, in full vigor, etc., so that the difficulty comes from without.

I recall a little polemic which was carried on in Germany where the one side appealed to the Greeks and the Greek aesthetic against a play in which someone had used blindness as a tragic motif, and the other side replied by appealing to the Aedipos of Sophocles. Perhaps the appeal might have been made with more reason to the "Philoktet," which in a way constitutes an exception to the universal aesthetic rule, yet in such a way that it cannot by any means upset it but rather must itself fall.

This then is an established fact for aesthetics. When I now take leave of aesthetics I do away with its externality but retain the just principle, that only such suffering has interest as stands in relation to the idea. This remains true to all eternity. When a relationship to the idea is not visible in suffering, it must be rejected in the aesthetic field and condemned in the religious. But since the religious is only qualitatively dialectic and is commensurable for everything, and equally commensurable, every suffering may therefore eo ipso acquire interest, precisely for the reason that everyone may acquire a relationship to the idea.

A great deal has been said about poetry reconciling one with existence; rather it might be said that it arouses one against existence; for poetry is unjust to men by reason of its quantitative estimate, it has use only for the elect, but that is a poor sort of reconciliation. I will take the case of sickness. Aesthetics replies proudly and quite consistently, “That cannot be employed, poetry must not become a hospital.” That is quite right, so it must be, and it is only a bungler who would attempt to treat such subjects aesthetically. In this situation when people have no religion they are in a dilemma. Aesthetics culminates in the end by regarding sickness in accordance with the principle enunciated by Friederick Schlegel: “Nur Gesundheit ist liebenswürdig.” So too poetry must speak (when compelled to make answer to people — though the people are at fault in compelling it, as will be indicated later); if it would not degenerate into snivel and whining drama, it must say, “Wealth alone is lovable, or it is the conditio sine qua non of making use of my figures — unless I were to compose an idyl, but even here it is not poverty.”

It is true that poetry, hospitable and kindly as it is, invites everyone to lose himself in it, and in this way to be reconciled, but nevertheless it posits distinctions and concerns itself only with the privileged sufferings, and thus demands more of the man who is tried by the unprivileged sufferings of life, requires of him more strength in order to lose himself in poetry. And with this poetry has already undermined itself, for it cannot be denied that he who is able to lose himself in poetry in spite of the unprivileged sufferings is greater than he who does the same thing but does not suffer in the same wray, and yet poetry must say that it does not find such a person a fit subject for its treatment, notwithstanding he is great.

So soon as one takes leave of poetry, which like a friendly power of divine origin is far from wishing to offend anyone and does its best to reconcile, so soon as I transport the aesthetic principle from the securely hedged meadows of poetry into the field of reality such a principle as that health alone is lovable is simply that of a despicable man. Such a man is despicable because he is devoid of sympathy, and because he is cowardly in his egoism.

In this dilemma, when what one has learned from poetry does not reconcile one with reality, the religious makes its appearance and says, "Every suffering is commensurable for the idea and so soon as the idea is present it has interest, otherwise it is culpable, and that through the sufferer's own fault. Whether the suffering consisted in not being able to see one's great plans realized or in being a hunchback, has nothing whatever to do with the case; whether it consisted in being deceived by a faithless lover or in being so unhappily deformed that even a good man cannot refrain from laughing when he sees it and no one therefore could fall in love with it, has nothing whatever to do with the case."

Thus it is that I as an experimenter have understood the religious. But what is the idea-relationship here in question? Naturally it is a God-relationship. Suffering is in the individual himself, he is no aesthetic hero, and the relationship is with God. But here we must draw the rein, for otherwise the religious becomes so mettlesome that it goes straight to the opposite extreme and says, “The lame, the cripples, the poor are my heroes, not the privileged classes,” which would be unmerciful of the religious, which yet is mercy itself.

That such is the case with suffering as viewed from the religious standpoint I know from the fact that I can confront two men who say the same identical thing. Feuerbach, who pays homage to the principle of healthy-mindedness, says that the religious existence (more particu larly the Christian) is a constant history of suffering; he begs us merely to consider Pascal’s life, and that is sufficient. Pascal says exactly the same thing: “Suffering is the natural state of the Christian, just as health is that of the ‘natural’ man”; and he was a Christian and spoke out of his own experience.

A passion narrative also stands in relation to a reader, just as the aesthetic production does. (Only take notice of the dialectic difficulties which were emphasized in § 3 and brought to mind in the form of the experiment). About the relation of tragedy to the auditor we have the word of Aristotle the father of aesthetics: δι’’*ελεον και φόρου περαίνουσα την των τοιοντων παθημάτων κάθαρσιν. J*ust as in the foregoing passage I removed from aesthetics is externality and retained in the religious sphere its principle, so too may these words be retained, but they must be understood more precisely. Aristotle’s meaning is clear enough. He assumes emotional susceptibility on the part of the auditor, and tragedy stimulates this by φόβος and, but this in turn takes away the egoistic from the individual thus affected, so that he loses himself in the suffering of the hero, forgetting himself in him. Without fear and pity he would be sitting like a clod in the theater, but if he gets no further than to fear for himself, he sits there as an unworthy auditor.

This is not difficult to understand, but it is already implied here that the fear and pity must be of a definite sort, and that not everyone who knows fear and pity is able to behold a tragedy. The purely “natural” man has no fear at all for that about which the poet is concerned, so he feels at the play neither fear nor sympathy. Let him see a man walk a tightrope between the towers of Rosenborg Castle, and then he will fear, or with a man who is hung he will feel sympathy. The spectator of tragedy must have an eye also for the idea, then he sees the poetic, and his fear and pity are purified of all egoistic ingredients.

But the religious man has a different conception of what awakens fear, and therefore his sympathy is in another place. The aesthetic man is not concerned with sickness and poverty, he has no sympathy for these sufferings, he feels no solidarity with them, as Borne somewhere says, he himself is in sound health and does not wish to hear about sickness. But all healing art, that of poetry as well as that of religion, is only for the sick, since it is exercised through fear and pity. The last clause Börne should not have uttered, for in this case the aesthetic is already qualified by relation to reality, and so it is narrow-mindedness or obduracy not to be willing to know anything of it. When the aesthetic is confined to its pure ideality, one has nothing to do with such things, that is true, and the poet offends no one. It is a mistake therefore on the part of the religious man to be angry with poetry, for poetry is and remains lovable. With the spectator the case is different when he is aware that such things exist. It is of course stupidity or cowardly obduracy to wish to be unaware that poverty and sickness exist because for one’s own part one is in good health; for even if the poet does not point this out, yet anyone who has thought two healthy thoughts about existence knows that the next instant he may be in this case. It is not wrong of the spectator to want to lose himself in poetry, this is a joy which has its reward, but the spectator must not mistake the theater for reality, nor himself for a spectator who is nothing else but a spectator at a comedy.

Fear and pity again are operative in the religious sphere to purify these passions. But here the fear has become different, and so also has pity. The poet does not want the spectator to fear what vulgar men fear, and he teaches him to fear fate and to pity the man who suffers under it — yet the object of this pity must be great and quantitatively conspicuous.

The religious man begins at another place, he would teach the auditor not to fear fate, not to be absorbed in pity for him who falls before it. All such things have for him acquired less importance, and hence too he sees, as the aesthetic man does not, all men, great and small, equally exposed to the blows of fate. But then he says, "What thou art to fear is guilt, and thy pity must be for him who falls in this way, for only this is danger. Yet thy pity must not run wild, so that for concern about any other man thou dost forget thyself." He will teach the auditor to sorrow, as does the parish clerk, a lowly servitor under orders, a humbly proud right reverend high priest when with inward emotion he proclaims "that we should sorrow for our sins" — a thing which of course the parish clerk would not dare to say to his reverend superiors, the Docents in the pulpit. Fear and pity are to be aroused by the matter presented, and these passions also should be purified from egoism, not however by absorbing oneself in contemplation, but by finding within oneself a God-relationship. For the poet says, "This is egoism, that in seeing the tragic hero thou canst not forget the blow of fate which struck thee; this is egoism, that in seeing the hero thou dost become as timid as a tailor who dreads to go home."— "But to dwell upon thine own guilt," says the religious man, to fear for thine own guilt, is not egoism, for precisely thereby is man in a God-relationship!" Fear and pity are for the religious man a different thing, and they are purified not by turning one's mind outward but by turning it inward. The aesthetic healing consists in the fact that the individual by gazing dizzily into the aesthetic disappears from his own eyes like an atom, like a mote, which is simply part and parcel of man’s lot in general, the lot of all mankind, disappears like an infinitely small element of sound in the spherical harmony of existence. The religious healing consists on the contrary in transforming the world and the centuries and the successive generations and the millions of contemporary men to an evanescent distraction, in transforming jubilation and acclaim and aesthetic hero-worship to a disturbing distraction, the notion of being “finished,” to a juggler’s illusion, so that the only thing remaining is the individual himself, the single individual, placed in his God-relationship under the rubric: Guilty?/Not guilty?

Such is the religious position, according to the results I have reached as an experimenter. But for my own part I do not see it thus, for in the relation between the aesthetic and the religious I see again the unity of the comic and the tragic which the two of them constitute when they are brought together. Thus in poverty I see the tragedy that an immortal soul suffers, and the comedy that it all turns on two shillings. I go no farther than the unity of the comic and the tragic in the equilibrium of life. I have a surmise that if I were to go farther and were to begin upon the religious, I should get into the difficulty of discovering that it was doubtful whether I am not guilty — hence I keep out of it. I am not one who is offended at the religious, far from it, but neither am I religious. The religious interests me as a phenomenon, and as the phenomenon which interests me most. Hence it is not for the sake of men in general but for my own sake I am sorry to see religiousness disappearing, because I want to have material for my observations. This I do not hesitate to say, and moreover I have plenty of time to make observations on the religious, for an observer always has time enough. It is different with the religious man. When he talks it is only a monologue. Being concerned solely about himself, he talks aloud — that is what preaching is. If there is somebody listening, he knows nothing of his relationship to this man, except this, that he owes him nothing, for what he has to accomplish is to save himself. Such a right reverend monologue, which bears witness in a Christian way when by its emotion it moves the speaker, the witness-bearer, because he is speaking about himself, is what is called a sermon. World-historical perspectives, systematic results, gesticulation and wiping the sweat from the brow, strength of voice and vigor of fist, along with the deliberate employment of the same in order to accomplish something, are aesthetic reminiscences which do not know even how to accentuate properly fear and pity in the Aristotelian sense. For world-historical perspectives are no more apt to arouse fear than are systematic results, and strength of voice does not shake the soul, and pounding the pulpit and wiping away the sweat arouse at the most only sensuous pity for the sweater. A religious orator who is not moved within himself and talking about himself but about everything else is thinking of Geert Westphaler. Geert could talk about everything, knew much, and was very perfectable, so that he might perhaps have reached the point of knowing everything, one only thing he did not learn to know, that he himself was a Schwätzer. Yet Geert is blameless, for he did not give himself out to be a religious orator.

The religious orator who through fear and pity purifies these passions does not perform the amazing exploit of rending the clouds asunder in the course of his address, so as to display the heavens opened, the Judgment Day at hand, with hell in the background, himself and the elect triumphing — he performs the more simple, the more artless, the more lowly feat, which one would think so very easy: he lets the heavens stay closed, recognizes in fear and trembling that he himself is not “finished,” and he bows his head while the discourse pronounces judgment upon thought and heart. He does not perform the amazing exploit which upon his next appearance might give him a claim to be hailed with acclamation, he does not thunder with the intent that the congregation might at least be kept awake and might be saved by his discourse — he performs the more simple, the more artless, the more lowly feat, which one might think so very easy: he lets God keep the thunder and the might and the glory; he talks in such a way that though everything were to go amiss he is sure nevertheless that there is one auditor who is seriously moved.. the speaker himself, that though everything were to go amiss there was nevertheless one auditor who went home fortified... the speaker himself, that though everything were to go amiss and everybody were to stay away there was nevertheless one who in the difficult complications of life longed for the edifying moment of the address... the speaker himself. He is not lavish in dispensing the abundance of the mouth and of information, but is niggardly in his use of the funds of edification, providing economically that the admonitions obligate him before they go on to somebody else, that the comfort and truth do not depart from him... in order to be communicated the more lavishly. “Hence,” says the religious man, “wert thou to see him all by himself in a lonely place, forsaken of all and convinced that he had accomplished nothing by talking, though thou wert to see him there, thou wouldst see him just as deeply moved as ever, if thou wert to hear his discourse, thou wouldst find it as powerful as ever, without deceit, without calculation, without striving after effect, thou wouldst comprehend that there was one person whom it must edify... the speaker himself. He will not grow weary of talking; for attorneys and orators who have a worldly aim, or a worldly sense of self-importance with relation to an eternal aim, grow weary when they cannot count upon their fingers what they accomplish, if existence does not cunningly deceive them with the illusion that they are accomplishing something, but the religious orator has always as his principal aim.. the orator himself.

So it is (as I have convinced myself by experimentation) that the religious man would work through fear and pity for the ennobling of these passions. Every other way of going about it brings things to confusion by proposing semi-aesthetic categories: by making the orator aesthetically self-important, and by helping the auditors to become dizzy by losing themselves in something universal.

SUPPLEMENT. THE SELF-INFLICTED SUFFERINGS — SELF-TORTURE.

Viewed aesthetically, every heautontimorumenos is comic. Different ages produce different types of this ailment. Our age does not fall behind in this respect, for it is as though the whole generation were worrying itself with the fixed idea that it is called to some extraordinary task, as if at any instant there might come a delegation from the council of the gods with a summons to take their place in the assembly; for so much is certain, that being confidentially charged with looking after the future of the whole human race, it is as though every instant, like Hermann v. Bremenfeldt, it must be up and off to whisper in God’s ear what is the right thing for Him to do. And how deplorable it was too that Hermann v. Bremenfeldt never got a chance to talk with the Kurfürst of Saxony! It has, moreover, like all who suffer from fixed ideas, a great propensity to see espionage, persecution, everywhere, and just as rheumatic people notice drafts on all sides, so does it notice pressure everywhere, the abuse of power, and it knows how to explain in a way satisfactory to itself the feeble evidences of life in public spirit, not by the fact that its strength is only superficial and imaginary, but by the pretense that it is cowed by the governments, pretty much as when an idle busybody explains why he gets nothing accomplished all day, not by the fact that he is idle, but by the many affairs which overwhelm him. But enough of this.

Precisely because it is aesthetically correct to say that all self-torment is comic, one is psychologically justified in using the comic probe before treating self-torment by another method. Of course one does not at once get the patient to laugh at his fixed idea, but by the employment of analogies one approaches nearer and nearer. If he laughs easily and heartily, one may be able perhaps to take him off his guard. How the method is carried out in detail can only be understood in actual practice, but in practice there is nothing more ludicrous than to see religious categories employed with profound and stupid seriousness where one ought to employ aesthetic categories with humor and jest. — The quidam of the experiment has, without knowing it, gone about the thing very correctly. With prodigious passion he conceives the plan of making his whole love-relationship appear a prank in the girl's eyes. What I have to laugh at from my standpoint is his prodigious passion — apart from this he is in the right. Danger to life is not always at hand because a person cries, "Murder!" If the quaedam of the experiment had been suffering tragically, she would have prevented him from getting an opportunity to employ the deceit. She would have collected herself within herself and held back. These are always the dangerous phenomena. Instead of that she went directly to the opposite extreme by opening her mouth as wide as possible and tormenting herself by wanting to be an unhappy lover on a big scale. But precisely this indicates that a comic treatment is correct; for a woman who is an unhappy lover on a big scale keeps silent. If she had been depicted in religious categories, she would not have acted as she did in that case she would have feared for herself, and therefore would have feared most the responsibility she incurred by making the thing as difficult for him as possible, not only by her personality, but by an erotic fraud which lays an attachment upon the ethical and the sense of duty. — If the quidam of the experiment had understood with equilibrium of spirit what he was doing, he would have been quite a different man. But his troubled passion made him tragic in the employment of the deceit, and I see the unity of the comic and the tragic precisely in the fact that he does the right thing, but not for the reason he supposes, namely, that in his sympathetic enthusiasm he might have strength to tear away from her a real love-attachment. No, the comic thing is that his tragic foolhardiness triumphed for the reason that her love-attachment does not draw many fathoms of water.

The reason why the aesthetic consistently treats all self-torment as comic can be easily perceived, just because it is logically consistent. Aesthetics keeps the hero in an undamaged state by reason of the direct proportion between strength and suffering (the one within, the other from without). It therefore regards every inward direction of thought as desertion, and not being able to have the deserter shot it makes him ridiculous.

I now leave the aesthetic and go on to the religious. As an experimenter I merely set the categories in motion in order to behold at my ease what they require, without concerning myself with the question whether anybody has done it or can do it, whether Tom let it alone because he was weak, Dick because he was too shrewd, Harry because he saw that the others let it alone and that he also could let it alone and become loved and esteemed, seeing that he didn't want to be better than others — in short, without believing the life insurance wisdom, the gist of which is that when one sheep goes to the water the other does too, what the one ass does the other does too.

The religious does not consist in a direct proportion between strength and suffering, but in the inwardness where man relates himself to himself. The fact that "self" is emphasized here suffices to show that in the religious sphere self-torment is regarded differently, but it does not suffice, says the religious, to justify the fact that individuals who have their whole existence in the aesthetic jumble things up and that the religious orators, in spite of all their phrases and holy words, have no pure categories.

If self-torment as viewed aesthetically is comic, as viewed religiously it is culpable. A religious healing of this ailment is not attained by laughter but by repentance, by the recognition that self-torture is a sin like other sins.

But whereas the aesthetic, precisely because it has nothing to do with the inward, universally dismisses self-torment as comic, the religious is unable to do the same. The fear of the religious individual is precisely fear of and for himself; the religious healing consists first and chiefly in awakening this fear, and from this one can easily see that the thing becomes more difficult. But how does the individual manage to fear himself without by himself discovering the danger in which he is? A crafty religiosity, I admit, goes about the thing in a different way. It says, "One must not court danger, our Lord can easily send it when it is needed." That is easily said, but it will not do to say amen and end with that, for the saying is ambiguous. In spite of the religious expression, "our Lord" (instead of which one might prefer to say "our Saviour" in order to speak more religiously, as though the religious consisted in certain words and phrases) — in spite of this the categories are half aesthetic. Although the saying sounds religious, the individual is viewed only in an external relationship to God, not in an inward relationship to himself. The saying comes about to this: "Our Lord can well bring danger and misery to thy house, indeed He can take away thy fortune, thy loved one, thy child, and He will surely do this when it is serviceable to thee — ergo, since He has not done this, there is no danger." This is aesthetics with a spurious religious gilding.

Religiously viewed the greatest danger is that a man does not discover, is not always discovering, that he is in danger, even if he had money and the handsomest girl and lovely children and was king of the land or one of the simple folks free from all care.

That, as I have remarked, is easily said, but one must not say amen and end there, for then one deceives. This is evident when one considers the speech more closely. Here then we have a man, a perfect Pamphilius of fortune (this name is admirably suited to such a religious speech), tenderly nursed and coddled, without having acquaintance with fear, who is edified by the consideration that our Lord... if. Oh, what a lucky favorite of the aesthetic, who in addition to aesthetic Heiterkeit obtains a religious guarantee! Every man, however, has to start with a thing called imagination; so then our lucky man learns by hearsay of the existence of poverty and misery in the world. So then he is willing to give and be praised for it. But imagination is not satisfied by this. It depicts to him suffering in the most terrible forms, and at the instant when it is most terrible of all the thought strikes him and a voice says to him, “This might also happen to thee.” If he has any chivalrous blood in him he says, “Why should I be exempted any more than others?” (Tieck has dealt with this theme somewhere in a novel, where a rich young man despairs over his riches, not in spleen, but out of sympathy for men.) The speech had nothing to say about this, and yet here lies the boundary between the aesthetic obduracy which would know nothing about the existence of misery, and the religious exaltation through suffering. About their being such a parting of the ways, that one does not buy oneself off by paying the poor-rate and giving a little something besides, nothing is said in the speech — and our Pamphilius ought to be joyous until our Lord, if it were to be found needful, might send danger. What is the orator doing here? He is deceiving. Instead of getting him launched into danger, he helps him to hide from life in a religious illusion. Every effort to obstruct receptivity for the fact that one is in danger is aesthetically misleading in the direction, not of poetry, but of aestheticism as it is when it has relation to reality, that is, it leads to hardening of the heart.

In case the speaker is rather more of a religious orator, he moves with ease in this difficulty and helps the hearer into it. He talks with light religious humor about fate and reverses of fortune — our lucky Pamphilius becomes a bit apprehensive, and the orator has not deceived him. Then he edifies by referring to the security of faith, and in his enthusiasm the religious orator shouts to himself and to the other, “A religious man is always joyful.” This is the proudest word uttered anywhere in the world, in case it is true that no one, no one upon earth or in heaven, knows so well what danger is, and what it is to be in danger, as does the religious man, who knows that he is always in danger. He therefore who can say in one breath that he is always in danger and always joyful utters at once the most disconsolate and the most high-spirited word that can be uttered. And I who am only an observer, poetice et eleganter a public watchman, count myself fortunate in venturing to bow before such a man; but, to speak of myself in my categories, I would say that, if the gods have denied me the great gift, that which is infinitely higher than all I am capable of, they have bestowed upon me a far more than ordinary sagacity in sizing people up, so that I neither take off my hat before I see the man, nor take it off before the wrong person.

There is many a man who has always been merry and yet stands so low that even aesthetics regards him as comic. The question is whether he has not been joyful in the wrong place. And where is the right place? It is... in danger, above seventy thousand fathoms of water, many, many miles from all human help, there to be joyful — that is great! To swim in shallow water along with the bathers is not the religious.

It is now easily seen what the religious must mean by self-torment. The thing is to discover by oneself the whole possibility of danger, and by oneself to discover every instant its reality (this the aesthetic man would call self-torment, and the aesthetic lecture with spurious religious gilding would keep one from it), but the thing is at the same instant to be joyful. In what then does self-torment consist? It consists in halting halfway. It does not consist therefore in the first stage above mentioned, but it consists in the fact that one is not able to press through to joy. And this is not comic, says the religious, nor does it exist in order to draw aesthetic tears, for it is culpable, and one shall press through. Everyone who does not get through is himself to blame for it. Here there are no hardhearted fathers as for the unhappy lover in the plays, there is not the superior force of the enemy before which the hero falls in the tragedy, here there is no betrayal by the person one trusted most, so that the man of distinction is caught in the trap, here there is only one who can be the betrayer... the man himself, and next to him, but infinitely far behind, the orator who would lead one to leave it alone, whereas the one and only thing he can do is to help one to get out upon the deep where there are seventy thousand fathoms of water, and when this has come to pass and he perceives that he can do no more, can render no further help to one whom he loves more dearly than his life (as one is able to love in the fable of the play), but only discovers in this distress that he himself has one hundred and forty thousand fathoms under him, there is, however, one thing he still can do, he can shout to the loved one, "In case thou dost not become joyful, know thou, know thou assuredly that it is thine own fault."'

Even though it be the opinion of many (supposing they were to give attention to what is here set forth) that such an orator must be regarded as a public nuisance, and that it would be the silliest thing of all to pay him for making one unhappy, yet this is not my opinion. Gladly would I pay him, and unembarrassed I would accept pay for it, if I could be such as he, but not with the understanding that I was rewarding him or being rewarded, because money is incommensurable with such instruction, and it is not of so much worth that one ought, as Socrates did, to lay accent upon it by not being willing to receive it.

So much for self-torture. It is extremely simple, everyone knows it; and precisely in this I see again the unity of the comic and the tragic, when I consider that everyone knows what a man is, and I the observer know what everyone is. For this is not aesthetic-comic for the reason that it is more than a direct proportion (for the comic consists in the disproportion between an imaginary possibility and reality). Dietrich Menschenschreck is comic because his courage is an imaginary possibility and therefore dissolves his reality into nothingness. But the possibility here in question is a real possibility; man can, says religion, become the highest because he is planned for the highest. It is tragic that he is not this, but comic that he is this nevertheless, for that possibility planned by God Himself cannot be obliterated. Thus everyone knows that a man is immortal, the "observer" knows what everyone is, and yet everyone is and remains immortal. So the man's immortality was no imaginary possibility like the courage of D. Menschenschreck; and on the other hand, he who in all the terrors of time and custom, and in spite of their cunning, keeps the faith in immortality ever present to him does not become more immortal than every other man.

The quidam of the experiment is something of a self-tormentor. His first movement is good and correct, but he remains absorbed in the outcome, he does not get back quickly enough to joy in order to repeat this movement again. However that moment in which I have depicted him is also his crisis, it may perhaps go easier with him in case he is sensible enough to regard a whole life as appropriately spent in such a course of instruction, is ready to put up with being a dawdler among those who are quickly "finished," a backward child among those who go infinitely further. — That the girl assists him to get out upon the deep there can be no doubt, and viewed from my standpoint his whole relationship to her is a fortunate relationship. For the man is always fortunate in love who gets a girl who is precisely calculated to develop him. Thus Socrates was happily married to Xantippe. In the whole of Greece he would not have found her match; for that ancient grand-master of irony had need of such as she in order to develop himself. Hence if Xantippe has often had to hear herself ill spoken of in the world, I believe on the contrary that she has the triumph of asserting that the supreme head of irony, who rises head and shoulders above the mass of mankind, owed no one so much as he owed to Xantippe's housekeeping, the arena in which Socrates maintained ironically his disputation pro sumis in ironia honoribus and thereby disputed himself into the ironic competence and equipoise by which he overcame the world. — So likewise is this girl perfectly suited to him, as was required in the experiment. She is lovable enough to move him, but weak enough to abuse her power over him. The first of these qualities binds him, the last helps him to get out upon the deep, but also saves him. If the girl had been more characterized by spirit and less by feminine loveliness, if she had been very magnanimous, she would have said to him as he sat pursuing his deceit, "My dear, thy cunning distresses me. I do not understand thee, and I do not know whether thou art frivolous enough to want to desert me, or whether thou art hiding something from me and art perhaps better than it seems. But be this as it may, I perceive that thou must have thy freedom; I am fearful on my own account if I were not to give it to thee, and I love thee too dearly to refuse it to thee. So take it, without any reproaches, without anger between us, without thanks on thy part, but with the consciousness on my part that I have done the best I could." If this had come to pass, he would have been crushed, he would have sunk to the ground in shame, for with his passion he can endure all evil treatment when he knows that he is the better one, but he would not have been able to forget that he was a debtor to such magnanimity, the greatness of which he would discover with demoniac keenness of sight. This would have been an injustice to him, for from his standpoint he too had meant well. In the experiment he is not humbled by a human hand but by God.

He who has inclination and capacity to calculate experimentally with categories without having need of a theatrical scene, meadows, many personages, "and then some cows," will perceive how many new constructions might be made at this point by altering him or her a little to see what would follow for him and for her, how he might have been altered so as to crush her (if, e.g., he had cruelly made her responsible for his life and perhaps terrified her so that she never got over it), as in the experiment he is quite unable to do; or how both might have been constructed with a view to both of them being crushed (if, e.g., he had not had religious postulates and perhaps, being driven to despair by his pride, had ended by celebrating their union with a suicide), instead of both being helped as they are.

Readers of romances of course make other and greater demands. They think that when everything turns upon two people it must be tiresome, as indeed it is if it does not also turn upon the categories. If the categories are involved, one person alone can be entertaining, and 6,477, 378,875 people couldn't turn upon more than the categories. A reader of romances is of course only interested when there is something doing, as one says on seeing a riot. But suppose now that the riot turned upon nothing, then after all there was nothing doing.

§ 6. TO REPENT NOTHING IS THE HIGHEST WISDOM. — THE FORGIVENESS OF SIN.

In conformity with such negative rules of conduct as, to admire nothing, to expect nothing, etc., we have the negative rule, to repent nothing, or (if one would prefer to use another word which perhaps ethically has not so disturbing an effect) to regret nothing. The secret of this wisdom really lies in the fact that they have embellished an aesthetic principle to make it look like an ethical principle. Aesthetically understood it is quite true from the ethical point of view that the free and noble spirit should not set so much store by the aesthetic in all its compass that it regrets anything. So if one has become poor, it is said rightly that to regret nothing is the highest wisdom, which means, to act in virtue of the ethical. This principle then means, to cut the bridge of the past behind one, in order to be able constantly to act at the instant. If with the best deliberation thou hast conceived a plan, and the outcome seems to show that the plan was a poor one, then the thing is to regret nothing and to act in virtue of the ethical. It is undeniable that much time is wasted in this world by such a looking backward, and to that extent the principle may be praiseworthy.

But if the plan was not made with the best deliberation, if there was fraud in it, what then? Is it then also the proper thing to regret nothing in order to suffer no delay? It depends upon what delay one might be fearful of. In case it is delay and prevention from sinking deeper and deeper that one fears, then the best thing would be to shout, "to regret nothing," and to understand the word of the poet, nulla palescere culpa as inculcating the impudence which does not blush at guilt; but then the principle is in the highest degree unethical. There are, however, many men who dash through life with the haste of dread. There is nothing they fear more than the dialectic, and when they say, "to repent nothing" with reference to the past, they might with as much justification say, "to deliberate nothing" with reference to the future. So it is not without wit that a cunning fellow in one of Scribe's comedies says that as he had never made any plan, neither had he suffered the distress of seeing it fail. Womenfolk also often act thus without deliberation — and come out of it very well. In another way a wise man sometimes acts without deliberation and by force of despair to attain his end. When one is stumped by something and does not know which way to turn, when everything has become deadly relative as if one were being smothered, it may be expedient to act suddenly at a single point merely to stir up life in all that dead clot. An examining magistrate, e.g., when the understanding is brought to a halt and everything seems equally probable, suddenly aims his interrogation at a single individual, not because he has the most reason to suspect him, for a definite suspicion is precisely what he lacks — he follows this trace passionately, and sometimes a light flashes out, but at another spot. When one does not know whether one is sick or well, when this situation begins to be nonsense, one does well to venture upon something desperate. But notwithstanding one acts without deliberation, there is a sort of deliberation after all.

Otherwise the rule is to endure the dialectic tension, with deliberation as the antecedent and with repentance as the consequent term. Not till a man in deliberation has exhausted the dialectic does he truly act, and not till in repentance he has exhausted the dialectic does he truly repent. Hence it seems inexplicable that the mighty thinker Fichte could assume that a man of action has no time to repent, and all the more strange because this energetic and (in the noble Greek sense) candid philosopher had a high conception of man's actions as being only in the inward sphere. Perhaps it is to be explained by the consideration that on account of his energy he did not notice (at least in an earlier period) that this inward action is essentially passive, and that therefore a man's highest inward action is repentance. But to repent is not a positive movement out to or on till, but a negative movement in at, not a doing but a letting something befall one.

There are three existence-spheres: the aesthetic, the ethical, the religious. The metaphysical is abstraction, there is no man who exists metaphysically. The metaphysical, ontology, is but does not exist; for when it exists it is in the aesthetic, in the ethical, in the religious, and when it is it is the abstraction of or the prius for the aesthetic, the ethical, the religious. The ethical sphere is only a transitional sphere, and hence its highest expression is repentance as a negative action. The aesthetic sphere is that of immediacy, the ethical is that of requirement (and this requirement is so infinite that the individual always goes bankrupt), the religious sphere is that of fulfilment, but note, not such a fulfilment as when one fills a cane or a bag with gold, for repentance has made infinite room, and hence the religious contradiction: at the same time to lie upon seventy thousand fathoms of water and yet be joyful.

Inasmuch as the ethical sphere is a transitional sphere (which however one does not pass through once for all), and as repentance is its highest expression, repentance is also the most dialectic thing. So no wonder one fears it, for give it a finger and it takes the whole hand. As Jehovah in the Old Testament visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children in subsequent generations, so does repentance go constantly further back surmising objects for its investigation. In repentance is the tug of this movement, and for that reason the movement is reversed. The tug signifies precisely that the difference between the aesthetic and the religious is that between the inward and the outward. This infinitely annihilating power of repentance one can best perceive in the fact that it is sympathetically dialectic. One seldom gives heed to this. I would not speak here of such pitiable instances as that of wanting to repent of a single act and then be a fine fellow again, or wanting to have done it and to have people believe one's assertion to this effect, notwithstanding every such utterance is proof sufficient that the resolver, the assertor, the believer have no conception of what repentance means. But even more competent treatises on repentance overlook its dialectic side in the direction of sympathy. An example to illustrate this. A gambler is brought to a halt, repentance seizes him, he gives up all gambling; notwithstanding he was close to the abyss, repentance holds him back, it seems to succeed, and now while he is thus living in retirement, possibly saved, he sees one day that they have dragged up from the Seine a dead man, a gambler such as he had been, and this gambler had nevertheless, as he knew, striven against his vice, had fought a desperate fight to resist his inclination. But my gambler had loved this man, not because he too was a gambler, but because he was a better man. What then? There is no use in consulting romances and novels, but even a religious orator would perhaps break off my narrative a little earlier and let it end with my gambler going home shocked by the sight and thanking God for his own salvation. Halt! We should first have a little explanation, a judgment pronounced upon the other man. Every existence which is not devoid of thought is eo ipso engaged indirectly in passing judgment. If the other had been a hardened sinner, my man might well conclude that he did not want to be saved. But the other man was not that. Now my gambler is a man who has understood the old saying, de te narratur fabula, he is no modern fool who believes that everyone should court the objective and monstrous task of being able to patter something which applies to the whole human race, only not to himself. So then, what judgment shall he pronounce? For he cannot forbear to pass judgment, this de te is for him the most sacred law of existence because it is the covenant of humanity. If a religious orator, who to make up for the lack of ability to think is able at least to prate, were to be so deeply moved by human sympathy that he wished to help him with half-categories, my gambler is mature enough to see through the delusion — so that he must fight his way through. He stands at the decisive instant, he has to pass judgment with the humble expression of the doctrine of predestination (for the proud expression has its place in the aesthetic with spurious religious gilding) if he has hope for his own salvation. He who has no sympathy but has hydrophobia finds it of course unreasonable to take another man's fate so much to heart; but not to do so is unsympathetic, and it is guiltless only insofar as the reason for it is stupidity. Existence after all must have a law, the ethical world order is not a hurly-burly where one comes out well from the maddest enterprise, the other badly from the best. But now for the judgment. It is not meant here of course that he is censoriously inclined and feels compelled to condemn as a hen is to lay eggs. But he cannot himself be saved by an accident, that is mere thoughtlessness, and if he says of the other that he sank in spite of his good will, then he himself sinks; and if he says that the other did not want to be saved, then he shudders, because after all he saw the good in him, and because this would seem as though he made himself out a better man.

I have intentionally pushed the case to extremes. By means of the dialectic of repentance in the direction of sympathy every man who is not stupid must at once run aground. Although I am not a gambler, this phenomenon is enough for me — in case I am not an angel. Though I have ever so little guilt upon my conscience, yet if I have merely a little bit of thought in my brain, all small talk about rescue exchanged by Tom and Harry, breaks like a thread until one finds the law of existence. A man who indefatigably goes through life relying upon the category that he is not a criminal but neither is he pure, is of course comic, and one must help the aesthetic to get him extradited if he has hidden in the religious sphere in order to have a part in that, and must help to have him delivered over to comic treatment.

It is very droll to see an author who, though he is not observant of the dialectic of repentance in the direction of sympathy, is observant of something resembling it, namely, the expression of sympathy — to see such an author heal this suffering by making the sickness still worse. Börne, seriously, and not without a certain emotion at the thought of how easily in a little town one becomes a misanthrope or even a blasphemer and a rebel against the wise governance of Providence, declares that in Paris the tabulated statistics of suffering and crime contribute to heal people by the impression they make, as presumably they have contributed to make Börne a philanthropist. Yes indeed, the tabulated statistics are a precious discovery, a glorious fruit of culture, a characteristic contrast to the antique de te narratur fabula. Thus Schleiermacher says enthusiastically that knowledge does not disturb religion, and that the religious man does not sit in security under a lightning-rod and mock at God; but by the help of tabulated statistics one laughs at the whole of existence. And just as Archimedes sat absorbed in his calculations and did not notice that he was put to death, so, I think, does B — sit, and does not notice.... But what am I saying? Oh, far from it! Such a sensitive soul as B — will notice quickly enough when death comes so near to him, but so long as one is oneself saved from misfortune (for from sin B — can assuredly save himself by means of an unSocratic ignorance) one owes one's luxurious living to the possession of means whereby one holds the horror at a distance. To the poor indeed one can shut one's door, and if someone were to perish of hunger, one can find out from the statistical works how many die each year of hunger — and one is comforted.

An experimental psychologist has no use for tabulated statistics, but neither does he need such an immense concourse of people.

As an experimenter I have again propounded a problem for the religious man, the forgiveness of sin. To set immediacy and the forgiveness of sins cheek by jowl, in an immediate relationship, is a thing which might naturally occur to many people, they could also talk about it, they might also induce others to believe that they had experienced something of the sort, they might even prompt others to want to do the same and to want to have others think that they had done it. Why not? The only difficulty with this is that it is an impossibility. With respect to the bodily gait one does not have it so much one's own way, and if someone were to say that he walked on one arm, or even to say that everybody did so, people would soon discover that it was a false report, but a reporter has freer scope in dealing with the things of the spirit.

An immediate relation between immediacy and the forgiveness of sin means that sin is a single separate thing, and that this single thing forgiveness takes away. But this is not the forgiveness of sin. Thus a child does not know what the forgiveness of sin is, for a child believes of itself that fundamentally it is a nice child, "if only that thing had not occurred yesterday," and forgiveness takes that thing away. But if sin is something radical (a discovery due to repentance, which always precedes forgiveness), this means precisely that immediacy is viewed as invalid, but if so viewed it is practically abolished ("resolved").

But how does one manage to exist by virtue of such an idea, if it is a little more concretely understood? — For to patter something is not difficult. I perceive indeed that speculative minds and prophetic seers who contemplate the whole future of mankind will regard me at the most as a seminarist who perhaps might be capable of writing a catechetical commentary to a textbook for primary schools. It may be so, but after all that is something. If only the seminarists in turn will not exclude me from their society because they know infinitely more, and if only in the end, if I were content to be a schoolchild, the enlightened seminarist and the world-historically concerned parish clerk would not say, "It is a thoroughly stupid boy, he asks such foolish questions." To me this matters very little, I am taken up only with the thought of some day approaching in conversation that wise man of Greece whom I admire, that Greek wise man who laid down his life for what he had understood, and would gladly risk his life again to understand more, since he regarded it as the most dreadful thing of all to be in error. And I am confident that Socrates would say, "Certainly that is a difficult problem about which thou dost inquire, and it has always surprised me that so many could believe they understood such a doctrine, but still greater is my surprise that not a few of them have understood far more. With these latter, would that I might fall into conversation, and although it is not usually my custom to defray the cost of a banquet and pay the musicians, I nevertheless would have saved my pennies for such a purpose, in order to be initiated into their high — not merely superhuman but superdivine — wisdom. For Gorgias and Polos and Thrasybolos and the other Sophists who in my time had their shops in the market-place at Athens were only superhuman after all, were on a par with the gods, but from these men who outdo the gods and for this very reasonably receive not only money but adoration, from these men one might be able to learn much."

The thing that is difficult about the forgiveness of sin (if it is not to be determined on paper what it is, or by the living word in asseverations made at one moment with joyful emotion, at another with tears) is to become transparent to oneself to such a degree that at no point does one exist by virtue of immediacy, indeed even to such a degree that one has become another man — for otherwise the forgiveness of sin amounts to the same thing as my standpoint: the unity of the comic and the tragic.

But since immediacy is something simple (but also in the highest degree composite), it follows that by this one difficulty (i.e. that immediacy is abolished) as well as by the other which resembles it (that it is even abolished as sin) the signal is given for the question most difficile, which comprises all in one: how immediacy is to come back again (or whether the fact that immediacy is abolished for the individual signifies that he does not exist at all), what difference there is between this second immediacy and an earlier one, what is lost by it and what is gained, what it is the first immediacy can do which the second dare not do, what it is the first immediacy loves which the second dare not love, what is the certainty of the first immediacy which the second does not possess, etc., for this is a very prolix subject. In another sense it is a subject easily exhausted when one has no dread of living in error but has the modern foolhardiness in thinking that if only one says the thing, he is that — just as in a fairy-tale one by uttering a certain word becomes a bird.

Although I am not generally inclined to make wishes, and am by no means disposed to believe that the fulfillment of the wish would do me any good, yet for all that I could wish that a man with Socratic precision would let such an existing figure [i.e. a person who exists in virtue of the second immediacy] come into being before our eyes, so that we could see him as well as hear him. It is far from being my notion that by reading a narrative of such a thing a hundred times I should get one step further along, unless I were myself to approach that position by suffering. Praise be to the righteous rule and the just scale which does not let one acquire in mortal danger and with the utmost effort what another thoughtlessly sleeps into possession of by stupidity.

But the problem itself, the idea of the forgiveness of sin, lies outside the scope of that task which the experiment set itself, for its quidam is no more than a demoniac figure in the direction of the religious, and the problem surpasses both my understanding and my talents. I shall not avoid it with the excuse that this is not the proper place, as though it were only the place I lacked, or the time perhaps, or space on the paper, inasmuch as my way of thinking is this, that if once I myself had understood it, I could well enough find the place and the time and the space for the presentation of it.

CONCLUSION

MY DEAR READER! — But to whom am I speaking? There is perhaps not a single reader left. My case is inversely like that of the noble king whom the message of sorrow taught to make haste, whose swift ride to the side of the beloved one in danger of death the immortal ballad [A legend of Queen Dagmar.] has made immortal, when it sings of the hundred swains who followed him from Skanderborg, of the fifteen who rode with him across Randbol Heath, but when he crossed the bridge at Ribe their lord was alone. Pretty much so it is with me, but for the opposite reason, that enthralled by the one thought I have not budged from the spot, and all have ridden away from me. Maybe at the beginning the benevolent reader held in his swift courser and supposed it was an ambling steed I rode, but as I did not budge from the spot, the horse (i.e. that of the reader, or, if one will, the knight) became impatient, and I remained behind all by myself — a non-rider, or a Sonntagsreiter, from whom all ride away.

That being the case, there is no reason whatever for haste, I have plenty of time for myself and can, undisturbed and without incommoding others, talk to myself about myself.

The religious man, according to my view, is the wise man. But he who imagines he is a religious man without being that is a fool, and he who sees one side of the religious is a sophist. Of these sophists I am one, and even if I were capable of eating up the others, I should nevertheless not become fatter — which is not inexplicable as in the case of the lean kine in Egypt, for in the matter of religion the sophists are not fat kine but lean herring. I see the religious on all sides, but what makes me a sophist is that I do not become a religious man. The least in the sphere of religion is greater than the greatest sophist. My pain at this deprivation the gods have assuaged by granting me many a fine reflection and arming me with a certain degree of wit, which will be taken from me in case I employ it against the religious.

The sophists can be assigned to three classes. (1) Those who start with the aesthetic and obtain an immediate relationship with the religious. In this case religion becomes poetry, story. The sophist himself is enthusiastic about religion, but poetically enthusiastic; in this way he is willing to make every sacrifice, even to stake his life, but for all that he does not become the religious man. When he enjoys the maximum of esteem he confuses himself and permits himself to be confused with a Prophet and an Apostle. (2) Those who start with an immediate ethic and come into immediate relationship with the religious. For them religion becomes a positive doctrine of duty, whereas in truth repentance is the highest work of the ethical, and that is definitely negative. The sophist remains untried by the experience of infinite reflection, is a paragon of virtue in a positive abridgment. This is the source of his enthusiasm, and he honestly finds joy in making others enthusiastic in the same cause. (3) Those who put the metaphysical in an immediate relationship with the religious. Here religion becomes history, a thing which is finished — and the sophist is finished with religion and at his maximum becomes discoverer of the System. — What the sophists are admired for by the human throng is that they magnanimously refuse to be concerned about themselves in comparison with the poetic intuition in which the one loses oneself, in comparison with the positive endeavor to attain the goal which beckons the second, in comparison with the prodigious result the third attains by putting together finished facts. But the religious consists precisely in being religiously concerned about oneself infinitely, and not about visions; in being concerned about oneself infinitely, and not about a positive aim, which is negative and finite, because the infinitely negative is the only adequate form for the infinite; in being concerned about oneself infinitely, and so not thinking oneself finished, which is negative and perdition. — This I know, but I know it in equilibrium of spirit and therefore am a sophist like the others, for this equilibrium is an offense against the holy passion of the religious. But this equilibrium in the unity of the comic and the tragic, which is the infinite concern about oneself in the Greek sense (not the infinite religious concern about oneself), is not without significance as throwing light upon the religious. In a certain sense I am far more remote from the religious than are the three classes of sophists, who have all made a beginning at it, but in another sense I am closer to it, because I see more clearly where the religious is, and also do not make the mistake of laying hold of something amiss, but miss it by not laying hold of it.

So it is I understand myself. Contented with the lower thing, hoping that some day the greater thing shall be granted to me, busied with the occupations of the spirit, in which every man, it seems to me, must have plenty to do for the longest life, even if it were composed exclusively of the longest days. — I rejoice in existence, rejoice in the small world which is my environment. Some of my countrymen are maybe of the opinion that Copenhagen is a tiresome town and a small town. It seems to me on the contrary that, refreshed as it is by the sea on which it is situated, and without being able even in winter to dismiss the recollection of its beech forests, it is as favorable a place as I could desire to dwell in. Big enough to be a great city, small enough to have no market price set upon men, where the tabulated comfort one has in Paris that there are so and so many suicides, where the tabulated joy one has in Paris that there are so and so many persons of distinction, cannot penetrate disturbingly and whirl the individual away like foam, so that life acquires no significance, consolation lacks its day of rest and joy its holy day, because everything dashes off into space without content — or too full of it. — Some of my countrymen find the people who dwell in this town not vivacious enough. It does not seem so to me. The speed with which in Paris thousands form a mob around one person may indeed be flattering to the one about whom they collect, but I wonder if that makes up for the loss of the quiet mind which permits the individual to feel that after all he too has some importance. Precisely because the individuals have not totally fallen in price, as though it took a dozen to make one man, and because fortunately the people are too indocile to comprehend the half-hour erudition which only flatters the desperate and the blind, precisely for such reasons is life in this capital so entertaining for him who knows how to find in men a delight which is more enduring and yields bigger dividends than getting a thousand men to acclaim one for half an hour. Its defect is perhaps rather that one individual dreams of foreign lands, a second individual is absorbed in himself, a third individual is narrow-minded and separatist, etc., and so all these individuals prevent themselves from taking what is abundantly proffered, from finding what exists in abundance when it is sought. He who is not willing to undertake anything, might nevertheless, if he had an open eye, lead a life rich in enjoyment merely by paying heed to others; and he who has also his own work to do, would do well to take heed that he be not too much imprisoned by it. But how pitiable if there were many who miss what costs nothing, no entrance fee, no expenses for banquets, no dues to one's society, no inconvenience and trouble, what costs the rich and the poor equally little and yet is the richest enjoyment, who miss an instruction which is not obtained from a particular teacher but en passant from any person whatsoever, from conversation with someone unknown, from every accidental contact.

That upon which one in vain has sought enlightenment from books is suddenly illuminated by a flash of light at hearing one serving-maid conversing with another; an expression which one has tried in vain to torture out of one's own brain, in vain has sought in dictionaries, even in the "Dictionary of the Society of the Sciences," this one hears in passing — a raw soldier utters it, and does not dream what a rich man he is. And as he who walks in the great forest, amazed at it all, sometimes snatches a branch, sometimes a leaf, sometimes stoops to pluck a flower, now listens to the note of a bird — so does one walk in the midst of the human throng, amazed at the marvellous gift of speech, snatches now one and now another expression from a passer-by, rejoices in it and is not ungrateful enough to forget to whom he owes it; so one walks in the midst of the human throng, sees now one expression of a mental state, now another, learns and learns and becomes only more avid of learning. So let no one be deceived by books, as though the humane were of such rare occurrence, so let no one read of that in the newspapers, where the best part of the saying, the most lovable, the little psychological trait, is sometimes not preserved.

Some of my countrymen are of the opinion that their mother tongue is hardly capable of expressing difficult thoughts. This seems to me a strange and unthankful thought, as it also seems to me strange and exaggerated to be so zealous for one's language that one almost forgets to rejoice in it, to assert so zealously its independence that the zeal almost seems to indicate that one already feels one's dependence, and that in the end excitement is derived from the strife of words rather than refreshment from the joy of the language. I feel myself fortunate in being bound to my mother tongue, bound perhaps as few are, bound as Adam was to Eve because there was no other woman, bound because it has been impossible for me to learn any other tongue, and hence impossible to be tempted to look down proudly and haughtily upon the tongue to which I was born. But I am also glad to be bound to a mother tongue which is rich in original idioms, which expands the soul and delights the ear with its softer sounds; a mother tongue which does not puff and groan when it is held in the toils of a difficult thought (for which reason some think that it is incapable of expressing it), for it makes the difficulty easy by uttering it; a mother tongue which does not sound strained and panting when it is confronted with the unutterable, but employs itself with it in jest and earnest until it manages to utter it; a language which does not find at a remote distance what is near, nor seek in a profound abyss what lies close to hand, because it is on such good terms with the object that it passes in and out like a fairy, and like a child comes out with the happiest expression without quite knowing it; a language which is vehement and emotional when the right lover knows how to incite manfully the feminine passion of the language, is self-confident and victorious in the strife of thought when the right ruler knows how to lead it, is supple as a wrestler when the right thinker will not let go of it and will not let go of thought; a language which if it seems poor in a single instance, is nevertheless not so, but is disdained as a false lover disdains an unassuming maiden who possesses in reality the greatest worth and above all is not sophisticated; a language which is not lacking in expressions for the great, the decisive, the conspicuous, yet has a charming, a winning, a genial preference for the nuances of thought, for the qualifying term and the small talk of humor and the thrill of transition and the subtlety of inflection and the concealed luxuriousness of modest affluence; a language which understands jest quite as well as earnest — a mother tongue which binds its children with a chain, "easy to bear... yes, but hard to break."

Some of my countrymen are of the opinion that Denmark lives by consuming the memory of its ancient greatness. This seems to me a strange and ungrateful opinion to which no one can assent who would prefer to be friendly and joyful rather than sullen and refractory — the only thing which consumes. Others are of the opinion that a peerless future awaits Denmark; some who think themselves undervalued and unappreciated also comfort themselves with the thought of a better generation to come. But he who is fortunate in the present generation and is quick in inventiveness when the issue is to be satisfied with this has not many moments free for peerless expectations, and no more than he grasps at them is he inclined to be disturbed by them. And he who thinks that he is unappreciated by his contemporaries uses a wondrous argument in predicting a better generation to come. Even if it were true that he is unappreciated, and even if it is true that he would be recognized in a better age which would praise him, it is nevertheless unjust and a proof of prejudice to say of this later age that it is better because it thinks better of him. There is no such great difference between one generation and another; precisely the generation he censures finds itself in the position of praising what an earlier generation of contemporaries failed to appreciate.

Some of my contemporaries are of the opinion that to be an author in Denmark affords a poor livelihood. They do not merely mean that this is the case with such a questionable author as I am, who have not a single reader, and only a few who get as far as the middle of the book, and of whom therefore they are not thinking in passing this judgment; but they mean that it is the case even with distinguished authors. Now this land is only a little one. But in Greece was it so mean a position to be a magistrate, notwithstanding it cost money to be one? Suppose it were so, suppose it were to continue to be so, and that in the end it were to be the lot of an author in Denmark to pay a certain sum yearly for the labor of being an author. Well then, what if it were possible for foreigners to say, "In Denmark it is a costly thing to be an author, there are therefore no heaps of them, but then in turn they have not what we foreigners call catch-pennies, a thing so unknown in the realm of Danish literature that the language does not even possess an expression for it."

In case it were thinkable (as I do not assume) that there was one reader who had held out and so had got to the point of reading this Conclusion (a thing I could not have imagined, and, if I had, I would not have written this), and in case he were to talk to others about what he had read, perhaps some of my countrymen would have said, “Pay no attention to such an author, do not listen to him, he is a seducer.” And one of these “some” would perhaps have continued thus: “Generally one thinks of a seducer in connection with women, and even in this connection he is commonly depicted secretive and sly, with a demoniac passion. But this is not the most dangerous sort of seducer, even in relation to women. No, if I am to imagine the most dangerous sort, I picture to myself a young man with much imagination and intellectuality. He desires no woman’s favor, and this indifference is not a cover for a secret passion, far from it, he aspires after no girl, but he is a fanatic. He does not dance with the girls — in this respect he is far behind — but he seeks out a place in the cabinet adjoining the ballroom or a corner in the drawing room. When the young girls are a little tired of dancing, or when the dusk of evening falls and labor reposes and thought would flutter, there he sits, now is his time. Then they listen to his talk, and by his power of imagination he allures them on into seductive ideals, and while he talks, the expectation of their aspiring souls and the urgency of presentiment he stretches to a higher pitch. He himself asks for nothing, and again they seek the pleasure of the dance, again they return to their occupations, but privately they ponder over the lofty thoughts he uttered, and they long to imbibe again the benumbing delusion. He himself remains unchanged, for his joy is only the longing of speech and thought for the ideal. And when he falls silent it seems to him as if there were a profound sorrow in his heart, in his melancholy it seems to him as if he were an old man whom speech like a child leads through life. Thus the young girls harken to him, and little by little they are seduced, they seek in vain for what he described, seek it in vain in him, seek it in vain in themselves, and yet they long for his talk and grow old by hearing it. And when a little earlier the old aunt said to the girls, ‘Beware, little children, do not listen to him, he is a seducer,' they smiled and said, 'What, he! Why, he is the best man, and in his intercourse with us so circumspect, so reserved, as if he did not see us, or as if he were sorry for us, and what he says is so beautiful, oh, so beautiful!' A poet may be such a seducer. This author of course does not possess powers of this sort, just as he does not aspire after women, but yet in another sphere he is a seducer. Essentially he has nothing to say, is far from being dangerous, it is not for this that I warn against him, for as a profound philosophical friend said to me, 'He who regards him with a genuine speculative glance sees with half an eye that he, himself deceived' by life from being merely an observer, has become not a deceiver but deceit itself, the objective deceit, the pure negation.' Only at a time when men's spirits are so profoundly moved that the rule, 'He that is not with is against,' applies with double force, only in an age when the individuals, keyed up by the great crisis and the great decisions which confront them, might so easily be harmed, even by the most insignificant things, only in such an age could one be tempted to waste a word by giving warning against him, if that after all is necessary. He is in another sphere a seducer. Arrayed in jest, and by reason of that deceptive, he is inwardly a fanatic. So there he sits, close to the place where the company is assembled, so he prefers the quieter moment when the ear of the inexperienced youth eagerly drinks in the false teaching. Himself intoxicated by dreams and rendered strong by vain imaginations, as quiet as an observer, he would delude everyone into the belief that the individual possesses an infinite importance, and that this is the significance of life. Therefore do not listen to him, for he wishes, without any evil intention, to seduce you in a period of ferment to accept the undivided legacy of Quietism, with the idle notion that everyone should look after himself. He would induce you to shirk the great tasks which require united strength but also provide abundant reward for all. Behold, this he has not understood because he lacks objectivity and positivity. His existence is sheer optical illusion, his speech is as powerless and impotent as that of a ghost, and all his views are only, as the poet would say, ‘Pearly hues upon the ancient gate, and like snow at the end of summer.’ But ye who are alive and are the children of the age, do ye not observe that existence trembles, hear ye not the martial music which beckons, are ye not sensible of the haste of the instant such as the hand of the clock is unable to follow? Why this roaring, unless something is seething in the depths? Why this dreadful anguish, unless it is a sign of pregnancy? Therefore believe him not, nor listen to him, for I suppose that in his jesting and tiresome way which he takes to be Socratic he would say that from the anguish one cannot directly conclude that delivery is at hand, since it is with anguish as it is with nausea, which is worse with an empty stomach. Nor does it follow that everyone who has pains in the belly is therefore in parturition, it might also be tympanitis; item, nor that everyone who has a pain in the belly is therefore in parturition, it might also be something quite different, as Suetonius reminds us when he says of a Roman emperor, vultus erat nitantis. So do not concern yourselves about him, let him not trouble you, he has not been able to legitimate himself as a plenopotentiary authority for the age, he is not man enough to hit upon the very least thing the age might require, he is not capable of making any single proposal or of stepping forth with positive seriousness and with an attitude of distress to face the great task of the moment. But do not incite him to anger, for then he might possibly become dangerous, let him go for what he is, a scoffer and a fanatic in uno, a Philistine in toto, a deceiver, the pure negation. If ye do that, then he is no seducer.”

Ah, what luck that there is no reader who reads the whole thing through! And if so be, the injury done a man by leaving him to shift for himself, when that is the only thing he wishes, is like the Wise Men of Gotham punishing the eel by throwing it into the water. Dixi.

ORATORY; OR, SOMETHING ABOUT THE OCCASIONAL ADDRESSES OF THE CLERGY

by JOHANNES DE SILENTIO

(with constant reference to Aristotle's "Rhetoric")

WHAT I am here about to say might perhaps best be regarded as an introduction to a book, and if it is so regarded I desire in the next place to have it conceived of as the blurb on the dust cover which is not bound up with the book. The resolution to write it is in fact my own, otherwise I might give it up as an unwelcome task, but he who put this into my mind is Magister S. Kierkegaard, who expressly required it of me. For he has the intention of trying his hand on several discourses of this sort, and his wish was that this undertaking might need no introduction. Yet in bringing out the book he is afraid of seeing it subjected to the criticism of reviewers, and by connecting this introduction closely with his undertaking he fears that the book for all its unimportance might acquire a wrong kind of importance by means of this introduction which seems to invite criticism, and that this possibly would have the effect that the book might get too many readers, and, worst of all, not one uncritical reader. But this would be a sorry mistake. For, as it is required of a good speaker that he himself be his severest critic, so it is required of the good hearer or reader, though he were the cleverest head of all, that he renounce criticism. In relation to religion, the choice of the parson or of the book is perhaps not of so much importance as the deliberate and resolute choice to want to let oneself be edified. Therefore, without wishing in the following utterance to proclaim indulgence for the speaker, I am convinced that he who will let himself be edified, even if he were to hear perhaps a mediocre parson, or to read perhaps a mediocre book — that man will be edified....

The manifold political, philanthropic, social, artistic, literary, Italian-Danish, Danish-Italian, Scandinavian, etc., conflicts which are carried on in our time I leave entirely out of account. But if one considers the field of learning, and of theological learning especially, one is aware of a continual skirmish going on, whether it be that speculation seeks to take possession, by force or by guile, of the material of theology, or whether it be that theology seeks to shun an impudent familiarity as one would shun drinking brotherhood with the hangman. No decisive battle seems yet to have been waged. But all the same the struggle more or less clearly has captivated the attention of many, and among the devotees of theology the more distinguished men are entering this conflict because they think that strength is needed here, and the high prelates who keep watch over the whole joyfully fix their attention upon one or another distinguished man with a view to bringing him to the point where the danger is.

I assume that as a matter of fact it is precisely the more capable and distinguished men who, as teachers in the universities or in whatever other learned way it may be, sustain the conflict at these points — so the rest of us are safe, the studious youth will not be led astray, for the distinguished men defend the good cause and teach youth the truth.

The studious youth on the average cannot of course be accounted so highly gifted as these distinguished men, but for this reason the life-task of these students as subordinate clergy will be far easier to perform. I assume hypothetically that the danger really lies here, and that this contentious age, vigilant and alert to the scientific strife, safely leaves the easier tasks (assuming hypothetically that the other is harder) to the less gifted.

Of the subordinate servants of the Church (I mean the parsons, for I am not thinking here of the gravediggers, etc., and between parsons there should after all be only a relative distinction) — of these subordinate clergymen people think that they cannot require so much scholarly culture as of the docents in the university; and that is quite as it should be. But when with this they forget what properly is required of the Church's teachers, confusion results. For because not so much scholarly culture is required, there might all the more, along side of this more modest culture in exact learning, be required something else, which would make the demands upon the parson just as great as those upon the professor, and hence he would not continue to be evaluated in proportion to his relationship with the university for the reason that it was to this honorable institution he owed his youthful training as a student. If scientific scholarship is overestimated, not only the students but the clergy are ranked according to a possible relation to this maximum of being able to become or to be a theological professor.... But is there any justification for this conclusion, that a man who is not quite capable of being a professor but comes close to it would eo ipso be a distinguished servant of the Church?

So people see the scientific danger; but in the field where the man less strictly trained and less gifted has to put out at interest what he has learned, has to put it to use, has to make the sublime pronounceable, has to give a definite answer to a simple question, assume a definite position at the point where, as he heard from his professor, even learning wavers, and without daring to secure his position by showing his scholarly disdain for someone as not sufficiently learned (tasks which are all of them readily perceived to be the easiest) — in that field there is no danger!

Let us, however, make an experiment. Let us take a fairly competent theological professor whose lectures from a scholarly point of view are worthy of respect. Now we will make the experiment — he is asked to give an edifying lecture.... He can't do it. It is not impossible that the learned professor will himself admit this, and that thereupon everyone, every clergyman who hears him, every deferential layman, will humble himself under the following dignified remark: “I can do it all right; it is not that I can’t do it, but the congregation can’t follow me.” That I am quite ready to believe; it is precisely upon this I found my conclusion: so then he can’t do it. Socrates, for example, was not great because he could talk so that nobody could understand him, nor because he could talk so that the sophists understood him, but because he could talk with everybody in such a way that everybody understood him, and in such a way, be it noted, that he constantly said the same thing....

So then, the reason the professor gave seems to me a vain utterance, well devised to save his skin. It is perfectly true that the professor should be proud of his scholarly knowledge, that he should say of it, “I do not want to make a fool of myself or of them, as though it were possible in half an hour to convey to everyone what costs me with my superior talents time and diligence year in and year out, and hence I disdain all dabbling at popular instruction.” That is quite right. It is perhaps to be wished that men of scholarship would sometimes talk that way in all seriousness. But in case the professor is not hide-bound, he will add: “On the other hand, there are different tasks, such as that of delivering an edifying discourse, a sermon, which I feel the need of hearing just as the simplest man does, and for that I have not the gifts and am not trained for it; but I understand very well that it may take the whole time and diligence of a distinguished man just as scholarly learning does mine.”...

PREFACE

NOTWITHSTANDING THIS LITTLE book (of occasional addresses, as they might be called, although the occasion is lacking which creates the speaker and gives him authority, or the occasion which creates the reader and makes him a learner) is entirely uncalled for, and so in its unimportance is entirely without excuse, is without support from any external circumstance, and so is helpless in its detailed development, it is nevertheless not without hope, and above all not without a cheerful confidence. It seeks that individual whom I with joy and gratitude call my reader — or it does not even seek him: regardless of time it waits in quietness for that right reader to come as a bridegroom and bring the occasion with him. Each does his part, so it is the reader who does most. What really counts is appropriation. Hence the book's joyful surrender. Here there is no worldly mine and thine to separate, and to forbid one to appropriate what belongs to his neighbor. For admiration after all contains a little envy and so is a misunderstanding, and censure, however justified it may be, contains after all a little resistance and so is a misunderstanding, and recognition in the mirror is only a fleeting acquaintance and so is a misunderstanding, but to behold rightly and not be willing to forget as the impatient mirror does, that is appropriation, and appropriation is the reader's still greater, his triumphant surrender.

S.K.

WHAT IT MEANS TO SEEK AFTER GOD

— inasmuch as without purity no man can see God, and no man takes notice of God without becoming a sinner.

In case the seeker seeks what lies outside him, as something external, something which is not within his power, then the thing sought is in a particular place. If only he finds the place where it is, then indeed it is well with him, then he grasps it, and his seeking is at an end. So it is that everyone knew once in his early youth that there were so many beautiful things in existence, but the place he did not know definitely. Ah, even though many a man has forgotten this childish wisdom, I wonder if all have therefore become wiser, and he too, I wonder, who instead of that beautiful unity of fullness has gained the duplicity of doubt and half-heartedness in resolution!

In case it is assumed that the seeker himself is able to do nothing at all to find the place, he is then a wisher. So was everyone once in earlier youth. Ah, even though many a man has changed, I wonder if all therefore have truly changed for the better, and he too, I wonder, who instead of the uncertain wealth of the wish has gained the certain wretchedness of mediocrity!

When the wisher sees his wish fulfilled he is struck with wonder, as already by being a wisher he was in wonderment. So was everyone once in his early youth — not easily allured, as they say unjustly of the young, into foolish enterprises, but easily allured into blissful and unrestrained abandonment to wonder, the honest requittal which the wisher scrupulously keeps in store for the instant of fulfilment. Ah, even though many a man has lost this impetuous haste to render like for like, as he has also learned to think meanly of the wish, is therefore this higgling honesty which does not thoroughly wish and does not thoroughly wonder, and in this fashion renders like for like, is this a gain? — He who wishes also seeks, but his seeking is blind, not so much with respect to the object of his wish as with respect to the fact that he does not know whether he is approaching it or receding.

Now among the many goods there is one which is the highest, which is not to be defined by its relation to other goods, since it is the highest, and this the seeker knows without having a definite conception of it, for precisely as the Unknown it is the highest — and this good is God. The other goods have names and designations, but where the wish breathes most deeply, where this Unknown seems to show itself, there is wonder, and wonder is the sense immediacy has of God and is the beginning of all deeper understanding. The seeking of the wisher is blind, not so much with respect to the object (for this in fact is the Unknown) as with respect to the question whether he is approaching it or receding — all at once he is startled, the expression of wonder is worship. And wonder is an ambiguous state of mind which comprises fear and bliss. Worship therefore is mingled fear and bliss all at once. Even the most refined and rational worship of God is blissfulness in fear and trembling, confidence in the face of mortal danger, frank-heartedness in the consciousness of sin. Even the most refined and rational worship has the fragility of wonder, and it is not directly the greatness of the power and the wisdom and the performance which determines the magnitude of the God-relationship; the most potent is in the deepest impotence, the most pious sighs out of the deepest sense of need, the mightiest is he who rightly folds his hands.

The wonder of the wisher answers to the Unknown and so is entirely indeterminate, or rather infinitely determinable, may be just as loathsome as it is ludicrous, may be just as bewildered as it is childish. When the forest darkens at the evening hour, when at night the moon loses its way among the trees, when in the forest the wonders of nature lurk for their prey, and then suddenly the pagan sees a wondrous effect of light which grips him, then he sees the Unknown, and worship is the expression of wonder; when the knarled tree-trunk forms a deceptive shape which is unknown to him, which resembles a human being and yet again in his amazement has only a supernatural resemblance, then he comes to a halt and worships; when in the desert he sees a track which does not belong to any man or to any being known to him, when the power of solitude impregnates his soul with wonder, then in this track he sees that the Unknown has been here, and he worships; when the sea lies still and inexplicable in its profundity, when wonder gazes dizzily down into it until it is as though the Unknown were rising up, when the waves of the sea roll monotonously towards the shore and overwhelm the soul by the power of uniformity, when the rush whispers before the wind and whispers again and so must desire to confide something to the listener — then he worships. — If the wonder defines itself, then its highest expression is that God is the inexplicable All of existence, as this is sensed by the presentiment of imagination, in the least things and in the greatest, everywhere. What once was the content of paganism is experienced again in the repetition of every generation, and only when it has been outlived is that which was idolatry reduced to a careless existence in the innocence of poetry. For poetry is idolatry refined.

In case it is assumed that the wisher himself is able to contribute something to the finding of what is sought, then he is a striver. With that both the wonder and the wish are about to encounter their test. Often deceived, since in fact the scope of wonder, precisely because it had a direct relationship to the Unknown, comprised the loathsome as well as the ludicrous, the bewildered as well as the childish — wonder, often deceived, would look ahead and no longer walk blindly. The direct relationship is thus at the very first instant a broken relationship, without being however a breaking through to its object. It is broken by the fact that the way comes between as a determinant, whereas for the wisher there is no way. When the seeker does not walk blindly, he then does not wish only, he strives; for striving is precisely the way to the thing sought. So was everyone once in his earlier youth, high-soaring in purpose; ah, even though many a man has now learned to remain on the ground, I wonder if they therefore have all become wiser, he too, I wonder, who instead of the flight of a bird has gained the stooping gait of a four-footed beast! So was everyone once in his earlier youth, reckless in daring; ah, and even though many a man gave it up, I wonder if they all therefore became wiser, he too, I wonder, who instead of the race of recklessness after an uncertainty has gained the safety of the pedestrian upon the highway of mediocrity! So was everyone once in his earlier youth, undaunted; ah, and even though many a man learned to tone down his demands, I wonder if they all therefore became wiser, he too, I wonder, who was surfeited by fortune's favors, or he who from his environment learned pettiness, or he who in bondage to custom learned contentment! Oh, truly it is wise not to talk of fortune if one knows how to utter a holier name; but if not, it was indeed a misfortune that fortune vanished from human life, that it became weary of giving and taking, became weary of man who defrauded it of its wonder.

But in the world of freedom where in fact all striving has its source and all striving its life, there wonder meets one upon the way. The striving has various names, but that which is after the Unknown is directed toward God. The fact that it is toward the unknown means that it is infinite. Then the striver comes to a stop, he sees the deceptive track of a monstrous being which exists when it is past, which is and is not; and this being is fate, and the striving is like going astray. Worship is again the expression of wonder, and its scope comprises the loathsome as well as the ludicrous, the bewildered as well as the childish.

In case it is assumed that the seeker can do everything to find the thing sought, then the magic is done away with, wonder is forgotten, there remains nothing to wonder at. And then, the next instant, the thing sought is nothing, and this is the reason why the man was capable of doing everything. So was everyone once at the turning point of youth, when he became an eternity old; ah, and even though many a man comforts himself with the thought that he has not experienced this horror, I wonder if they therefore have all become wiser, he too, I wonder, who was still a youth at the age of an old man! So it was with everyone once, in bidding farewell to youth, that life came to a stop and he was undone; and even though many a man brags of his youthfulness, I wonder whether he therefore too was wiser who defrauded the years and eternity of their rights and whose highest wisdom was to make a frivolous answer to the most serious question!

There was a time in the world when men, weary of wonder, weary of fate, turned away from the external and found that there was no object of wonder, that the Unknown was a naught and wonder a fraud. And what once was the content of life returns in the repetition of the race. Though someone were to deem himself wise in saying that there are superseded forms which were done with thousands of years ago — it is not so in human life. And thou, my hearer, surely art not disposed to think that I would waste thy time recounting great events and mentioning queer names and being prosaically self-important in the contemplation of humanity as a whole. Ah, no, if it is true that he is defrauded who only gets to know a little, I wonder if he too is not defrauded who got to know so much that he appropriated nothing at all! Man advances slowly. Even the most glorious knowledge is after all only a presupposition. If one would augment the presuppositions more and more, he is like the miser who heaps up money for which he has no use. Even what is worthy of being valued highly, a happy upbringing, even that is only a presupposition, much time elapses before it is appropriated, and a whole lifetime is not too much if one would appropriate it. Ah, in case he was defrauded whose upbringing was neglected, I wonder then if not also he was defrauded who remained unaware that it was a presupposition, a treasure entrusted to him, a sacred heritage which should be acquired, who without more ado laid hold upon it and deemed himself to be what he had the name of being. If the better men have sometimes sighed because the thing sought was so far distant, thou surely, my hearer, hast comprehend that there is also another difficulty, that there is an illusion of knowledge which deludes the soul, that there is a security in which one is knowing... and yet deceived, that there is a remoteness from all decision where one without dreaming it is lost. Let terror seize its prey — ah, this security is a more terrible monster! Let the distress of poverty reduce to starvation — is it better to perish of overabundance? It was harrowing when wonder let go of a man and he despaired of himself, but just as harrowing it is that one can know of this, can know far more, and not have had this experience, and most harrowing that one may know everything and not have made a start with the least thing. And if it is so, ah, let me begin over again; return, thou youth, with thy wish and thy lovable wonder, thou wild striving of youth with thy recklessness and thy shudder before the unknown, seize me, thou despair which breaks with the wonderful and with the wonder of youth, but quickly, quickly, if it be possible, if I have wasted my best years without experiencing anything, teach me at least not to become indifferent, not to seek consolation with others, so terror at the last may be the beginning of my healing; however late it may be, this at all events is better than to live as a liar, deceived, not by what might seem calculated to deceive, and therefore, alas, horribly deceived — deceived by much knowledge.

So then, wonder was a thing of the past, it is a thing of the past; so it was said at one time, and so now the despairer speaks and repeats it in despair, and repeats it mockingly, and would comfort himself by mockery while this wounds others, as if all mockery were not a two-edged sword! But thou, my hearer, knowest that the discourse precisely now stands at the threshold of wonder. Hence the discourse has no wish to take thee by surprise, nor would it deceive thee by an optical illusion in the lightning flash of thought when everything is reversed, nor would it carry thee away in an amazed confusion. He who actually has experienced the foregoing easily sees through the confused medley of remembrance, and in case he has not experienced it, then to hear or to read a discourse will be of dubious benefit to him. But thou who thyself art in a state of wonder, thou knowest surely that this wonder came into existence when once that first wonder was consumed by despair. But where might there be found a worthier object of wonder than when the seeker with his wishing and striving, the desperate man about to perish in despair, suddenly discovered that he was the thing sought, that the misfortune is that he stands there and loses it! For take the wisher as he sits and dreams, call to him and say, "Thou hast the thing wished for"; stop the striver as he rushes along the way, stop him and say, "Thou hast the thing striven for"; break through the despair, that the desperate man may comprehend that he has it — ah, what emotion he feels when he is overwhelmed with wonder, and again at the same instant a second time overwhelmed because he loses again as it were the thing sought! The glory of the wish and the striving of recklessness do not a second time awaken wonder, this is prevented by the long hyphen of despair; but that the object of his search is a given fact, that it is in the possession of him who stands there in misunderstanding and loses it — this awakens the wonder of the entire man. And indeed what stronger expression is there for wonder than that the wonderer is as it were changed, as when the wisher changes color, what stronger expression than this, that he actually is changed! And so it is with this wonder which changed the seeker, so it is with this wonder, that this thing of seeking became something different, yea, the very opposite: that to seek signifies that the seeker himself is changed. He does not have to find the place where the object of his search is, for it is right beside him, he does not have to find the place where God is, he does not have to strive towards it, for God is right beside him, very near, near on every hand, omnipresently near, but the seeker has to be changed so that he himself becomes the place where God truly is.

However, wonder, which is the beginning of all deeper understanding, is an equivocal passion which comprises fear and bliss. Or was it not fearful, my hearer, that the object sought was so near thee that thou wast not seeking God but God was seeking thee; was it not fearful that thou couldst not move without being in Him, and not be so unobserved but, lo, thou wast in Him, nor flee to the uttermost bounds of the world but that He was there and at every place on the way, nor hide thyself in the abyss but that He was there and at every place on the way, nor say to Him, “Only an instant,” seeing that He also was in the instant when thou didst say this; was it not fearful when the playfulness of youth and the immaturity of despair became seriousness at the instant when that which thou didst once point at and aspire after and of which thou didst say that it did not exist then came into existence, yea, was in existence everywhere about thee and embraced thee on every hand! But was it not blissful that the hand of the mighty could block thee up in the darkest hole and yet not shut out God; was it not blissful that thou couldst fall into the deepest abyss where one can see neither sun nor stars and yet can see God; was it not blissful that thou couldst go astray in the solitary wilderness and yet at once find the way to God; was it not blissful that thou couldst become an old man who had forgotten everything and yet never forgets God because He cannot become something by-gone, that thou couldst become dumb and yet call upon Him, blind and yet see Him, deaf and yet hear Him, that He would not say as men do, “Only an instant,” because He was in the instant the instant He said it! — But he who leaves out fear, let him look well to it that he does not also leave out the finding. It is so easy, or if someone would prefer to say the same thing in another way, it is so hard to find God that people even go to the trouble of proving that God exists and find a proof necessary. Let the labor of proof be hard, especially let it cause trouble to him who is expected to understand that it proves something; the thing has become easy for the prover, for he has taken his position outside, he does not treat with God, but his is a treatise about God. If on the contrary this thing of seeking should signify that a man himself is to be changed, then let the seeker look well to himself. One has to learn wonder from a child and fear from a man; that is at all events a preparation, then comes fear enough when God comes and renders proofs superfluous. Or is this perhaps courage that one remains unconscious of danger, that the prover sits unchanged and proves and proves that the Omnipresent exists, the Omnipresent who therefore also at the instant of the proof sees through the prover — without however having any scientific opinion about the utility of the proof? Might the Omnipresent actually become like a rare freak of nature the existence of which the scholar proves, or like an irregular star which people observe at intervals of hundreds of years, the existence of which therefore requires a proof, especially for the intervening centuries in which it is not visible?

But the true wonder and the true fear one man cannot teach the other. Only when they constrict and expand the soul, thine, precisely thine, thine alone in the whole world, because thou art alone with the Omnipresent, only then do they truly exist for thee. Though an orator had the eloquence of an angel, and though he had an aspect which could strike the bravest heart with terror, so that thou didst fall, as the expression is, into the profoundest wonder at his eloquence, and horror seized thee upon hearing him; it is not this wonder and not this fear which helps. It applies to every man, the least and the greatest, that neither an angel, nor legions of angels, nor all the terrors of the world, can instil the true wonder and the true fear, but they well may make him superstitious. The true wonder and the true fear is there only when he, precisely he, be he the meanest or the greatest of men, finds himself alone with the Omnipresent. The greatness of power and wisdom and performance does not directly determine the magnitude of the God-relationship. Or did not the magicians of Egypt perform almost as great signs as Moses? Suppose they had been greater — what inference could be drawn from that? None, no inference at all with respect to the God-relationship. But Moses feared God, and Moses wondered at God, and fear and wonder, or the fear in wonder together with its bliss determines the magnitude of the God-relationship.

It is true, as the understanding says, that there is nothing to wonder at, but precisely for this cause is wonder secure — because the understanding vouches for it. Let the understanding condemn what is transitory, let it clear the ground, then wonder comes in the right place, in ground that is cleared, in the changed man. Everything appertaining to that first wonder the understanding can consume; let it do so, in order that enigmatically it may help one to wonder, for it is indeed enigmatical, since it conflicts with the judgment of the understanding concerning itself. But if a man gets no farther, let him not accuse the understanding, nor let him be triumphant because it has been victorious. In case a prince sends a general against a foreign land, and that general conquers it, and thereupon himself takes possession of it as a rebel, then there is indeed no reason for accusing him because he conquered it, but neither is there any reason to be triumphant, since he himself retained it. And so, if a man by his understanding is victorious over what was pretty indeed yet also childish, then let him not accuse the understanding; but if the understanding ends by making a rebellion, then let him not be triumphant. But the wonder is in the changed man.

As here is described, so it was once with every man at the instant of decision when the sickness of the spirit struck in and he felt himself imprisoned, imprisoned forever. Ah, though many a man comforts himself with the thought that he has avoided this danger, I wonder if he too was wiser who shrewdly and cravenly defrauded himself when he thought he was defrauding God and life! So it happened once to everyone, when it was all over with jest and illusion and diversion; ah, and though many a man boasts defiantly of his unconcernedness, I wonder if he therefore was wiser whose life ran riot in parasitic growth because he was not bound! So it happened once to everyone; ah, and even though many a man flatters himself that he had a more advantageous lot, I wonder if therefore he became wiser who, being unbound, did not know that just for this cause he was unfree!

When the thing sought is assumed to be given, seeking signifies that the seeker himself is changed so that he becomes the place where the object of the search can truly be. And the thing sought was in fact given, it was so near that it was as though again it were lost, without the certainty that it is lost — how a man loses ground! What a distance separates him from that time when he wished, when he recklessly dared, when the thing sought was far off, when self-complacency boasted defiantly that it did not exist — and now it has come so near that it is lost, and the loss dates back to a distant past! The seeker was to be changed; ah, and he was changed — how a man loses ground! And the changed state in which he is we call sin. So the thing sought is, the seeker is the place, but changed, and changed from having once been the place where the object of search was. Ah, now there is no wonder, no ambiguity! The state of the soul when it comprehends this is fear and trembling in the guilty one, its passion is sorrow over remembrance, its love is repentance in the man of perdition. My hearer, was it not thus? The discourse does not mean to take thee by surprise, it possesses no authority to extort from thee any confession of sin. On the contrary, it cheerfully acknowledges its impotence in this respect, it is willing to say to a man that not all the eloquence of the world is capable of convincing him of his sin, but then also it would remind him not to fear the eloquence of sinners but the omnipresence of the Holy One, and still more to fear escaping from it. If a man is to understand his sin essentially, he must understand it because he remains alone, he alone, precisely he alone with the Holy One who knows all things. Only this fear and trembling is the true sort, only the sorrow which the remembrance of God awakens in a man, only the repentance His love fosters. Though an orator had a voice like the thunder of heaven, though he had an aspect which struck men with terror, though he understood how to accuse with his eye, and then as thou wast sitting there, my hearer, he pointed to thee and said, “Thou, thou art a sinner,” and though he did it with such power that thine eyes sought the ground, that the blood retreated from thy cheeks, and perhaps for a long time thou didst not recover from the impression — then thou didst know surely that he by his behavior transformed the scene into a booth at the fair where he performed his juggler’s tricks, and thou didst deplore that he disturbed thee from finding the stillness. Fear and trembling before an abomination, before a pious debaucheé, is not the true fear and trembling. As it is truly said that a man is not to seek his peace in another man lest he build upon the sand, so it is true also that he is not to rely upon the notion that it is the business of any other man to convince him that he is a sinner, though another may well remind him of his own responsibility to God, if he does not discover it himself. Every other understanding is distraction. And it is mere jest if I were to judge thee, but this is seriousness if thou dost forget that God will judge.

So then, the object of the search is given, God is near enough; but no man can see God without purity, and sin is precisely impurity, and therefore no man can take note of God without becoming a sinner. The first is an inviting word, and the glance of the soul is upward towards the height where the goal is; but at the same instant there rings out the other word which indicates the beginning, and this word is a depressing word. And such is the case with him who would understand sin for himself.

So here the discourse arrives at the beginning. The beginning does not come about through wonder, but verily neither does it come about through doubt, for he who doubts of his guilt makes a bad beginning, or rather he continues what with sin was badly begun. "What comes with sin goes with sorrow," — this surely applies to sin itself: it goes with sorrow. Sorrow is therefore the beginning, and trembling is the vigilance of sorrow. The deeper the sorrow, so much the more does a man feel himself to be nothing, less than nothing, and this precisely for the reason that the sorrower is the seeker who begins to take note of God. It has always been said, even in paganism, that the gods do not sell the highest things for naught, that a divine envy which prompts the divinity to set store upon itself determines the conditions of the relationship — how might not then this thing of an individual man becoming aware of God, how might it not have its requirement? And this requirement is that a man become a sinner. And yet this is not, if I may say so, a courtesy man shows to God, that His holy presence reduces the individual to a sinner; no, the individual was a sinner, but he became such only by God's presence. He, however, who seeks to understand himself in the consciousness of sin before God does not understand this as a general proposition that all men are sinners, for it is not upon this generality the emphasis falls. The deeper the sorrow, so much the more does a man feel himself as nothing, as less than nothing, and abatement of self-esteem is a sign that the sorrower is a seeker who begins to take note of God. In a worldly sense it is said that he is a poor soldier who does not hope to attain the highest rank; in a godly sense the reverse is true: the less one believes in oneself, not as man in general or as being a man, but of himself as an individual man, not with respect to talents, but with respect to guilt — so much the more distinct will God become in him. We would not increase guilt in order that God may become greater, but we well may increase the knowledge of guilt. And as the magistrate who sleeplessly watches over justice sometimes employs spies who themselves are guilty, so is everyone whom the Holy One employs himself a debtor, sometimes even a debtor in the strictest sense, a guilty man, so that the Holy One is concerned both for the salvation of the guilty one and about saving others by means of him.

Works of Love (1847)

SOME CHRISTIAN REFLECTIONS IN THE FORM OF DISCOURSES

Translated by David F. Swenson and Lillian Marvin Swenson, 1946

Works of Love was published under Kierkegaard's own name, as opposed to his more famous "pseudonymous" works. It deals primarily with the Christian conception of agape love in contrast with erotic love (eros) or preferential love (phileo) given to friends and family. Kierkegaard uses this value/virtue to understand the existence and relationship of the individual Christian. Having helped establish the concept of Existentialism, he combines it with a high-level of theology, citing the scriptures of the Christian Bible. Many of the chapters discuss examples of 'love' from the New Testament and examine reflections about the transfer of individuals from secular modes (the stages of the aesthetic and ethical) to genuine religious experience and existence. Since human experience is a key to understanding Kierkegaard, the actual relationships and experiences of disciples and of Christ are characterised here as tangible models for behavior.

THESE CHRISTIAN MEDITATIONS which are the fruit of much reflection will be slowly but also easily understood, although they will certainly prove very difficult to anyone who by a cursory and merely inquisitive reading makes them so. “That individual” who first considers whether he will read them or not, should he finally decide to read them, will sympathetically consider whether the difficulty and the ease, when these are thoughtfully weighed on the balance, are rightly proportioned to one another, so that the Christian idea may not be given a false weight by making the difficulty or the ease too great.

They are “Christian reflections,” and therefore not about love, but about the works of love. They concern the works of love, not as if all its works were herein enumerated and described, far from it; not as if the particular works herein described were now described once for all — praise God, that is impossible! For that which in its whole wealth is essentially inexhaustible, is also in its least expression essentially indescribable, because it is essentially present everywhere in its wholeness, and essentially incapable of being described.

PRAYER

HOW COULD ANYTHING rightly be said about love if Thou wert forgotten, Thou God of Love, from whom all love comes in heaven and on earth; Thou who didst hold nothing back but didst give everything in love; Thou who art love, so the lover is only what he is through being in Thee! How could anything rightly be said about love if Thou wert forgotten, Thou who didst make manifest what love is. Thou, our Saviour and Redeemer, who gave Himself to save us all! How could anything rightly be said about love if Thou wert forgotten. Thou Spirit of Love, Thou who dost abate nothing of Thine own, but dost call to mind that sacrifice of love, dost remind the believer to love as he is loved, and his neighbor as himself! O Eternal Love! Thou who art everywhere present, and never without testimony in what may here be said about love, or about works of love. For it is certainly true that there are some acts which the human language particularly and narrow-mindedly calls acts of charity; but in heaven it is certainly true that no act can be pleasing unless it is an act of love: sincere in its self-abnegation, a necessity for love, and, just because of this, without claim or merit.

I. THE HIDDEN LIFE OF LOVE AND ITS RECOGNITION BY ITS FRUITS

FOR EVERY TREE is known by its own fruit For of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes. — Luke 6:44

IF IT WERE TRUE, as a conceited cleverness believes, proud of not being imposed upon, that one should believe nothing that one does not see with the sensual eye, then must one first and foremost cease to believe in love. And if one did this and did it for fear of being deceived, would one then not be deceived? One may be deceived in many ways; one may be deceived by believing the false, but one may also be deceived by not believing the true; one may be deceived by appearances, but one may also be deceived by the appearance of shrewdness, by the flattering conceit which is absolutely certain it cannot be deceived. And which deception is the more dangerous? Whose recovery is the more doubtful, that of one who does not see, or his who sees and yet does not see? Which is more difficult — to awaken one who is sleeping, or to awaken one who, awaking, dreams that he is awake? Which sight is more distressing, one which immediately and unequivocally moves one to tears, the sight of the unhappy deception of love, or that which in a certain sense might occasion laughter, the sight of the self-delusion whose foolish conceit of being incapable of being deceived is certainly ridiculous and something to laugh at, were not the ridiculous here an even stronger expression for horror, because it indicates that the one self-deceived is not even worthy of tears?

To defraud oneself of love is the most terrible deception of all. It is an eternal loss for which there is no compensation either here or in eternity. For if otherwise, however else it may differ, the question is about being deceived about love, then the victim still retains his hold on love, and the deception consists merely in there being no love where it was supposed to be. But the self-deceived has excluded and does exclude himself from love. Much has also been said about being deceived by life or in life; but one who self-deceived defrauded himself of living, has suffered an irreparable loss. Eternity may yet richly compensate a man who all his life had been deceived by life; but the self-deceived has prevented himself from gaining the eternal. Oh, what has one whose love made him a victim of human deception really lost if in eternity it appears that love abides while the deception has ceased! But the one who by shrewdness defrauded himself by cleverly falling into the snare of cleverness, even if throughout his whole life he conceitedly deemed himself lucky, what has he not lost if in eternity it appears that he defrauded himself! For a man may perhaps succeed in getting along in the temporal existence without love; he may succeed perhaps in getting through time without discovering the self-deception; he may perhaps succeed — how terrible! — in continuing in his self-conceit, glorying in it; but in eternity he cannot do without love, and he cannot fail to discover that he has forfeited everything. How earnest, how terrible existence is, just when it chastisingly permits the self-willed man to act for himself, so that he is allowed to live on, glorying in being deceived, until sometime he has to testify that he everlastingly defrauded himself! Truly, eternity will not be mocked; what is more, it does not even need to use force, but with supreme effectiveness it uses a bit of mockery to punish the presumptuous man most terribly. What is it which connects the temporal and the eternal, what except love, which just for this reason is before everything, and which abides when everything else is past? But precisely because love is the bond of the eternal, and because the temporal existence and eternity are heterogeneous, for that reason love may sometimes seem burdensome to the earthly prudence of the temporal existence, and therefore in this existence it may seem a tremendous relief to the sensual man to cast off this bond of the eternal.

The self-deceived man certainly believes that he can rely upon himself, moreover, that he has more than conquered. In his fool's conceit it is hidden from him how distressing his life is. That "he has ceased to sorrow," we shall not deny. But what advantage is this to him when his chance of salvation lies in his beginning in earnest to sorrow over himself! The self-deceived man even thinks perhaps that he is able to comfort others who were victims of a perfidious deception. But what madness for one who had sustained an eternal injury to wish to heal someone who at most is sick unto death! Through a strange contradiction, the self-deceived man perhaps believes that he is sympathetic with the unfortunate victims of a deception. But if you listen carefully to his consoling speech and healing wisdom, then you will know his love by its fruits; by its bitter mockery, by the shrewdness of its reasoning, by its poisonous spirit of mistrust, by the cutting coldness of its obduracy; that is, it will be known by its fruits that there is no love in his sympathy.

We know the tree by its fruits; we do not gather grapes from thorns or figs from thistles; if you try to gather them there, then you will not only gather in vain, but the thorns will prove to you that you gather in vain. For every tree is known by its own fruit. It may very well be that there are two fruits very closely resembling each other; the one is palatable and delicious, the other bitter and poisonous. Sometimes too the poisonous one is very palatable, the healthful one bitter to the taste. So also love is known by its own fruit. If a man makes a mistake, it must be either because he does not know how to judge rightly in this particular case, or because he does not know the fruits. Thus a man may make a mistake and call that love which is really self-love: when he is absolutely certain that he cannot live without the beloved, but he will listen to nothing about its being the task and requirement of love that a man should deny himself and renounce the selfishness of love. Or he may make a mistake and call a weak complacency by the name of love; or a demoralized whining, or harmful connections, or natural vanity, or selfish associations, or the bribery of flattery, or momentary impressions, or relationships of the temporal existence, by the name of love.

There is a flower which is called the flower of eternity, but there is also, strange to say, a so-called everlasting flower which, like perishable flowers, blooms only at a certain time of year: what a misnomer to call the latter an everlasting flower! And yet at the time of blossoming it does not look so deceptive. But every tree is known by its own fruit, and love too is known by its fruit, and the love about which Christianity speaks is known by its own fruit because it has the truth of the eternal in it. All other love, whether, humanly speaking, it withers early and is changed, or cherished it endures throughout the temporal existence, is nevertheless perishable, it merely blooms. In this lies precisely its fragility and its sadness; whether it blossoms for an hour or for seventy years, it merely blossoms. But Christian love is eternal. Therefore no man who understands himself would think of saying of Christian love that it blossoms. No poet who understands himself would think of celebrating Christian love in song. For that which the poet sings must contain the sadness which is his own life's mystery: it must bloom — and, alas, it must perish. But the Christian love abides, and just for that reason it is: for what blooms perishes, and what perishes blooms, but what is cannot be sung, it must be believed and it must be lived.

However, when one says that love is known by its fruits, then one also says that love itself in a certain sense is in secret, and just because of this secrecy it can only be known by its manifest fruits. This is absolutely true. Every life, including the life of love, is hidden, but is revealed in another way. The life of the plant is hidden, the fruit is its manifestation. The life of thought is hidden, its expression in speech is its revelation. The sacred words we read have a twofold meaning, while concealingly they speak only of one; obviously the statement contained one thought, but secretly it also contained another.

So let us then call attention to both thoughts, as we now speak about:

THE HIDDEN LIFE OF LOVE AND ITS RECOGNITION BY ITS FRUITS.

Whence comes love? Where is its source and its wellspring? Where is the secret place from which it issues? Truly, that place is hidden, or it is in secret. There is a place in the heart of man; from this place issues the life of love, for "out of the heart are the issues of life." But you cannot see this place; however far you penetrate, the source withdraws in distance and secrecy. Even when you push farthest in, the source is always on beyond, like the source of the fountain which just when you are nearest is farther away. From this place love issues forth in manifold ways; but by none of these ways can you penetrate its hidden source. As God dwells in a light from which every ray of light which illumines the world issues, yet by none of these ways can a man enter in order to see God; for the way of light changes to darkness if one faces toward the light: so love dwells in secret, or is hidden in the heart. As the spring-fed mountain stream by the murmuring persuasiveness of its rippling entices, almost begs, a man to follow it along its course, and not inquisitively try to force his way to its source and reveal its hidden secret; as the rays of the sun invite men by their radiance to behold the glories of the world, but reprovingly punish the presumptuous man with blindness if he inquisitively and audaciously faces about to discover the source of the light; as faith invitingly volunteers to be man's companion on the way of life, but petrifies the one who impudently turns around in order to try to understand it: so it is love's wish and prayer that its secret source and its hidden life in the heart may remain a secret; that no one inquisitively and impudently shall try to force himself in disturbingly in order to see that which nevertheless he cannot see, but whose happiness and blessing he may certainly forfeit through his curiosity. It always causes the most painful suffering when the surgeon in operating is obliged to cut into the more vital and therefore the more secret parts of the body; so there is also the most painful suffering, and also the most demoralizing, when someone, instead of rejoicing in the manifestations of love, wishes to gratify himself by scrutinizing the love itself, that is, by disturbing it.

Love's secret life is in the heart, unfathomable, and it also has an unfathomable connection with the whole of existence. As the peaceful lake is grounded deep in the hidden spring which no eye can see, so a man's love is grounded even deeper in the love of God. If there were at bottom no wellspring, if God were not love, then there would be no quiet lake or human love. As the quiet lake is grounded darkly in the deep spring, so is human love mysteriously grounded in God's love. As the quiet lake invites you to look at it, but by its dark reflection prevents your looking down through it, so the mysterious origin of love in the love of God prevents you from seeing its source; if you think you see it, then you are deceived by a reflection, as if that which merely conceals the deeper source were the true source. As the ingenious cover, placed over a treasure for the express purpose of absolutely concealing the treasure, looks like the bottom of the receptacle, so that reflection which but conceals something even deeper, looks deceptively like the deep bottom.

So the life of love is hidden; but its secret life is itself in motion and has eternity in it. As the quiet lake, however placidly it lies, is really running water — for is there not a wellspring at bottom? — so love, however quiet it is in its concealment, is ever flowing. But the quiet lake can become dry if its source sometime fails; the life of love, on the contrary, has an eternal wellspring. This life is fresh and everlasting; no cold can chill it, it is too fervent for that; and no heat can exhaust it, its coolness is too fresh for that. But it is hidden. And when the Gospel speaks of the recognition of this life by its fruits, then is not its meaning after all this, that one should not trouble and disturb this hiding-place; that one should abandon the observations which but "benumb the spirit" and retard the growth?

Yet this hidden life of love is recognisable by its fruits; moreover, it is a necessity of love that it should be known by its fruits. Oh, how beautiful it is that this word which indicates the greatest wretchedness at the same time indicates the greatest wealth! To need, to have need and to be needy, how reluctant a man is to have this said about him! And yet we are expressing the highest praise when we say of a poet that he needs to write; of an orator that he needs to speak; of a girl that she needs to love. Ah, even the most needy person who has ever lived, if he still has had love, how rich has not his life be compared with the life of the only poor man, who lived his life through and never felt the need of anything! For this is certainly the maiden's greatest riches, that she needs the beloved; this is the highest and truest wealth of the devout that he needs God. Ask them, ask the maiden if she could feel equally happy if she could get along just as well without the beloved; ask the devout if he understands or wishes that he could get along just as well without God! So it is with the recognition of love by its fruits, which precisely, therefore, if the relationship is right, is said to press forward, whereby again its richness is indicated. This might also cause the greatest agony if it were really true that in love itself there could be the self-contradiction that love commanded it be kept hidden, commanded that it should be unrecognizable. Would that not be as if the plant which felt the vigorous life and blessing of fertility, dared not let it be known, acted as if the blessing were a curse, kept it to itself, alas, as the secret of its inexplicable withering! Therefore it is not true. For even if a single particular expression of love, if a love affair, were pushed back by love in a painful concealment: the same life of love would nevertheless produce a new expression of love, and would still be known by its fruits. Oh, ye quiet martyrs of an unhappy love! What you suffered from a love that must conceal a love indeed remained a secret; you never revealed it, such was the greatness of your love that made this sacrifice: and yet your love was known by its fruits! And perhaps just those fruits became precious, those which were matured by the quiet burning of a secret pain.

The tree is known by its fruits; for a tree is also known by its leaves but the fruit still affords the essential knowledge. If you, therefore, identified a tree by its leaves as being that particular tree, but in the time of fruit you discovered that it did not bear fruit, then you would know from this that it was not the tree it appeared to be from its leaves. This is true also concerning the recognition of love. The apostle John says, "My little children, let us not love in word or in tongue, but. in deed and in truth." And with what better can we compare the words and expressions of love than with the leaves of a tree? For words and expressions and the inventions of language can also afford a knowledge of love, but they are not reliable. The same words in the mouth of one person can be so rich, so trustworthy, which in the mouth of another can be like the vague whisper of the leaves. The same words which in the mouth of one can be like the "blessed nourishing corn," in the mouth of another can be like the unfruitful beauty of the leaves. But because of this you must not restrain the words any more than you must conceal the visible emotion when it is genuine. For one may ungenerously wrong a man if one withholds from him that which is his due. Your friend, your beloved, your child, or whoever is the object of your affection, has also a right to an expression of this affection in words, if your heart truly prompts you. The emotion is not your own possession, but it belongs to the other; its expression is his due, since you in your emotion belong to him who causes that emotion, and who is conscious that you belong to him. When the heart is full you must not enviously, arrogantly, unfairly to the other, injure him by silently compressing the lips; you must let your mouth speak out of the heart's abundance. You should not be ashamed of your feelings, and even less of honestly giving everyone his due. But one must not love in words and forms of speech, nor should one recognize love in this way. On the contrary, one will know by such fruits, or by the fact that there are only leaves, that love has not yet reached its growing season. Sirach says warningly: "If you devour your leaves you will drop your fruit and leave yourself standing like a dry tree." For precisely by the fact of words and expressions being love's only fruit, one knows that a man has unseasonably stripped away the leaves, so that he gets no fruit; not to mention the more terrible fact that one sometimes recognizes the deception just by the words and expressions used. Consequently immature and deceptive love is known by the fact that words and verbal expressions are its only fruit.

We say about certain plants that we must plant the heart; so we may also say about human love: if it is really to bear fruit, and hence be known by its fruit, then we must first plant the heart. For love certainly issues from the heart; but let us not, in considering this, forget that eternal truth that love plants the heart. Every man knows the fugitive impulses of an irresolute heart, but the impulses of the natural heart are infinitely different from planting the heart in the sense of the eternal. And how seldom is this true that eternity acquires so much authority over a man that the love in him is able to establish itself everlastingly, or truly to plant the heart. However, this is the condition essential for bearing love's own fruit by which it is known. As the love itself is invisible, a man must therefore believe in it; so it is not to be known simply and unconditionally by any of its expressions as such.

There is no word in the human language, not a single one, not the most sacred, about which we are able to say: “If a man uses this word it unconditionally proves that he has love.” On the contrary, it is always true that a word used by one man can assure us that he has love, and an absolutely contrary word used by another can assure us that he loves just as much; it is true that a word can assure us that love dwells in the heart of the one who uttered it, and not in another who nevertheless used the same word.

There is no act, not a single one, not the best, about which we unconditionally dare to say: “He who does this proves unconditionally that he loves.” It depends on how he shows his love. There are, we know, deeds which in a special sense are called acts of charity. But truly, because one gives alms, because one visits the widow and clothes the naked, one’s love is not thereby proved or even recognizable. For one can perform acts of charity in an unkind, moreover, even in a selfish way, and when this is the case, the act of charity is not a work of love. You have certainly very frequently seen this distressing sight; you have perhaps caught yourself doing what every honest man must confess about himself, just because he is not unkind and hardened enough to overlook the essential thing, you have caught yourself forgetting in what you do, how you do it. Alas, Luther may have said that not one single time in his whole life had he prayed absolutely undisturbed by any irrelevant thoughts; so too the honest man acknowledges that however often and however many times he willingly and gladly gave alms, he never did it except imperfectly, perhaps influenced by some accidental impression, perhaps by a capricious partiality, perhaps to satisfy his conscience, perhaps with an averted face — but not in the scriptural sense without the left hand perhaps becoming conscious of it — but thoughtlessly, possibly thinking of his own sorrow — instead of thinking of the affliction of the poor, possibly seeking personal relief through giving alms — instead of wishing to alleviate poverty: so the act of charity did not in the highest sense become a work of love.

Hence how the word is spoken, and above all how it is meant, hence how the act is performed: this is the decisive thing in determining and in recognizing love by its fruits. But here again the point is that there is nothing, no "thus," about which it can unconditionally be said that it unconditionally proves the presence of love, or that it unconditionally proves that love is not present.

And yet it is certain that love must be known by its fruits. But the sacred words of our text are not uttered for the purpose of encouraging us to occupy ourselves in judging one another; they are, on the contrary, spoken admonishingly to the individual (to you, my hearer, and to me), in order to encourage him not to permit his love to become unfruitful, but to work so that it may be known by its fruits, whether others do recognize them or not. For he certainly must not labor for the sake of having his love known by its fruits, but labor so that it may be known by its fruits; in this labor he must guard himself so that the recognition of the love does not become more important to him than the one thing needful: that it bear fruit, and hence may be known by its fruit. One thing is true, whatever clever advice one may give a man, whatever precautions one can recommend to prevent being deceived by others, the Gospel demands something different and something far more important of the individual, that he bear in mind that a tree is known by its fruits, and that it is he or his love which the Gospel compares with a tree. The Gospel does not say, as would the speech of the clever: "Some of you will know the tree by its fruits." But it says: "The tree shall be known by its fruits." The explanation is that you, you who read these words of the Gospel, you are the tree. What the prophet Nathan added to the parable, “Thou art the man,” the Gospel did not need to add, since it is already evident in the form of the expression, and in the fact that it is the word of an evangelist. For the divine authority of the Gospel does not speak to one man about another man, not to you, my hearer, about me, or to me about you. No, when the Gospel speaks, it speaks to the individual; it does not speak about us men, you and me, but it speaks to us men, you and me, and it speaks about the love that is known by its fruits.

If therefore some eccentric and fanatical, or hypocritical, person were to teach that love was such a secret emotion that it was too select to bear fruit, or so secret that its fruit neither proved anything for nor against it, moreover, that not even the poisonous fruit proved anything, then we should remember the Gospel words: the tree is known by its fruits. Not for the sake of criticizing but to defend ourselves against such assertions, we shall call attention to the fact that that which always happens with respect to every apostolic utterance, happens here, that “he who acts in accordance with this word is like a man who built his house upon a rock.” “When the storms come” and devastate the select fragility of that sensitive love; “when the winds blow and beat upon” the web of hypocrisy: then will the true love be known by its fruits. For truly love shall be known by its fruits, but it does not therefore follow from this that you should presume to be the judge; the tree too must be known by its fruits, but it does not therefore follow from this that there is one tree which shall presume to judge the others; on the contrary, it is always the individual tree which must — bear fruit. But a man should fear neither the one who can kill the body, nor the hypocrite. There is but One whom a man should fear, that is God; and there is but one for whom a man should fear, that is himself. Truly one who in fear and trembling before God feared for himself, has never been deceived by hypocrisy. But he who busied himself in tracking down hypocrites, whether he succeeded or not, must vigilantly watch to see that this too is not hypocrisy; for such discoveries are still hardly the fruits of love. On the other hand, the one whose love in truth bears its own fruit will involuntarily and unwittingly expose every hypocrite who comes near him, or else he will make him ashamed; but the lover will perhaps not even be conscious of this. The most mediocre defense against hypocrisy is shrewdness; moreover it is scarcely a defense, rather a dangerous proximity; the best defense against hypocrisy is love; and it is not merely a defense but a yawning chasm; through all eternity it has nothing to do with hypocrisy. And this is also a fruit by which love is known, in that it assures the lover against falling into the snare of hypocrisy.

But even if it is true that love is known by its fruits, let us not in our love for one another impatiently, suspiciously, condemningly, perpetually ask to see the fruits. The first point we developed in this discourse was that we must believe in love, otherwise we simply do not know that it exists; but now the discourse returns to that first point and says repeatedly: believe in love! This is the first and the last thing there is to say about love, if one wishes to know; but the first time it was said to oppose the impudent common sense which wished to deny the existence of love; now, on the contrary, after having explained its recognition by its fruits, it is said to oppose the sickly, timid, fastidious narrow-mindedness which in petty and wretched mistrust wishes to see the fruits. Do not forget that it would be a beautiful, a noble, a sacred fruit by which the love in your heart became recognizable, if in your relations to another man, whose love perhaps bore poorer fruit, you were loving enough to see his love as more beautiful than it was. If suspicion can actually see something less than it is, then love can also see something greater than it is.

Do not forget that even when you are rejoicing in the fruits of love, when you know by them that love dwells in the other man, do not forget that it is even more blessed to believe in love. Just this constitutes a new expression for the depth of love, that when one has learned to know it by its fruits, one then returns to that first point, and returns to it as the highest, to believing in love. For the life of love is indeed known by the fruits which make it manifest, but the life itself is still more than the individual fruit, and more than all its fruits taken together, if you were to count them at any one moment. Therefore, the last, the most blessed, the unconditionally convincing characteristic of love abides: the love itself, which is known and recognized by the love in another. The like is known only by the like; only he who abides in love can know love as his love is also known.

II. A. THOU SHALT LOVE

BUT THE SECOND commandment is like unto it: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. — Matthew 22:39

EVERY SPEECH, especially a portion of a speech, usually presupposes something from which it proceeds. He who desires to make the speech or the assertion a subject of reflection does well, therefore, to look first for this presupposition, in order to start from it. So there is also a presupposition contained in the text we read, which although it comes last is nevertheless the starting point. Therefore when we are told: “Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,” then this statement contains the presupposition that every man loves himself. Consequently Christianity presupposes this, since Christianity, unlike those ambitious thinkers, by no means begins without presuppositions, or with a flattering assumption.

And would we dare to deny that what Christianity presupposes is true? But, on the other hand, could anyone so misunderstand Christianity as to believe it was its intention to teach that which worldly wisdom unanimously — alas, and yet divisively — teaches, that everyone loves himself best? Could anyone misunderstand this, as if it were the intention of Christianity to hold self-love in honor? On the contrary, it is its intention to strip us of our selfishness. This selfishness consists in loving one’s self; but if one must love his neighbor as himself, then the commandment opens the lode of self-love as with a picklock, and the man with it. If the commandment about loving one’s neighbor were expressed in some other way than by the use of this little phrase, “as thyself,” which is at once so easy to use and yet has the tension of eternity, then the commandment would not be able thus to master the self-love. This “as thyself” does not vacillate in its aim, and so it enters with the condemning inflexibility of eternity into the most secret hiding place, where a man loves himself. It does not leave self-love the least excuse, the least loophole open. How strange! Long and shrewd speeches might be made about how a man ought to love his neighbor; and then, after all the speeches had been heard, self-love could still hit upon an excuse and find a way of escape, because the subject had not been absolutely exhausted; the alternatives had not been canvassed; because something had been forgotten, or not accurately and bindingly enough expressed and described.

But this "as thyself"! Certainly no wrestler can get so tight a clinch upon his opponent as that with which this commandment embraces the selfishness which cannot stir from its place. Truly, when selfishness has striven with this word, which yet is so easy to understand that no one should break his head on it, then it must perceive that it has been striving with the stronger power. As Jacob limped after he had wrestled with God, so shall the selfishness be broken when it has striven with this word, which, however, does not wish to teach a man that he ought not to love himself, but, on the contrary, simply wishes to teach him the proper kind of self-love. How strange! What struggle is so protracted, so terrible, so complicated, as the battle of self-love in its own defense? — and yet Christianity decides everything with a single blow. The whole is swift as a handspring, everything is decided, like the eternal decision of the resurrection, "in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye": Christianity presupposes that a man loves himself, and merely adds to this the word about loving your neighbor "as yourself." And yet there lies the difference of eternity between the first and the last.

But would this really be the highest form of love? Would it not be possible to love a man better than one's self? We hear such talk now and then, the expression of a poet's enthusiasm. Could it perhaps be true that it was because Christianity was not able to soar so high, presumably also because it addresses itself to simple, commonplace men, that it wretchedly continues to stress the requirement of loving one's neighbor "as one's self"? Could that be why, instead of basing its demand on that object of ambitious love which poets celebrate, "a beloved," "a friend," it bases it on the apparently very unpoetical "neighbor"? For certainly no poet has ever sung about loving one's neighbor, any more than he has sung about loving him "as one's self." Could this perhaps be the case? Or should we, as we make a concession to the love which the poet sings as compared with the love commanded, humbly praise the circumspection of Christianity and its understanding of life, because it holds itself to earth more soberly and more enduringly, perhaps with the same import as that of the proverb which says: "Love me little, love me long"?

Be this far from us! Christianity knows a better answer to the question of what love is and about loving than does any poet. Precisely therefore it knows too that which perhaps escapes the attention of many poets, that the love they praise is secretly self-love, and that this explains its intoxicated expression: about loving another man better than one's self. Earthly love is still not the eternal love, it is the beautiful fantasy of the infinite, its highest expression is mysterious foolishness. That is why it even tries its hand at an even more fantastic expression, the "loving a man more than God." And this foolishness pleases the poet beyond all measure, it is delicious in his ears, it inspires him to song. Alas, Christianity teaches that this is blasphemy.

And what is true of love is also true of friendship, insofar as this too is a consequence of partiality: of loving this one man above all others, of loving him as distinct from all others. Therefore the objects of both love and friendship bear the nomenclature of this partiality, "the beloved," "the friend," who is loved above all the rest of the world. On the contrary, the Christian teaching is to love the neighbor, to love the whole race, all men, even one's enemy, and to make no exception, either of partiality or of dislike.

There is only One whom a man may with the truth of the eternal love better than himself, that is God. Therefore it does not say, "Thou shalt love God as thyself," but it says, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind." A man must love God in unconditional obedience and love Him in adoration. It would be ungodliness if any man dared to love himself in this way, or dared to love another man in this way, or dared to permit another man to love him in this way. If your beloved or your friend begged you for something which you, because you honestly loved him, had anxiously considered would be injurious to him: then a responsibility would rest upon you if you showed your love by acquiescing in his wish, instead of showing it by denying him its fulfilment. But God you must love in unconditional obedience even if that which He demands of you may seem injurious to you, moreover injurious to His own interests. For God's wisdom is incomparable with respect to your own, and God's guidance is not obliged to be responsible for your cleverness. You have only to obey in love. A man, on the contrary, you must only — yet, no, that is the highest — consequently you must love a man as yourself; if you can better perceive his best than he can, then you will not be able to excuse yourself by the fact that the harmful thing was his own wish, was what he himself asked for. If this were not the case, then there might quite rightly be something said about loving another man better than yourself; for this love would consist in: in spite of your own conviction that it would be harmful to him, obediently doing it because he asked it, or adoringly, because he wished it. But this you simply have no right to do; you are responsible if you do it, just as the other is responsible if he should misuse his relationship to you in this way.

Consequently— “as thyself.” If the most cunning deceiver who has ever lived (or we may invent one even more cunning than has ever lived) in order if possible to have the right to use many words and to become long-winded, for then the deceiver would soon triumph, were to persist year out and year in inquiring “temptingly’ of the “royal law,” “How shall I love my neighbor?” — then will the laconic commandment unchanged continue to repeat the brief phrase, “as thyself.” And if any deceiver — deceived himself all his life by all sorts of difficulties concerning this matter, then will eternity only reprove him with the brief words of the commandment, “as thyself.” Verily, no one will be able to escape the commandment; if its “as thyself” presses as hard on life as possible, so again “neighbor” is a category which in its offensiveness is as perilous to self-love as possible. That it is impossible to escape from these two categories, self-love itself readily perceives. The only escape is the one the Pharisee in his time attempted in order to justify himself: to make it doubtful who his neighbor was — in order to get him out of the way.

Who then is one’s neighbor? The word is evidently derived from “nearest,” so the neighbor is the one who is nearer you than all others, although not in the preferential sense; for to love the one who is preferentially nearer one than all others, is self-love— “Do not even the heathen the same?” The neighbor, then, is nearer to you than all others. But is he also nearer to you than you are to yourself? No, not so; but he is, or should be, equally near. The concept “neighbor” is really a reduplication of your own self; the “neighbor” is what philosophers would call the “other,” the touchstone for testing what is selfish in self-love. Insofar, for the sake of the thought, it is not even necessary that the neighbor should exist. If a man lived on a desert island, if he developed his mind in harmony with the commandment, then by renouncing self-love he could be said to love his neighbor.

“Neighbor” is itself a multitude, for “neighbor” implies “all men,” and yet in another sense one man is enough to enable you to obey the commandment. In a selfish sense it is an impossibility consciously to be two in being a self; self-love demands that it be one. Nor are three needed, for if there are two, that is, if there is one other human being whom, in the Christian sense, you love “as yourself,” or in whom you love the “neighbor,” then you love all men. But what the selfish definitely cannot tolerate is: duplication, and the words of the commandment, “as thyself,” are exactly a duplication. One who is burning with love can never because of or by virtue of this burning, endure the reduplication which here would mean the relinquishing of love, if the object of the love required it. Consequently the lover does not love the beloved “as himself,” for he is a claimant, but this “as thyself” precisely implies a claim upon him — and yet, alas, the lover still believes that he loves the other man better than himself.

“Neighbor” presses as closely as possible upon the selfishness in life. If there are only two men, the other man is the neighbor; if there are millions, each one of these is the neighbor, who is again closer to one than “the friend” and “the beloved,” insofar as those, as being the objects of preferential love, gradually become analogous to the self-love in one. We are ordinarily conscious that the neighbor exists and that he is close at hand when we believe that we have rights with regard to him, that we may claim something from him. If someone with this idea asks: Who is my neighbor? then will Christ’s answer to the Pharisee be a reply only in a very peculiar sense, for in the answer the question is first really transformed into its opposite, whereby it is intimated how a man ought to ask. After having related the parable of the good Samaritan, Christ says to the Pharisees, “Which of these three do you think was neighbor to him who fell among thieves?” And the Pharisees answer “rightly,” “The one who showed mercy to him.” That is, by recognizing your duty to him, you readily discover who your neighbor is. The answer of the Pharisees is implicit in Christ’s question, which by its form compelled the Pharisee to answer as he did. He to whom I have an obligation is my neighbor, and when I fulfil my obligation I show that I am his neighbor. Christ does not talk about knowing one’s neighbor, but about one’s self being a neighbor, about proving one’s self a neighbor, as the Samaritan proved himself one by his compassion. For by his compassion he did not prove that the man attacked was his neighbor, but that he was the neighbor of the one who was assaulted. The Levite and the priest were in a closer sense the neighbors of the victim, but these refused to recognize that fact; the Samaritan, on the contrary, who through prejudice might have misunderstood, still rightly understood that he was the neighbor of the man who had fallen among thieves. To choose a beloved, to find a friend, those are indeed complicated tasks, but a neighbor is easy to know, easy to find, if we will only — recognize our duty.

This was the commandment, “Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,” but when the commandment is rightly understood, it also says the converse, “Thou shalt love thyself in the right way.” If anyone, therefore, will not learn from Christianity to love himself in the right way, then neither can he love his neighbor; he may perhaps, as we say, “for life and death” — cling to one or several other human beings, but this is by no means loving one’s neighbor. To love one’s self in the right way and to love one’s neighbor are absolutely analogous concepts, are at bottom one and the same. When the “as thyself” of the commandment has taken from you the selfishness which Christianity, sad to say, must presuppose as existing in every human being, then you have rightly learned to love yourself. Hence the law is: “You shall love yourself as you love your neighbor when you love him as yourself. Whoever has some knowledge of men will certainly admit that as he has often wished to be able to influence men to give up their self-love, so he has also often wished that it were possible to teach them to love themselves. When the busy man wastes his time and energy on vain and unimportant projects, is this not because he has not rightly learned to love himself? When the frivolous man abandons himself, almost as a mere nothing, to the folly of the moment, is not this because he does not rightly understand how to love himself?

When the melancholy man wishes to be done with life, aye, with himself, is this not because he will not learn strictly and earnestly to love himself? When a man, because the world or another man faithlessly betrayed him, yields himself up to despair, how was he to blame (for we are not here speaking of his innocent suffering), except for not having loved himself in the right way? When a man in self-torment thinks to do God a service by torturing himself, what is his sin except this, of not willing to love himself in the right way? Ah, and when a man presumptuously lays his hand upon himself, does not his sin precisely consist in not loving himself in the way in which a man ought to love himself? Oh, there is so much said in the world about treachery and faithlessness, and, God help us! this is unfortunately only too true, but let us still never forget that the most dangerous traitor of all is the one every man has in his own breast. This treachery, whether it consists in a man's selfishly loving himself, or in the fact that he selfishly does not wish to love himself in the right way, this treachery is certainly a mystery because there is no outcry about it, as is usual in cases of treachery and faithlessness. But is it not therefore all the more important that we should repeatedly be reminded about the Christian teaching; that a man should love his neighbor as himself, that is, as he ought to love himself?

The commandment about love to one's neighbor uses one and the same word, "as thyself," about this love and about the love for one's self — and now the introduction to this discourse pauses at that which it desires to make the subject of our consideration. That by which the commandment about love to one's neighbor and about love to one's self become synonymous is not only this "as thyself," but even more that word, "Thou shalt" It is about this that we wish to speak: for this is precisely the criterion of the Christian love and its characteristic, that it contains the apparent contradiction; that loving is a duty.

THOU SHALT LOVE,

Thou shalt love, this is consequently the word of the "royal law." And, truly, my hearer, if you are able to form any conception of the world as it was before these words were uttered, or if you strive to understand yourself, and pay some attention to the lives and state of mind of those who, although they call themselves Christian, still really live under the categories of paganism: you will then humbly admit, with the wonder of faith, that with respect to this Christian word, as with all Christian expressions, such a commandment has not originated in any human heart. But now since this commandment has been in force through eighteen hundred years of Christianity, and before that time in Judaism; now since everyone has been brought up in it, and from the spiritual point of view is like a child brought up in the home of well-to-do parents, who quite naturally forgets that his daily bread is a gift; now since the Christian religion has many times been rejected by those who were brought up in it, because they preferred all kinds of novelties, just as wholesome food is refused by a person who has never been hungry, in favor of sweets; now since the Christian religion is everywhere presupposed, presupposed as known, as given, as indicated — in order to go on: now it is certainly asserted as a matter of course by everyone; and yet, alas, how seldom is it considered, how seldom perhaps does a Christian earnestly and with a thankful heart dwell upon the idea of what his condition might have been if Christianity had not come into the world! What courage was not needed in order to say for the first time, “Thou shalt love,” or rather, what divine authority was not needed in order by this word to reverse the ideas and concepts of the natural man! For there at the border line where human language pauses and courage weakens, there the revelation breaks forth with divine primitiveness and proclaims what is not difficult to understand in the sense of requiring depth of understanding or human parallels, but which nevertheless does not originate in any human heart. It is not really difficult to understand when it has been said, and it wishes only to be understood in order to be obeyed; but it does not originate in any human heart.

Let us consider a pagan who has not been spoiled by having thoughtlessly learned to repeat the Christian commandments by rote, or spoiled by imagining that he is a Christian — and this commandment, “Thou shalt love,” will not only astonish him, but it will shock him, it will offend him. Just because of this that commandment of love, which is the Christian recognition that “all things are become new,” applies again here. The commandment is not in an accidental sense something new, or in the understanding of curiosity a piece of news; nor in the sense of the temporal existence something new. Love also existed in heathendom; but the idea that love is a duty is an everlasting innovation — and everything has become new. What a difference between the play of the emotions and impulses and inclinations and passions, in short, that play of the forces of immediacy, that glory celebrated in poetry in smiles or in tears, in wishing or in need; what a difference between that and that of eternity, the earnestness of the commandment in spirit and in truth, in sincerity and self-denial!

But human ingratitude! Oh, what a short memory it has! Because the supreme good is offered to everyone, one regards it as nothing, perceives nothing in it, to say nothing of really evaluating its precious quality, as if the highest really lost something through the fact that everyone has or may have the same. If a family possesses one or another costly treasure which is closely associated with a definite event, then the parents tell their children about it from generation to generation, and their children in turn tell their children how this came about. But because Christianity has for so many centuries been the possession of the whole race, must therefore all talk about what an eternal change took place in the world because of its coming, cease? Is not every generation equally near to this, that is, equally bound to make it explicit? Is the change less remarkable because it happened eighteen hundred years ago? Has it, too, become less noteworthy that a God exists, because for several thousand years generations of people have lived who believed in Him? Does it therefore become less wonderful to me — if otherwise I believe this? And is it less wonderful for one who lives in our time, eighteen hundred years later, that he became a Christian, because it is eighteen hundred years since Christianity came into the world? And even if it is not quite so long ago, then he must surely be able to remember how he was before he became a Christian, and consequently know what change took place in him — if this change consisted in his becoming a Christian. Consequently no world-historic descriptions of heathendom are needed, as if it were eighteen hundred years since the overthrow of heathendom; for it is surely not quite so long since both you, my reader, and I were heathen, were that, of course — if we now have become Christian.

For this is surely the most distressing and the most impious kind of deception, to allow one's self through ingratitude to be defrauded of the highest good which one believes one possesses, and, alas, to find that one does not possess it. For what, indeed, is the highest possession, what is the possession of everything, if I never get the right impression of my possession of it, and of what it is that I possess! Because, according to the Scriptures, he who has worldly goods should be as one who does not have them, I wonder if this is also right with respect to the supreme good: to have it and still be as one who does not have it. I wonder if that is right, yet, no, let us not be deceived by the question, as if it would be possible to have the supreme good in this way. Let us realize that this is truly an impossibility. The earthly goods are of no consequence, and therefore the Scriptures teach that when they are possessed they should be possessed as the unimportant; but the supreme good cannot and must not be possessed as the unimportant. Earthly goods are in an external sense a reality, therefore one can own them even while being as one who does not own them; but spiritual goods exist only inwardly, exist only in being possessed, and therefore one cannot, if one really possesses them, be as one who does not possess them; on the contrary, if one is such, then one simply does not possess them. If someone believes that he has faith and yet is indifferent to his possession, neither cold nor warm, then he can be sure that he does not have faith. If someone believes that he is a Christian and yet is indifferent to the fact that he is, then he truly is not a Christian. Or what would we think about a man who protested that he was in love, and also stated that it was a matter of indifference to him?

So therefore let us not forget, as little now as on some other occasion when we speak about Christianity, let us not forget its beginning, that is, that it did not originate in any human heart; let us not forget to mention it along with the origin of faith, which never, when it is present in a man, believes because others have believed, but because this man, too, has been gripped by that which has gripped countless multitudes before him, but certainly not therefore less primitively. For a tool that a handworker uses becomes blunted through years of use, a spring loses its elasticity and is weakened; but that which has the elasticity of eternity retains it through the ages absolutely unchanged. When a dynamometer has been used a long time, at last even a weak man can pass the test; but the dynamometer of eternity, on which every man must be tested as to whether he has faith or not, remains through all the ages absolutely unchanged.

When Christ said: “Beware of men,” I wonder if that warning did not also imply this: “Beware lest through men, that is, through perpetual comparison with other men, through habit and externalities, you allow yourself to be defrauded of the supreme good.” For the artfulness of a deceiver is not so dangerous, besides one more easily perceives it; but to hold the supreme good in a sort of common fellowship, in the indolence of habit, moreover in the indolence of a habit which even wishes to posit the race instead of the individual, wishes to make the race the receiver, and the individual a participant as a matter of course by virtue of his belonging to the race: this is truly the terrible thing. Certainly the highest must not be mere plunder; you must not have it for yourself in a selfish sense, for what you merely have for yourself alone is never the highest good; but even if you, in the most profound sense of the word, have the highest in common with everyone else (and this is precisely what makes it the highest, that you can have it in common with all others), you must still have it for yourself in such a way that you keep it, not only when everyone else has it, but so that you retain it even if all others renounce it. Beware in this respect also of men, “be as wise as serpents” — in order to preserve the secret of faith for yourself, although you hope and wish and labor to make everyone in this respect like yourself. “Be innocent as doves,” for faith is exactly this simplicity. You must not use your ingenuity for the purpose of making faith into something else, but you must use it ingeniously toward men to defend the secret of faith within yourself, guarding yourself against men. Is a password not a secret because everyone knows it individually, because it is confided to everyone and kept secret by everyone? However, the secret password is one thing today and another tomorrow. But the essence of faith consists in its being a secret, in being for the individual. If each individual does not preserve it as a secret, even when he professes it, he does not have faith. Could it be because there is something lacking in faith that it thus is and remains and must be preserved as a secret? Is this not also true of love, or is it just one of those fugitive emotions which manifest themselves immediately, and as quickly disappear, while the profound impression always preserves its secrecy? If that is so, then we are still right in saying that the love which does not make a man secretive is not really love.

That secretive love can be a symbol of faith; but the incorruptible inwardness of faith in the hidden man is life. He who wise as a serpent is on guard against men, so that harmless as a dove he may "preserve the secret of faith," has also, as the Scriptures say, "the savor in himself"; but if he is not on guard against men, then the salt loses its virtue, and how then can it be salt? And even if it happened that a secret love became the cause of a man's downfall, still faith is eternally and always the saving mystery! Behold that woman with the issue of blood; she did not press forward in order to happen to touch Christ's garment; she did not tell others what her intention was and what she believed: she said quite softly to herself: "If I only touch the hem of His garment, then am I healed." She kept the secret to herself, it was the secret of faith, which saved her both for time and eternity. This secret you may also have for yourself if you fearlessly profess faith; and when you lie helpless on a sickbed and cannot even move a limb, when you cannot even speak, you can still keep this secret with you.

But the primitiveness of faith is related to the beginning of Christianity. Extravagant descriptions of heathendom, its errors, its characteristics, are by no means needed; the signs of the Christlike are contained in Christianity itself. Make an experiment; forget for a moment Christian love, consider what you know about other love, recall what you read in the poets, what you yourself can discover, and then say whether it ever occurred to you to conceive this: Thou shalt love. Be honest, or, that this may not embarrass you, I shall honestly confess that many, many times in my life it has awakened all my astonishment of wonder, that it has sometimes seemed to me as if love lost everything by this comparison, although it gains everything. Be honest, confess that this is perhaps the case with many people, that when they read the poets' glowing descriptions of love or friendship, these seem to them something far higher than the humble: "Thou shall love."

"Thou shalt love." Only when it is a duty to love, only then is love everlastingly secure against every change; everlastingly emancipated in blessed independence; everlastingly happy, assured against despair.

However glad, however happy, however indescribably confident the love of impulse and inclination, the immediate love as such can be, it still feels, even in its most beautiful moment, a need to bind itself if possible even more closely. Therefore the two take an oath; they take an oath of loyalty or friendship to each other; and when we speak most solemnly, we do not say about the two, "They love one another," we say, "They swore fidelity to each other," or, "They took an oath of friendship to each other." But by what does this love swear? We do not wish to distract the attention and divert it by recalling the great distinction which the spokesmen of this love, the "poets," through their consecration know best about — for in respect to this love it is the poet who exacts a promise from the two, the poet who unites the two, the poet who dictates an oath to the two and lets them take it, in short, it is the poet who is the priest. Does this love then swear by something that is higher than itself? No, it does not. This is what exactly constitutes the beautiful, the moving, the mysterious, the poetical misunderstanding, that the two do not themselves discover it; and precisely because of this, the poet is their only, their beloved confidant, because neither does he discover it.

When this love takes an oath, it really gives, itself that significance by which it swears; it is the love itself which casts a glamor over that by which it swears, so it consequently not only does not swear by anything higher but it really swears by something lower than itself. So indescribably rich is this love in its loving misunderstanding; for just because it is itself an infinite wealth, a limitless trustworthiness, it happens that when it wishes to take an oath it swears by something lower, but it does not even discover this. That is why it again happens that this oath which certainly should be and which also honestly believes itself to be supremely serious, is still the most charming jest. And neither does the mysterious friend, the poet whose perfect confidence is this love's supreme understanding, understand it. Still it is certainly easy to understand, that if one will swear in truth then one must swear by something higher; only God in heaven is truly in a position to swear by Himself. However, the poet cannot understand this, that is, the individual who is a poet can understand it, but he cannot understand it insofar as he is poet, since "the poet" cannot understand it; for the poet can understand everything — in riddles, and can wonderfully explain everything — in riddles, but he cannot understand himself, or understand that he himself is a riddle. Should he be forced to understand that, then would he, if he did not become enraged and resentful, say sadly: "Would that no one had forced this comprehension upon me, which disturbs that which is most beautiful, which confuses my life, while I can make no use of it." And so far the poet is right, for the true understanding solves the vital question of his existence. There are in this way two riddles, the first is the love of the two, the second is the poet's explanation of it, or that the poet's explanation of it is also a riddle.

So this love takes an oath, and then the two add to the oath that they will love each other "forever." If this is not added, then the poet does not unite the two; he turns indifferently away from such a temporal love, or he turns mockingly against it, whereas he forever belongs to that eternal love. There are then really two unions, first, the two who will love each other forever, and then the poet who will forever belong to those two. And in that the poet is right, that if two men will not love each other forever, then their love is not worth talking about, and certainly not worth celebrating in verse. On the other hand, the poet does not notice the misunderstanding that the two swear by their love to love each other forever, instead of swearing their love to each other by eternity. Eternity is the higher; if one wishes to take an oath, then must one swear by the higher, but if one will swear by the eternal, then one swears by the duty of loving. Alas, but that favorite of lovers, the poet! Even more seldom than the two true lovers is he himself the lover for whom he longs, he who is a marvel of lovableness. He is like the affectionate child, he cannot endure hearing this "shalt"; as soon as it is said to him, he either becomes impatient, or he bursts into tears.

Hence, this immediate love contains the eternal in the form of a beautiful fantasy, but it is not consciously grounded on the eternal, and therefore it can be changed. Even if it does not change, it still retains the possibility of change, for it depends on good fortune. But if what is true of fortune is true about happiness, which if we think of the eternal cannot be considered without sadness, it is like saying with a shudder: "Happiness is, when it has been." That is, as long as it existed, or was existing, a change was possible; only when it is past can one say that it existed. "Call no man happy as long as he is living"; as long as he is living his fortune may change; only when he is dead, and happiness had not forsaken him while he lived, can one know that he — had been happy. What merely exists, what has suffered no change, always has the possibility of change outside itself. Change is always possible; even at the last moment it may come, and not until life is finished can one say: "The change did not come" — or perhaps it did come. That which has suffered no change certainly has continuance, but it does not have immutability. Insofar as it has continuance it exists, but insofar as it has gained immutability through change, it cannot become contemporaneous with itself, and then it is either happily unconscious of this disproportion, or it is inclined to sadness. For the eternal is the only thing which can be and become and continue contemporaneously with every age. On the other hand, temporal existence is divisive in itself, and the present cannot be contemporaneous with the future, or the future with the past, or the past with the present. As to that which by undergoing change gained immutability, one cannot merely say, when it has existed, “It existed,” but one can say, “It has existed while it existed.” Just this is what affords the security, and it is an entirely different relation from that of happiness. When love has undergone the change of eternity through having become duty, then it has gained immutability, and it follows as a matter of course that it exists. It is not a matter of course that what exists at this moment also exists the next moment, but it is a matter of course that the immutable exists.

We say that something has stood the test, and we praise it when it has met the test. But we are still talking about the imperfect, for the immutability of the immutable will not and cannot become apparent by undergoing a test — for it is immutable, and only the perishable can give itself the appearance of immutability by meeting a test. That is why it would never occur to anyone to say about sterling silver that it will stand the test of years, because it is sterling silver. So too with love. The love which merely has continuance, however happy, however blissful, however confident, however poetic it is, must still stand the testing of the years; but the love which underwent the change of eternity through becoming duty, won immutability; it is sterling.

Is this love which underwent the change of eternity therefore less practicable, less useful in life? Is sterling silver less useful? Surely not; but language involuntarily and thought consciously honors sterling silver in a characteristic way, for one merely says of this that "one uses it." There is simply nothing said about testing it; one does not insult it by wishing to test it, for one knows already that sterling silver stands the test. Therefore if one uses a less reliable product, then one is compelled to be more tactless and to speak less simply; one is compelled to speak almost ambiguously, to say two things, that "one uses it and while he uses it, he is also testing it," for it is always possible that it might change.

Consequently, only when love is a duty, only then is love eternally secure. This security of eternity drives out all anxiety and makes love perfect, perfectly secure. For in that love which only has continuance, however confident it is, there is still an anxiety, an anxiety about the possibility of change. It does not itself understand, as little as does the poet, that it is anxiety; for the anxiety is hidden, and there is only the burning desire for the expression of love, which is just the admission that anxiety lies at the bottom. How otherwise does it happen that the immediate love is so inclined to, moreover, so enamored with the idea of putting love to the test? This is just because love has not, through becoming duty, in the deepest sense undergone the "test." Hence this, which the poet would call sweet unrest, wishes more and more rashly to make the test. The lover would test the beloved, friend would test the friend; the testing no doubt is based on love, but this violently burning desire to test, this wishful craving to put love to the test, nevertheless testifies that the love itself is unconsciously insecure. Here again is a mysterious misunderstanding in the immediate love and in the explanations of the poet. The lover and the poet think that this desire to test love is simply an expression for how certain it is. But is this really true? It is absolutely true that one does not care to test what is unimportant; but from that it does not follow that wishing to test the beloved expresses confidence. The two love each other, they love each Other forever, they are so certain of this that they — put it to the test. Is this the highest certainty? Is not the relation here precisely what it is when love takes an oath and yet swears by what is lower than love? So here the highest expression of the lovers for the constancy of their love is an expression of the fact that it merely has existence, for one tests that which merely has existence, one puts it to the test.

But when it is a duty to love, there no test is needed and the insulting stupidity of wishing to test is superfluous; since love is higher than any proof, it has already more than met the test, in the same sense as faith "more than conquers." The very fact of testing always conditions a possibility; it is still always possible that that which is tested may not meet the test. Hence if someone wished to test whether he has faith, or tried to get faith, then this would really mean that he will hinder himself in acquiring faith; he will become a victim of the restless craving where faith is never won, for "thou should believe." If a believer were to implore God to put his faith to the test, then this is not an indication of the believer's having faith to an extraordinary degree (to think that is a poetic misunderstanding, as it is also a misunderstanding to have faith to an "extraordinary" degree, since the ordinary degree of faith is the highest), but it indicates that he does not quite have faith, for "thou shalt believe." There is no higher assurance, and the repose of eternity is never found anywhere but in this "shalt." However attractive it may be, "testing" is a disquieting thought, and it is anxiety which would make you imagine that the testing constitutes a higher assurance; for the idea of testing is in itself ingenious and inexhaustible, just as human wisdom has never been able to reckon all the chances, while, on the contrary, as earnestness so excellently says, "Faith has taken all chances into account." And if one must, then it is eternally decided; and if you are willing to understand that you must love, then is your love eternally secure.

And love is also through this “shalt” eternally secure against every change. For the love which merely has continuance can be changed, it can be changed in itself, and it can be changed from itself.

The immediate love can be changed in itself, it can be changed into its opposite, into hate. Hate is a love which has become its opposite, a love which has perished. At bottom love burns constantly, but the flame is that of hate; only when the love is burnt out is the flame of hate also quenched. As it is said about the tongue, that “out of the same mouth proceedeth both blessing and cursing,” so we must also say that it is the same love which loves and hates; but just because it is the same love, precisely therefore, it is not in the eternal sense the true love, which remains the same and unchanged, while that immediate love, if it is changed, at bottom is still the same. The true love which underwent the change of the eternal by becoming duty, is never changed; it is simple, it loves — and never hates, never hates — the beloved. It might seem as if the immediate love were the stronger because it can do two things, because it can both love and hate; it might seem as if it had a quite different power over its object when it says, “If you will not love me, then I will hate you”; still this is only an illusion. For is the changed really a stronger power than the unchangeable? And who is the stronger, the one who says, “If you will not love me, then I will hate you,” or the one who says, “Even if you hate me I shall continue to love you”? Moreover, it is certainly terrifying and terrible that love should be changed into hate; but I wonder for whom it is really terrible; is it not for the one to whom it happened that his love was changed to hate?

The immediate love can undergo a change; it can spontaneously become jealousy, can change from the greatest happiness into the greatest agony. So dangerous is the heat of this immediate love, however great its desire is, so dangerous, that this heat can easily become a sickness. The immediate love is like fermentation, which is so-called just because it has still undergone no change, and therefore has not yet separated out from itself the poison which at the same time furnishes the heat of the fermentation. If love sets itself on fire through this poison, instead of separating it out, then comes jealousy; and, alas! the word itself indicates a desire to become sick, a sickness of desire [Iver — desire, Sygdom — sickness; hence Iversyge, desire-sickness, or jealousy]. The jealous person does not hate the object of love, far from it, but he tortures himself with the fire of reciprocated love, which sanctifyingly ought to purify his love. The jealous lover intercepts, almost imploringly, every ray of love from the beloved, but he focuses all these rays upon his own love through the burning glass of his jealousy, and he is slowly consumed. On the other hand, the love which underwent the change of eternity through becoming duty, knows no jealousy; it loves, not only as it is loved, but it loves. Jealousy loves as it is loved; in jealous agony about whether it is loved, it is as equally jealous for its own love, whether it may not be disproportionate to the other's indifference, as it is jealous for the expression of the other's love; anxiously tortured in its self-occupation, it neither dares to believe the beloved absolutely nor to resign itself absolutely, lest it give too much, and therefore it is always burning itself, as one burns himself on that which is not hot — except to the alarmed touch. It is comparable to spontaneous combustion. It might seem as if there would be quite a different kind of fire in the immediate love, since it can become jealousy; but, alas, this fire is just the appalling thing about it. It might seem as if jealousy held its object fast in quite a different way when it watches over it with a hundred eyes, while simple love has, as it were, but a single eye for its love. But I wonder if dispersion is stronger than unity. I wonder if a heart wrenched asunder is stronger than one perfect and undivided. I wonder if a perpetually grasping anxiety holds its object closer than the united forces of simplicity! And how does that simple love assure itself against jealousy? I wonder if it is not by virtue of the fact that it does not love in a comparative way. It does not begin by immediately loving preferentially, it loves; therefore it can never love morbidly in a comparative way — it loves.

The immediate love can be changed from itself, it can be changed by the years, as is so often seen. Then love loses its ardor, its gladness, its desire, its primitiveness, the freshness of its life; like the river which sprang out of the rock when it later on spreads out in the sluggishness of stagnant water, so love is weakened by the lukewarmness and indifference of habit. Alas, perhaps of all enemies force of habit is the most crafty, and above all it is crafty enough never to let itself be seen, for one who sees the habit is saved from habit. Habit is not like other enemies which one sees and against which one strives to defend himself; the struggle is really with one's self in getting to see it. In its cunning it is like that familiar beast of prey, the vampire bat, which stealthily falls upon its sleeping victim; while it sucks his blood, its gently moving wings waft the coolness over him, and make his slumber even more refreshing. Such is habit — or it is even worse; for that animal seeks its prey among the sleeping, but it has no means of soothing the waking to sleep. Habit, on the contrary, has this power; it creeps soporifically upon a man, and when he has fallen asleep, then it sucks his blood, whilst it wafts the coolness over him and makes his sleep even more delicious.

So the immediate love can be changed from itself and become unrecognizable — for hate and jealousy are still perceptible in the love. So a man himself sometimes notices, as when a dream floats by and is forgotten, that habit has changed him; then he wishes to make good again, but he does not know where he can go to buy new oil to enkindle his love. Then he becomes despondent, irritated, bored by himself, bored by his love, bored by the wretchedness of things as they are, bored by the fact that he cannot change them; alas, for he had not paid attention in time to the change of eternity, and now he has even lost the power to endure the healing.

Oh, we sometimes see with sorrow the impoverishment of a man who once lived in affluence, and yet how much more distressing than this change it is to see love changed into something almost abhorrent! — If, on the contrary, love has undergone the change of eternity by becoming duty, then it does not know the force of habit, then habit can never get power over it. As it is said of the eternal life, that there is neither sighing nor weeping, so we might add that there is also no habit; and thereby we truly are not saying anything less excellent. If you wish to save your soul or your love from the perfidy of habit — moreover men believe that there are many ways of keeping themselves awake and safe, but truly there is but one: eternity's "shalt." Let the thunder of a hundred cannon three times a day remind you to resist the thraldom of habit; keep, as did that mighty Eastern emperor, a slave who daily reminds you, keep a hundred; have a friend who reminds you every time he sees you, have a wife who reminds you early and late in love: but watch yourself lest this too becomes a habit! For you can become accustomed to the thunder of a hundred cannon, so that you can sit at table and hear the most insignificant remark more clearly than the roar of the hundred cannon you are — in the habit of hearing. And you can become accustomed to having a hundred slaves remind you every day, so that you no longer listen, because through habit you have developed an ear wherewith you hear and yet do not hear. No, only the "thou shalt" of eternity — and the listening ear which will hear this "thou shalt," can save you from the thraldom of habit. Habit is the most distressing change, and, on the other hand, one can accustom one's self to every change; only the eternal, and consequently that which underwent the change of eternity through becoming duty, are the unchangeable, but the unchangeable can never become habit. However firmly a habit is fixed, it never becomes unchangeable, even if a man remains incorrigible; for habit is constantly that which should be changed", the unchangeable, on the contrary, is that which neither can nor should be changed. But the eternal never becomes old and never becomes habit.

Only when it is a duty to love, only then is love everlastingly free in blessed independence. But is, then, that immediate love not free; does not the lover enjoy freedom in his love? And, on the other hand, could it be the intention of the discourse to recommend the desolate independence of self-love, which became independent because it did not have the courage to bind itself, and hence became dependent on its cowardice; the desolate independence which vacillates because it found no place of refuge, and is like "the one who wanders hither and thither, an armed brigand, who puts up wherever evening finds him"; the desolate independence which independently will not endure fetters — at least not visible ones? Oh, far from it; on the contrary, we have in the preceding discourse reminded you that the expression for the greatest wealth is to have a need; and this is also the true expression of freedom, that it is a need in the free. He in whom love is a necessity certainly feels free in his love; and just the one who feels himself so dependent on his love that he would lose everything in losing the beloved, just he is independent. Yet on one condition, that he does not confuse love with the possession of the beloved. If one were to say, "Either love or die," and thereby meant that a life without love was not worth living, then we should admit that he was absolutely right. But if by this he meant possessing the beloved, and consequently meant, either possess the beloved or die, either gain this friend or die, then we must say that such a love is dependent in a false sense. When love does not make the same demands upon itself as it makes on the object of its love, while it is still dependent on that love, then it is dependent in a false sense; the law of its existence lies outside itself, and hence it is dependent in the corruptible, earthly, temporal sense. But the love which underwent the change of eternity by becoming duty, and loves because it must love, it is independent; it has the law of its existence in the relation of love itself to the eternal. This love can never become in a false sense dependent, for the only one it is dependent upon is duty, and duty is the only emancipating power. Immediate love makes a man free one moment, and in the next moment dependent. It is like a man's coming into existence; by existing, by becoming a "self," he becomes free, but in the next moment he is dependent on this self. Duty, on the other hand, makes a man dependent and at the same time eternally independent. "Only the law can give freedom." Alas, we often think that freedom exists, and that it Is the law which restricts freedom. However, it is just the other way; without law freedom simply does not exist, and it is the law which gives freedom. We think, too, that it is the law which makes distinctions, because where there is no law there are no distinctions. Still it is the other way; when it is the law which makes the distinction, then it is exactly the law which makes everyone equal before the law.

Thus this "shalt" sets love free in blessed independence; such a love stands and falls not by some accidental circumstance of its object, it stands and falls by the law of eternity — but then it never falls; such a love does not depend upon this or that, it depends only on — the one liberating force, consequently it is eternally independent. There is nothing comparable to this independence. Sometimes the world praises the proud independence which believes it feels no need of being loved, although it also thinks that it "needs other men, not to be loved by them, but in order to love, in order to have someone to love." Oh, how false is not this independence! It feels no need to be loved, and yet it needs someone to love; consequently it needs another man — in order to be able to satisfy its proud self-esteem. Is not this as when vanity believes that it can dispense with the world, and yet needs the world, that is, it needs that the world should become conscious of the fact that its vanity does not need the world! But the love which underwent the change of eternity by becoming duty, certainly feels a need of being loved, and this need together with this “shalt” is therefore an eternally harmonious concord; but it can do without this love, if so it must be, while it still continues to love: is this not independence? This independence is dependent only on love itself through the “shalt” of eternity; it is not dependent on anything else, and therefore it is not dependent on love’s object as soon as this appears to be something else. However, this does not indicate that the independent love then ceased, transformed itself into a proud self-satisfaction; that is dependence. No, love abides, it is independence. The unchangeableness is the true independence; every change, be it the swoon of weakness or the arrogance of pride, the sighing or the self-satisfied, is dependence. If one man, when another man says to him, “I can no longer love you,” proudly answers, “Then I can also stop loving you”: is this independence? Alas, it is only dependence, for the fact as to whether he will continue to love or not depends on whether the other will love. But the one who answers, “Then I will still continue to love you,” his love is everlastingly free in blessed independence. He does not say it proudly — dependent on his pride; no, he says it humbly, humbling himself under the “shalt” of eternity, and just for that reason he is independent.

Only when it is a duty to love, only then is love everlastingly secured against despair. Immediate love can become unhappy, cannot come to despair. Again, it might seem an expression for the strength of love, that it has the energy of despair, but this is only an appearance; for the energy of despair, however much it is recommended, is still impotence, its highest possibility is just its own destruction. Still, the fact that the immediate love can reach despair, shows that it is despairing, that even when it is happy, it loves with the energy of despair — loves another man “better than himself, better than God.” About despair it must be said: only he can despair who is desperate. When immediate love despairs over unhappiness, then it merely becomes evident that it was — desperate, that in its happiness it had also been desperate. Despair consists in laying hold on an individual with infinite passion; for unless one is desperate, one can lay hold only on the eternal with infinite passion. Immediate love is thus desperate; but when it becomes happy, as we say, it is hidden from it that it is desperate, when it becomes unhappy it becomes evident that it — was desperate. On the other hand, the love which underwent the change of eternity by becoming duty, can never despair, just because it is not desperate. Despair is, namely, not something which may happen to a man, an event like fortune and misfortune. Despair is a disproportion in his inmost being — so far down, so deep, that neither fate nor events can encroach upon it, but can only reveal the fact that the disproportion — was there. Therefore there is only one assurance against despair; to undergo the change of eternity by the “shalt” of duty; anyone who has not understood this change is desperate; fortune and prosperity may conceal it; misfortune and adversity, on the contrary, do not, as he thinks, make him desperate, but they reveal the fact that he — was desperate. Insofar as we speak otherwise, it is because we frivolously confuse the highest concepts. That which really makes a man despair is not misfortune, but it is the fact that he lacks the eternal; despair is to lack the eternal; despair consists in not having undergone the change of eternity by duty’s “shalt.” Consequently despair is not the loss of the beloved, that is misfortune, pain, suffering; but despair is the lack of the eternal.

How then is the love enjoined by the commandment assured against despair? Quite simply, through the commandment, through this, “Thou shalt love.” It consists first and foremost in the fact that you must not love in such a way that the loss of the beloved would reveal the fact that you were desperate, that is, that you simply must not love despairingly. Does this mean that it is forbidden to love? By no means; that would indeed be a strange speech if the commandment which says “Thou shalt love,” should by its command forbid one to love. Hence the commandment merely forbids loving in a way which is not commanded; essentially the commandment does not forbid but commands that thou shalt love. Hence the commandment of love does not assure against despair by means of weak, lukewarm grounds of comfort, that one must not take things too seriously, and all that. And truly is such a wretched wisdom, which “has ceased to sorrow,” any less despairing than the despair of the lover, is it not rather an even worse form of despair! No, the commandment of love forbids despair — by commanding one to love. Who would have the courage to say this except eternity? Who is prepared to speak this “shalt” except eternity who, at the very moment when love would despair over its unhappiness, commands it to love? Where can this commandment arise except in eternity? For when it becomes impossible to possess the beloved in the temporal existence, then eternity says, “Thou shalt love,” that is, eternity saves love from despairing just by making it eternal. Suppose it is death which separates the two — when the one left would sink in despair: where then can he find help? Temporal consolation is an even more distressing kind of despair; but then eternity helps. When it says, “Thou shalt love,” then in saying that it says, “Thy love hath an everlasting validity.” But it does not say this consolingly, for that would not help; it says it commandingly, just because there is something wrong. And when eternity says, “Thou shalt love,” then it assumes the responsibility for guaranteeing that it can be done. Oh, what is all other consolation compared with that of eternity, what is all other deep-felt sorrow against that of eternity! If one would speak more gently and say, “Take comfort,” then the sorrowing would have objections ready; but — moreover, it is not because the eternal will proudly brook no objection — out of solicitude for the sorrowful, it commands, “Thou shalt love.”

Wonderful consolation! Wonderful compassion! For, humanly speaking, it is indeed the strangest thing, almost like mockery, to say to the despairing that he ought to do that which would be his sole wish, but the impossibility of which reduces him to despair. Is there any other proof needed that the commandment of love is of divine origin? If you have tried it, or if you do try it, go to such a sorrowing one at the very moment when the loss of the beloved threatens to overwhelm him, and see then what you can find to say; confess that you wish to console him; the only thing it will not occur to you to say is, “Thou shalt love.” And, on the other hand, see if this does not, as soon as it is said, almost embitter the sorrowing, because it seems the most unsuitable thing to say on this occasion. Oh, but you who had the bitter experience, you who at the hard moment found human consolation empty and annoying — without consolation; you who with terror discovered that not even the admonition of the eternal could keep you from sinking down: you learned to love this “shalt” which saves from despair! What you perhaps have often verified in minor situations, that true edification is, strictly speaking, that which taught you in the most profound sense: that only this “shalt” forever happily saves from despair. Eternally happy — aye, for only that one is saved from despair who is eternally saved from despair. The love which underwent the change of eternity by becoming duty, is not exempt from unhappiness, but it is saved from despair, in fortune and misfortune, equally saved from despair.

Lo, passion excites, earthly wisdom cools, but neither this heat nor this coolness, nor the blending of the heat and coolness is the pure air of the eternal. There is in this heat something ardent, and in this coolness something sharp, and in the blending of the two something indefinite, or an unconscious deceitfulness, as in the hazardous season of spring. But this "Thou shalt love" takes away all the unsoundness and preserves the soundness for eternity. Thus it is everywhere; this "shalt" of eternity is the saving, the purifying, the ennobling. Sit with one who is in deep sorrow; you may soothe for a moment if you have the ability to give expression to the passion of despair as not even the sorrowing is able to do; but it is still false comfort. It may for a moment tempt refreshingly, if you have the wisdom and the experience to afford a temporary outlook where the sorrowing sees none; but it is still false comfort. On the other hand, this "Thou shalt sorrow" is both true and beautiful. I have no right to harden my heart against the pain of life, for I must sorrow; but neither have I the right to despair, for I must sorrow; and yet neither have I the right to cease to sorrow, for I must sorrow. So also with love. You have no right to harden yourself against this emotion, for thou shalt love; but neither have you the right to love despairingly for thou shalt love; and just as little have you the right to corrupt this feeling in you, for thou shalt love. -You must preserve the love and you must preserve yourself, and in preserving yourself preserve your love. There where the purely human would rush forth, the commandment retards; there where the purely human would lose courage, the commandment strengthens; there where the purely human would become weary and prudent, the commandment enkindles and gives wisdom. The commandment consumes and burns up the unsoundness in your love, but through the commandment you will again be able to enkindle it, when humanly speaking it would cease. There where you think yourself easily able to advise, there you must take the commandment for counsel; there where you despairingly would direct yourself, there you must take the commandment for your counselor; but there where you do not know how to advise, there will the commandment give counsel, so that all is well.

B. THOU SHALT LOVE THY NEIGHBOR

IT IS the Christian love which discovers and knows that the neighbor exists, and, what amounts to the same thing, that everyone is a neighbor. If it were not a duty to love, then the concept of neighbor would not exist; but only when one loves one’s neighbor, only then is the selfish partiality eradicated, and the equality of the eternal preserved.

The objection is frequently raised against Christianity, although in various ways and moods and with varying passions and purposes, that it supplants earthly love and friendship. Then again, some have wished to defend Christianity, and for this purpose have appealed to its teaching that one must love God with all his heart and his neighbor as himself. If the dispute is carried on in this way, it becomes fairly indifferent whether one disputes or agrees, inasmuch as a battle in the air and an agreement in the air are equally insignificant. Rather one must see how to make the issue really clear, in order to admit in its defense with all calmness, that Christianity has pushed earthly love and friendship from the throne, the impulsive and the preferential love, the partiality, in order to set spiritual love in its place, the love to one’s neighbor, a love which in earnestness and truth and inwardness is more tender than any earthly love — in the union, and more faithfully sincere than the most celebrated friendship — in concord. Rather one must see, to make it really clear, that the praise of earthly love and friendship belongs to paganism, that “the poet” really belongs to paganism, since his task belongs there — in order then by the steadfast spirit of conviction to give Christianity what belongs to Christianity, love for the neighbor, of which love paganism had no conception. Rather one must see how rightly to make the division, in order, if possible, to give the individual occasion to choose, rather than to confuse and jumble, thereby hindering the individual from getting a definite impression of which is which. And, above all, one must have done with defending Christianity rather than consciously or unconsciously wishing to maintain everything — including the non-Christian.

Everyone who considers this matter with earnestness and insight will readily see that the point at issue must be posited thus: shall earthly love and friendship be love's highest expression, or shall this love be set aside? Earthly love and friendship are related to passion; but all passion, whether it attacks or defends itself, fights only in one way: either-or: "Either I exist and am the highest, or I do not exist at all, either all or nothing." The bungler and the confused (whom paganism and the poet are just as much against as is Christianity) advance the defense, that Christianity doubtless teaches a higher love, but that it also recommends earthly love and friendship. To speak in this way betrays the double-mindedness: that the speaker has neither the soul of a poet nor the spirit of Christianity. Concerning the spiritual relation one cannot — if he wishes to avoid speaking foolishly — talk like a shopkeeper who has a best quality of goods, but also an intermediate quality which he also ventures to recommend as very good, as almost equally good. No, if it is certain that Christianity teaches that love to God and the neighbor is the true love, then it is also certain that He who has put down "all high things which exalted themselves against the knowledge of God, and has taken every thought captive in obedience," has also thrust down earthly love and friendship. Would it not be strange if Christianity were as bungling and confused a teaching as many a defense wishes to make it, very frequently worse than any attack? Would it not be strange that there is nowhere found in the New Testament a single word about love in the sense in which the poet sings it and paganism idolized it? Would it not be strange that nowhere in the New Testament is there found a single word about friendship used in the sense in which the poet celebrates it and paganism exalted it? Or let the poet who recognizes himself as being a poet, go through what the New Testament teaches about earthly love, and he will be brought to the point of despair because he will not find one single word which might inspire him — and if any so-called poet still found a word which he might use, then is this a mendacious use, a dishonest use, because instead of reverencing Christianity, he steals a precious word and perverts its use. Let the poet search through the New Testament to find a word concerning friendship which may please him, and he will search in vain to the point of despair. But let a Christian, who wishes to love his neighbor, seek, truly he will not search in vain, he will find each word stronger and more authoritative than the other, useful to him in enkindling this love and preserving him in this love.

The poet will seek in vain. But is the poet then not a Christian? We have certainly not said that, nor do we say it; we only say that insofar as he is poet, he is not Christian. Still there must be a distinction made, for there are also godly poets. But these do not sing of earthly love and friendship; their songs are to the glory of God, about faith and hope and love. Those poets do not sing of love in the same sense as the poet sings of earthly love, for the love to one's neighbor is not sung, it is acted. Even if there were nothing else which prevented the poet from celebrating the love for one's neighbor in poetry, this is still sufficient to hinder him, that by the side of every word in the Sacred Book there stands before him in invisible writing a disturbing note, for it says; "Go thou and do likewise" — does this sound like a poetic appeal, inviting him to sing?

Hence with the religious poet it is an individual matter, but of the worldly poet it holds good that insofar as he is poet, he is not Christian. And yet it is the worldly poets of whom we think when we speak of the poet in general. That the poet lives in Christendom makes no difference. Whether he is a Christian is not incumbent on us to decide, but insofar as he is poet he is not Christian. It might certainly seem that since Christianity has now existed so long, it must by now have penetrated every relationship — and all of us. But this is an illusion. And because Christianity has existed so long, that is certainly not saying that we have lived as long, or have so long been Christian. The poet's existence in Christendom and the position which is conceded him (for rudeness and envious assaults upon him are certainly not Christian objections or arguments against his existence) are an earnest reminder about how much was received earlier, and about how easily we are tempted to imagine ourselves to be far in advance of ourselves. Alas! for while the Christian preaching is sometimes scarcely listened to, all listen to the poet, admire him, learn from him, are charmed by him. Alas! while one swiftly forgets what the preacher has said, how accurately and for how long a time does not one remember what the poet has said, especially when he has enlisted the aid of an actor! These remarks in no way suggest that the poet should be done away with, perhaps by force; for thereby we should only gain a new illusion. What would it avail to have no poets, if there were still so many in Christendom who were satisfied with the understanding of existence which the poet commands; so many who long for the poet! Nor is it asked of the Christian that in blind and doubtful zeal he should carry it to the point that he could no longer bear to read a poet — any more than it is required of the Christian that he should not eat the food customary for others, or that he should live apart from other men in a separate enclosure. No, but the Christian must understand everything in a different way from the non-Christian; he must understand himself in knowing how to make distinctions. A poet would no more be able to live exclusively according to the highest Christian concepts all the time than he would be able to live by eating only at the Lord's table. Therefore, let the poet exist, let the individual poet be admired as he deserves, if he really is a poet, but also let the individual in Christendom prove his Christian conviction by means of this test: how he regards the poet, what he thinks about him, how he reads him, how he admires him. However, there is rarely anything said about such matters in these times.

To many, unfortunately, these reflections will perhaps seem neither sufficiently Christian nor sufficiently earnest, just because they deal with those things which, it is well to note, occupy men so much six days of the week, and even on the seventh day absorb more hours than do godly matters. However, we trust — both because we have been instructed and trained in Christianity from childhood, and also because in our mature years we dedicated our days and our best efforts to this service, although, as we have repeatedly said, our speech is "without authority" — we trust that we know what should be said in these times and how to say it. We have all been baptized and instructed in Christianity, consequently there is nothing to say about disseminating it. Far be it from us, on the other hand, to judge that anyone who says he is a Christian, is not; hence there is nothing to say about the professing Christian in contradistinction to the non-Christian. On the contrary, it is very profitable and necessary that the individual should carefully and conscientiously give heed to himself, and if possible help others (insofar as one man can help another, for God is the true helper) to a more and more profound understanding of what it means to become a Christian. The word "Christendom" as a general appellation for an entire people is a superscription which may easily say too much, and therefore may easily cause the individual to believe too much about himself. It is customary, at least in other places, to place signposts on the highway to indicate where the road leads. Perhaps at the very moment a man sets out on a journey he sees a signpost that says that this road leads to that distant place which is his own destination: has he therefore reached that place? So is it, too, with this guidepost, Christianity. It indicates the direction, but has one therefore reached the goal, or is one always merely — on the way? Or is it really progressing on the road if, for a single hour once a week, a man walks along this way, while the other six days he lives in absolutely different conceptions, and meanwhile makes no effort himself to understand how this can be consistent?

And is this really earnestness: to keep silent about the true state of the case and the conditions, in order to speak with extreme earnestness about the more earnest matters, which nevertheless might well be omitted in the confusion, whose relation to this earnestness one — from sheer earnestness — does not explain? Who then has the more difficult task, the teacher who lectures on earnestness as something at a meteoric distance from daily affairs, or the disciple who wishes to make an application of this explanation? Is only that a deception: the keeping silent about what is earnest? Is it not an equally dangerous deception to mention it — but under circumstances, and to present it — but in a light totally different from the daily life of actuality? If it is true that the entire worldly life, its splendors, its diversions, its enchantments, can captivate and ensnare a man in so many ways, which then is earnestness: either, out of — sheer earnestness to keep silent in church about worldly matters, or to speak seriously about them in order, if possible, to strengthen men against worldly dangers? Would it really be impossible to speak about worldly matters in a solemn and truly serious manner? And if it were impossible, does it therefore follow that the godly address should keep silent about them? Ah, no, it would only follow that it should be prohibited in the godly address on the more solemn occasions.

Consequently we shall test the Christian conviction of the poet. What does the poet teach about earthly love and friendship? Here it is not a question about this or that particular poet, but only about the poet, that is, only about him insofar as he, as poet, is true to himself and his task. Thus, if a so-called poet has lost faith in the poetic validity of love and friendship, and in its conceptions, and has posited something else in its place, then he is not a poet, and, perhaps that other thing that he posits instead, is also not Christian, but sheer bungling. Earthly love is based on an impulse which, explained as affection, has its highest, its unqualified, its poetically unqualified, exclusive expression in the fact that there is but one single object of love in the whole world, and that only the first time of falling in love is love, is everything, the second falling in love nothing. It is customary to say, speaking proverbially, that once is nothing; here, on the contrary, once is unconditionally everything, a second time the unconditional destruction of everything.

This is poetry, and the emphasis lies unconditionally upon the highest expression of passion; to be or not to be. To love a second time too is not loving, but is abhorrent to poetry. If a so-called poet would have us imagine that earthly love can repeat itself in the same man, if a so-called poet wishes to occupy himself with clever foolishness which presumably would exhaust the mysteriousness of passion in the "why" of cleverness, then he is not a poet. Nor is that which he posits in place of poetic love, Christian love. Christian love teaches love to all men, unconditionally all. Just as unconditionally and strongly as earthly love tends toward the idea of there being but one single object of love, equally unconditionally and strongly Christian love tends in the opposite direction. If a man with respect to Christian love wishes to make an exception in the case of one man whom he does not wish to love, then such love is not "also Christian love," but it is unconditionally not Christian love.

And yet there is much the same confusion in our so-called Christendom: the poets have given up passionate love, they yield, they relax the tension of passion, they knock off (by adding to) and believe that a man, in the sense of falling in love, can love many times, so that there are consequently several objects of love; the [so-called] Christian love also yields, relaxes the tension of eternity, lessens its demands and thinks that when one loves a great deal, then it is Christian love. So both the poetic and the Christian love become confused; and that which takes their place is neither poetic nor Christian. Passion always has this unconditional characteristic, that it excludes the third party, that is, the third party makes for confusion. To love without passion is an impossibility; but the distinction between earthly and Christian love lies therefore in the one possible eternal difference of passion. Any other difference between earthly and Christian love cannot well be imagined. If a man, therefore, were to think that he could at one and the same time understand his life by the aid of the poet and by the help of Christian explanations, were to believe that he could understand these two explanations jointly — and in such a way that they gave meaning to his life — then he is in error. The poetic and the Christian explanations are exact opposites; the poet idolizes earthly affection, and therefore he is absolutely right in saying, since he constantly thinks only of earthly love, that to command one to love is the greatest of follies and the most absurd saying; as Christianity is always thinking only of the Christian love, it is also absolutely right when it pushes earthly love from the throne and sets this "shalt" in its place.

The poet and Christianity present exactly opposing explanations, or more exactly expressed, the poet really explains nothing, for he explains earthly love and friendship — in riddles; he explains earthly love and friendship as riddles, but Christianity explains love eternally. From this again we see that it is an impossibility to live at one time according to both explanations, for the greatest possible contradiction between two explanations is certainly that the one is no explanation, and the other is an explanation. Earthly love and friendship, therefore, as the poet understands them, involve no moral problem. Love and friendship are a matter of chance; it is fortunate, poetically understood (and certainly the poet has an excellent understanding of good fortune), the highest good fortune, to fall in love, to find the one and only beloved; it is good fortune, almost equally as great a good fortune, to find the one and only friend. At most, the moral task lies only in being duly thankful for one's good fortune. On the other hand, the task is never that one must find the beloved, or find this friend; this cannot be done, as the poet very well understands. The problem consequently depends on whether fortune will furnish one with a task; but this is precisely the same as saying that morally understood there is no task.

If, on the other hand, one must love his neighbor, then the task is the moral task, which is again the source of all tasks. Just because Christian morality is the true morality, it knows how to cut short extensive reflections, to cut off the voluminous preambles, to do away with temporary delays, and to prevent wasting time. The Christian is immediately close to his task because he has it in himself. There is a great dispute in the world as to what is to be called the highest. But whatever is called so, whatever the demarcation is: it is incredible that there should be so many complications connected with apprehending it.

On the other hand, Christianity at once teaches a man the shortest way to find the supreme good: "Shut thy door and pray to God" — for God is certainly the highest. And if a man will go out into the world, then he may perhaps go far — and go in vain, travel around the world — and in vain, in order to find the beloved or the friend. But Christianity never suffers a man to take even a single step in vain; for the door you closed in order to pray to God, when you open it again and go out, then the first man you meet is your neighbor whom you must love. Wonderful!

Perhaps a maiden tries curiously and superstitiously to learn her future fate, to see her future lover; and a fraudulent wisdom makes her imagine that when she has done something so and so, then she will know him because he will be the first one she will meet on such and such a day. I wonder if it would also be so difficult to get to see one's neighbor — if one did not prevent himself from seeing him; for Christianity has made it eternally, impossible to be mistaken about him; there is not in the whole world any single man who is so certainly and so easily recognizable as the neighbor. You can never confuse him with any other man, for all men are the neighbor. If you confuse another man with your neighbor, then in the last analysis, there is no mistake, for the other man is also your neighbor. It is your fault if you will not understand who your neighbor is. If under cover of darkness you save a man's life, believing that you are saving your friend's life — but instead it turned out to be your neighbor, then this is not a fault; alas, on the other hand, it becomes precisely a fault if you were only willing to save your friend. If your friend complains over the fact that you, as he believes, through an error did for your neighbor what he thought you would do only for him, then rest assured it is your friend who is wrong.

The point at issue between the poet and Christianity can be quite accurately defined in this way: Earthly love and friendship are partiality and the passion of partiality, Christian love is self-denying love, therefore it vouches for this "shalt." To exhaust these passions is bewildering. But the extreme passionate limits of partiality lie in exclusiveness, in loving only one; the extreme limits of self-denial lie in self-sacrifice, in not excluding a single one.

In other times when a man had made an earnest effort to understand Christianity, he believed that Christianity had something against earthly love because it is based on impulse; he believed that Christianity which, as spirit, has set dissension between flesh and spirit, hated earthly love as being sensual. But this was a misunderstanding, an overstraining of the spiritual. In addition, it can easily be shown that Christianity is very far from irrationally wishing to excite the sensual in a man by teaching him eccentricity; does not Paul say that it is better to marry than to burn! No, just because Christianity is in truth spirit, therefore it understands by the sensual something different from what one naturally calls the sensual; and just as little as it has wished to forbid men to eat and drink, just so little has it taken offense at a natural impulse, which a man certainly did not give himself. By the sensual Christianity means the carnal, the selfish; there can be no imaginable dispute between spirit and flesh unless there is a rebellious spirit on the part of the flesh, with which the spirit then strives; thus there can be no imaginable conflict between the spirit and a stone, or between the spirit and a tree. Consequently the sensual is selfishness. And it is just because of this that Christianity harbors a suspicion about earthly love and friendship, because partiality in passion, or passionate partiality, is really another form of selfishness.

Lo, this too is something paganism never dreamed of. Because paganism has never had any idea of self-denying love for the neighbor whom one "must" love, therefore it classified it thus: selfishness is abominable because it is selfishness; but love and friendship, which are passionate partiality, are love. But Christianity, which has made manifest what love is, classifies it in a different way: selfishness and passionate partiality are essentially one; but love to the neighbor is love. "To love the beloved," says Christianity, "is that to love?" And it adds, "Do not even the heathen the same?" "To love one's friend, is that to love?" says Christianity. "Do not even the heathen the same?" If therefore someone were to believe that the distinction between heathendom and Christianity lies in the fact that the beloved and the friend in Christianity are loved with a wholly different loyalty and tenderness than in heathendom, then this is a misunderstanding. Does not paganism also show examples of love and friendship so perfect that the apprentice poet goes back to them? But no one in heathendom loved his neighbor. No one suspected that he existed. What heathendom, then, called love, as distinguished from selfishness, was partiality. But a passionate partiality is essentially another form of selfishness; so here again one sees the truth of the saying of the venerable Fathers: “that the virtues of heathendom are shining vices.”

That passionate partiality is another form of selfishness will now be demonstrated, together with its converse, that self-denying love loves the neighbor as one should love. As selfishly as self-love closes about this only “self,” whereby it becomes selfishness, equally selfishly the passionate partiality of love closes about this only beloved, and the passionate partiality of friendship about this one friend. The beloved and the friend are therefore called, remarkably and profoundly enough, the other self, the other I — for the neighbor is the other you, or, to be quite accurate, the third person in the equilateral. The other self, the other I. But wherein lies the selfishness? It lies in the I, in the self. Would not then selfishness also stick at loving the other I, the other self? Truly one does not need to be any great judge of character in order, by the help of this clue, to make discoveries serious for others and humiliating to one’s self, about earthly love and friendship. The fire which exists in selfishness is spontaneous, the I ignites itself by itself; but in earthly love and friendship, poetically understood, there is also spontaneous ignition. True enough, as we say, it is only at times, and then morbidly, that jealousy shows itself; but from that it by no means follows that it is not at bottom always present in earthly love and friendship. Test it: introduce between the lover and the beloved the neighbor as the intermediate person one must love: interpose the neighbor between friend and friend as the intermediate person that one must love: and you will instantly see the jealousy. But nevertheless the concept of neighbor is precisely the middle term of self-abnegation, which enters between the I and I of selfishness, but also between the I and the other I of earthly love and friendship. That it is selfishness when a faithless lover wishes to get rid of the beloved, wishes to leave a friend in the lurch, paganism also realized, and the poet sees it. But only Christianity sees that the devotion with which the lover gives himself up to this one, with which, moreover, he clings to him, is selfishness. But can devotion and limitless submission still be selfishness? Surely yes, when the devotion is to the other I, the other self.

Let a poet describe how earthly love must exist in a man so that he can call it love; he will mention much which we do not stop for here, but then he will add: “and then there must be admiration, the lover must admire the beloved.” The neighbor, on the contrary, is never mentioned as an object of admiration; Christianity has never taught that one should admire the neighbor — but one must love him. Hence there must be admiration in earthly love, and the stronger, the more intense the admiration is, the better, says the poet. Now to admire another man is certainly not selfishness. But to be loved by the only one admired, would not this relationship selfishly come back to the I who loves — his other I? And so too with friendship. To admire another man is certainly not selfishness, but to be the only friend of this only admired friend — would not this relationship in a serious way revert to the I from which it started? Is this not plainly the danger of selfishness, that when one has but a single object of admiration, that then the one admired reciprocally makes the admirer the sole object of his love or of his friendship?

To love the neighbor, on the contrary, is self-denying love and drives out all partiality, just as it drives out all selfishness — otherwise the self-abnegation would also make distinctions and feel partiality for partiality. Even if passionate partiality had no other selfishness in it, it still has this, that there is, consciously or unconsciously, wilfulness in it, unconsciously insofar as it is subject to natural laws, consciously insofar as it unrestrainedly abandons itself to and assents to the power of this law. However secret, however unconscious the self-will is in its passionate devotion to its “sole object,” this arbitrariness is everywhere manifest. That sole object was not found through obedience to that royal law, “Thou shalt love," but through choosing, moreover by unconditionally choosing, that one single individual — for Christian love, too, has but one single object, the neighbor, but the concept of neighbor is as far as possible removed from being one single man, infinitely far from that, for the neighbor is all men. When the lover or the friend, as the poet delights to hear, can love only this one man in the whole world, then there is in this prodigious devotion a prodigious wilfulness, and in this impetuous, boundless devotion, which is really devotion to himself, the lover is really selfish. Self-abnegation wishes to root out this selfishness, this wilfulness, through the "thou shalt" of eternity. And the self-abnegation which in judgment enters in to test the selfishness is two-edged, so that it cuts equally both ways. We know very well that there is a selfishness which one may call faithless selfishness, but we know too equally well that there is a selfishness which may be called devoted selfishness. The task of self-abnegation is therefore twofold: to distinguish between these two forms. As regards the faithless selfishness which wishes to evade, the task is: sacrifice yourself; with respect to the devoted selfishness, the task is: renounce this sacrifice. And that which pleases the poet immeasurably, that the lover should say: "I cannot love anyone else, I cannot get along without love, I cannot give up this love, it would be my death, I should die of love," does not please the self-abnegation at all; it simply cannot bear to have such devotion honoured by the name of love, since it is selfishness. Self-abnegation first passes its judgment, and then sets the task: love thy neighbor, him thou shalt love.

Everywhere where Christianity exists there is also self-abnegation, which is Christianity s essential form. In order to live as a Christian, one must first and foremost become sober; but self-abnegation is exactly the transition through which a man, in the meaning of the eternal, becomes sober. On the other hand, wherever Christianity does not exist, the intoxication of self-esteem reaches its maximum, and this intoxicated exaltation is what is admired. But earthly love and friendship are the highest expression of self-esteem; they are the I intoxicated in the other I. The more closely the two I's cling together to form one I, the more this united self selfishly excludes all others. At the supreme apex of earthly love and friendship the two actually become one self, one I. This is explicable only because partiality contains a natural force (impulse — inclination) and a selfishness which can selfishly unite the two in a new selfish self.

Spiritual love, on the contrary, takes away from myself all natural impulses and all selfishness, and therefore love for my neighbor cannot make me into one with my neighbor in a united self. Love for the neighbor is love between two beings, each eternally determined as spirit. Love to the neighbor is spiritual love, but two spirits can never become one self in a selfish sense. In earthly love and friendship the two love each other by virtue of their dissimilarities, or by virtue of their similarities which underlie the differences (as when two friends love each other because of a similarity in morals, character, occupations, training and so on, consequently because of the similarity by which they differ from other men, or by which they resemble each other in being different from other men), therefore the two can in a selfish sense become one self; neither of them is yet himself the spiritual determination of "self," neither of them has as yet learned to love himself in the Christian sense of the word. In earthly love the ego is sensually-psychically-spiritually determined, the beloved a sensual-psychical-spiritual determination; in friendship the ego is psycho-spiritually defined, the friend a psycho-spiritual determination. Only in love to one's neighbor is the self which loves, purely spiritually defined as spirit, and the neighbor a purely spiritual qualification. Therefore what we said at the beginning of this discourse by no means applies to earthly love and friendship, that only one man is needed who is recognized as neighbor, in order to cure a man of selfishness, if in this one man he loves his neighbor.

For in the beloved and the friend the neighbor is not loved, but the other I, or the first I, once more, even better. It is frequently as if a man, although selfishness is predominant, does not have the strength to be selfish alone, so that his selfishness does not really appear until his other ego is found, and the two egos in this union find strength for the selfish self-esteem.

If anyone thinks that a man by falling in love or by having found a friend, has learned to know the Christian love, then he is seriously mistaken. No, if anyone is in love and in such a way that the poet would say about him that "he really is in love," then the commandment of love may be changed a little when it is said to him, and yet say the same thing. The commandment of love may say to him: "Love your neighbor as you love your sweetheart." And yet, since he does not love his sweetheart "as himself," what does the commandment which speaks about the neighbor command? Certainly he loves, but the beloved he loves "as himself" is not the neighbor, the beloved is the other I. Whether we are speaking about the first I or about the other I, we do not thereby come a step nearer to the neighbor; for the neighbor is the first you. In its strictest sense selfishness at bottom loves the other I, for the other I is himself. And yet this is certainly selfishness. But in the same sense it is selfishness to love the other I, who is the beloved or the friend. And as selfishness in the strictest sense has been described as self-worship, so earthly love and friendship (as the poet understands them, and on his understanding this love stands or falls) are idolatry. For ultimately love to God is the decisive thing; from it stems love to the neighbor, but paganism never suspected this. They left God out; they made earthly love and friendship into love, and abominated selfishness. But the Christian commandment of love commands men to love God above all else, and next to love the neighbor. In earthly love and friendship partiality is the middle term. In love to the neighbor, God is the middle term; if you love God above all else, then you also love your neighbor and in your neighbor every man. Only by loving God above all else can one love his neighbor in the other man. The other man, this is the neighbor who is the other man in the sense that the other man is every other man. Consequently, thus understood, the discourse was right when in the beginning it said that if a man loves his neighbor in one single other man, then he loves all men.

Love to the neighbor is therefore the eternal equality in loving, but the eternal equality is the opposite of partiality. This needs no extensive discussion. Equality precisely consists in not making distinctions, and eternal equality is unconditionally not to make the least distinction, unqualifiedly not to make the least distinction; partiality, on the other hand, consists in making a distinction, a passionate distinction, in making an unlimited distinction.

But has not Christianity then, when by its "Thou shalt love" it pushed earthly love and friendship from the throne, set something far higher in their place? Something far higher — however, let us speak with caution, the caution of orthodoxy. People have confused Christianity in many ways, but among others also, in that by calling it the highest, the most profound, they made it appear that the purely human is related to the Christian as the high or the higher is to the most high and to the supreme. Alas, but this is a deceptive way of speaking which falsely and indecently allows Christianity officiously to wish to ingratiate itself with human inquisitiveness or curiosity. Is there really anything of which humanity as such, anything of which the natural man is more desirous than of the highest! If but a newsmonger trumpets that his most recent news is of the highest importance, then he succeeds famously in attracting those worldly followers who from time immemorial have had an indescribable predilection for and have felt a deep need of — being deceived. No, the Christian is certainly the highest and the supreme category, but it is well to note too that to the natural man it is an offense. He who in qualifying the Christian as the highest category, omits the intermediate qualification of offense, sins against it; he perpetrates an audacity more abominable even than if a modest wife were to array herself like a ballet dancer; even more terrible than if that austere judge, John the Baptist, were to dress like a dandy. The Christian category is in itself too heavy, too serious in its movements to whisk about like a dancer in the triviality of such easygoing speeches about the higher, the highest, the all-highest. The Christian Way is the way of offense. This is not to say that the approach to the Christian Way should be by giving offense: this would certainly hinder oneself in another way from apprehending Christianity; but offense guards the approach to the Christian way. Blessed is he who is not offended by it.

Now also as to this command about loving the neighbor. Only admit, or if it is embarrassing to you to speak in this way, then I shall admit, that many times it has offended me, and that I am still very far from imagining that I have fulfilled this commandment, which to flesh and blood is an offense, and to wisdom foolishness. If you, my hearer, are perhaps what we call an educated man, well, I too am educated. But if I think by the help of "education"' to come nearer this highest, then I am greatly in error. And the error lies just here; for we all wish for education, and education constantly has "the highest" on its lips; moreover, no bird that has learned one single word repeats this word more incessantly, and no crow repeats its own name more uninterruptedly, than the educated constantly harp on "the highest." But the Christian "highest" is by no means the "highest" of the educated, and the Christian "highest" disciplines precisely through the repulsion of offense. You will readily see this; for truly, has your education, or do you believe that any man's enthusiasm for an education, has taught him to love his neighbor? Alas, has not education and the zeal for acquiring it rather developed a new kind of difference, the difference between the educated and the uneducated? Only listen to what is said among the educated about earthly love and friendship, what equality in education a friend must have, how a girl must be educated and just in what way. Read the poets who scarcely know how to preserve their independence as over against the powerful dominance of the educated classes; scarcely dare to believe in the power of love to break the chain of distinctions — does it seem to you that this speech, this poem, or that a life which is consistent with this speech and this poem, bring a man any nearer to loving his neighbor? Lo, here again the signs of the offense stand out.

For consider the most cultured man you know, about whom we all admiringly say, "He is so cultured," and then consider Christianity which says to him, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor!" Moreover, a certain urbanity in all relations, a courtesy toward all men, a friendly condescension toward inferiors, a confident bearing toward the influential, an admirably controlled freedom of spirit; truly that is culture — do you believe that it is also loving your neighbor?

The neighbor is your equal. The neighbor is not your beloved for whom you have a passionate partiality, not your friend for whom you have a passionate partiality. Nor, if you are an educated man, is your neighbor the one who is educated, with whom you are equal in education — for with your neighbor you have human equality before God. Nor is the neighbor the one who is more distinguished than yourself, that is, he is not your neighbor just because he is more distinguished than yourself, for loving him because he is more distinguished can then easily become partiality, and insofar selfishness. Nor is your neighbor one who is inferior to you, that is, insofar as he is humbler than yourself he is not your neighbor, for to love one because he is inferior to yourself can readily become the condescension of partiality, and insofar selfishness. No, loving your neighbor is a matter of equality. It is encouraging in your relation to a distinguished man, that in him you must love your neighbor; it is humbling in relation to the inferior, that you do not have to love the inferior in him, but must love your neighbor; it is a saving grace if you do it, for you must do it. The neighbor is every man; for he is not your neighbor through the difference, or through the equality with you as in your difference from other men. He is your neighbor through equality with you before God, but every man unconditionally has this equality, and has it unconditionally.

C. THOU SHALT LOVE THY NEIGHBOR

SO then go out and practice it; forget the diversities and their like, so that you can love your neighbor. Do away with the distinctions of partiality, so that you can love your neighbor. This will not lead you to cease to love the beloved, oh, far from it! For in that case, the word "neighbor" would be the greatest deception ever invented, if, in order to love your neighbor, you must start by giving up your love for those for whom you feel affection. What is more, it would also be a contradiction, for since the concept "neighbor" embraces all men, certainly no one can be excluded — shall we say, least of all the beloved? No, for that is the language of partiality. Consequently if it is only partiality which must be taken away — and this does not also in turn apply to the neighbor, then you would love your neighbor with an extravagant partiality in contrast to the beloved.

No, as one says to the solitary, "Take care that you do not become ensnared in selfishness," so we may say to the two lovers: "Take care that your love does not ensnare you in selfishness." For the more decisively and exclusively partiality encloses one single man, the further he is from loving his neighbor. You, husband, do not subject your wife to the temptation arising from her love for you, of forgetting to love her neighbor; you, wife, do not subject your husband to this temptation! The lovers certainly believe that in their earthly love they have the highest possible. Oh, but it is not so, for in it they have not yet secured the eternal through the eternal.

It is true the poet promises the lovers immortality, if they are truly lovers; but who is the poet who gives them this promise? One who cannot even vouch for himself. The "royal law," on the contrary, the commandment of love, promises life, eternal life, and this commandment simply says, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor." And as this commandment wishes to teach every man how he ought to love himself, so it also wishes to teach love and friendship the right kind of love; preserve in loving yourself your love for your neighbor; preserve in your earthly love and friendship your love for your neighbor. This idea will perhaps repel you — then you will know that the signs of offense are always present to the Christian. But, nevertheless, believe this; believe that the Teacher who would not quench any smoking flax, will not extinguish any noble fire within a man; believe that He who was love, simply wishes to teach every man to love; believe that if all the poets united in one song in praise of earthly love and friendship, all they had to say would be as nothing in comparison with the commandment, "Thou shalt love, thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself!" Do not cease to believe because the commandment almost offends you, because the discourse does not sound as flattering as that of the poets who by their songs insinuate themselves into your happiness, but sounds repulsive and terrifying, as if it would snatch you out of your beloved retreat of partiality — do not therefore cease to believe it; consider that just because the commandment is thus and the discourse thus, just because of this, its object can be the object of faith! Do not indulge yourself in the conceit that you might be able to bargain, that by loving some men, friends and relatives, you would be loving your neighbor — for this would be giving up the poetic without apprehending the Christian, and it was for the sake of preventing this bargaining that the discourse attempted to place you between the pride of the poet, who disdains all bargaining, and the divine majesty of the royal law, which makes all bargaining an offense. No, love your beloved faithfully and tenderly, but let the love for your neighbor be the more sacred in the covenant of your union with God! Love your friend sincerely and devotedly, but let your love for your neighbor be what you learn from each other in the confidence of friendship with God! Behold, death levels all differences, but partiality always retains the difference, yet the way to life and to the eternal is through death, and through the levelling of differences: therefore only the love to the neighbor truly leads to life.

As the joyous message of Christianity is contained in the teaching about mankind's kinship with God, so is its problem man's likeness to God. But God is love, therefore we can resemble God only in loving, as we also, according to the Apostle's word, can only be "God's fellow-laborers in — love." Just because you love your beloved, you do not resemble God, for with God there is no partiality, as you many times in your humility, but also many times in your self-satisfaction, have considered. Insofar as you love your friend you do not resemble God, for before God there is no difference. But when you love your neighbor, then you resemble God.

So, then, go out and act accordingly; forget the differences so that you can love your neighbor. Alas, perhaps it is not even necessary to say this to you, perhaps you found no one in the world to love, no friend on the way, so that your way lay in solitude. Or perhaps God took from your side and gave you a beloved, but death took and took her from your side; he took again and took your friend, but gave you no one in his place, so that now you walk alone, so that you have no beloved one to protect your weak side and no friend at your right hand. Or perhaps life separated you even if you continued unchanged — in the loneliness of separation. Perhaps change separated you, so that you walk alone in sorrow because you found, but also found what you found changed! How disconsolate! Moreover, only ask the poet how distressing it is to live in loneliness, to have lived in loneliness, without being loved and without having any one to love. Just ask the poet whether he knows other than that it is comfortless when death steps in between the lovers, or when life separates friend from friend, or when a change of feeling separates them as enemies from one another. For certainly the poet loves solitude, he loves it — in order in solitude to discover the missing happiness of love and friendship, just as one who would gaze at the stars in wonder, seeks a dark place.

And yet if it were not his own fault that a man found no one to love; and if through no fault of his own he sought in vain to find a friend; and if the loss, the separation, the change in feeling, were not his own fault: under these circumstances what more does the poet know than that this is very distressing? But then the poet too is subject to change if he, the proclaimer of happiness, knows nothing else than the shriek of desolation in the day of need. Or are you not willing to call it change, do you wish to call it loyalty in the poet that he — disconsolately sorrows with the desolate sorrowing? Oh, well, we shall not quarrel about that. But if you wish to compare this human fidelity with that of heaven and eternity, then you will certainly admit that there is a difference. For heaven not only rejoices more than any poet with the glad, but heaven not only sorrows with the sorrowing, no, heaven has a new, a more blessed joy in store for the sorrowing. So Christianity always has consolation, and its consolation is different from all human consolation, in that human consolation is conscious of being only compensation for the loss of gladness: the Christian consolation is gladness. Humanly speaking, consolation is a later invention: first comes suffering and pain and loss of joy, and then later, alas, sometimes much later, man came on the track of the consolation. And the same thing is true of the individual life: first come suffering and pain and loss of joy, and then later, sometimes after a long time, comes the consolation. But the Christian consolation can never be said to come too late, for since it is the consolation of eternity it is older than all temporal happiness. And as soon as this consolation comes, it comes with the impulse of the eternal, and swallows up, as it were, the pain, for pain and loss of happiness are the momentary — even if this moment is prolonged into years — are the momentary which is swallowed up in the eternal. And the Christian consolation is therefore not a compensation for the loss of happiness, since it is happiness; all other happiness is in the last analysis only despondency in comparison with the consolation of Christianity. Alas, if man's earthly life were not so perfect, so that the eternal happiness might be proclaimed to him as happiness he had and has himself forfeited! That is why the happiness of eternity can only be preached to him as consolation. As the human eye cannot stand looking at the rays of the sun except through a dark glass, so a man cannot endure the joy of eternity except through the dimness which comes from its being preached as consolation.

Consequently whatever your fortune was in love or friendship, whatever your need was, whatever your loss, whatever the despondency of your life in your confidence in the poet: the highest still remains — love your neighbor! Him you can easily find, that is certain; you can unconditionally always find him, that is certain; you can never lose him. For the beloved can behave toward you in such a way that he is lost, and you can lose a friend; but however your neighbor treats you, you can never lose him. It is true that you may continue to love the beloved and the friend, however they treat you, but you cannot continue truly to call them the beloved and the friend when they, so much the worse, have in truth changed. On the other hand, no change can take your neighbor from you, for it is not the neighbor who holds you fast, but it is your love which holds the neighbor fast; if your love for your neighbor remains unchanged, then the neighbor also remains unchanged just by the fact of existing. And death cannot deprive you of your neighbor, for if it takes one, then life at once gives you another. Death can deprive you of a friend, because in loving your friend you are really united with the friend; but in loving your neighbor you are united with God, and therefore death cannot deprive you of your neighbor. If you have therefore lost everything in love and friendship, if you have never enjoyed any of this happiness: you still have the best left in loving your neighbor.

Love to the neighbor has, namely, the perfections of eternity. And is it really a perfection in love to have as its object the superior, the extraordinary, the unique? I thought that would be a perfection in the object, and this perfection of the object like a subtle misgiving against the perfection of love. Does it indicate a superior quality in your love if it can love only the extraordinary, the rare? I should think it would be an advantage to the extraordinary and the rare that it is extraordinary and rare, but not to love. And are you not also of the same opinion? For have you never thought about God's love? If it were to love's advantage to love the extraordinary, then, if I dare say so, God would be embarrassed, for the extraordinary simply does not exist for Him. The advantage of being able to love only the extraordinary is hence rather an accusation, not against the extraordinary, or against love, but against the love which can love only the extraordinary. Or is it an advantage to a man's sensitive well-being that he can feel well only in one single place in the whole world, surrounded by every favorable circumstance? If you see a man who has thus arranged his life, what is it then you praise? Of course, the convenience of his arrangements. But have you never noticed that it is actually true that every word you utter in your panegyric over this magnificence really sounds like ridicule of the poor man who can live only in this magnificent environment?

Consequently the perfection of its object is not the perfection of love. And just because the neighbor has none of those perfections which the beloved, the friend, the admired, the cultured, the rare, the extraordinary man has to so high a degree, just for that reason the love for the neighbor has all those perfections which the love for the beloved, the friend, the cultured, the admired, the rare, the extraordinary man, does not have. Let the world dispute as much as it will about which object of love is the most perfect: there can never be any dispute about the fact that love to the neighbor is the most perfect love. And therefore all other love has the imperfection that concerning it there are two questions and consequently some ambiguity; there is first the question about the object and then about the love, or both questions are about the object and the love. But as to love for one’s neighbor, there is only one question, that about love, and there is only the single answer of eternity: this is love. For this love to one’s neighbor is not like the relation of one kind of love to other kinds of love. Earthly love is qualified by its object, friendship is qualified by its object, love to one’s neighbor alone is qualified by love. When the neighbor is every man, unconditionally every man, then are all the distinctions taken away from the object and consequently this love is recognizable by the fact that its object is without any closer qualifications of difference, that is to say, that this love is recognizable only by love. Is not this the highest perfection? For insofar as love can and may be recognizable in some other way, then this other way, by that very fact, makes this love suspect, in that it is not comprehensive enough, and hence not in an eternal sense infinite; this other love is a love which is even unconsciously predisposed to morbidness. In this suspicion, therefore, there dwells concealed the apprehension which makes love and friendship dependent on their object, the apprehension which is able to inflame jealousy, the apprehension which can drive one to despair. But love for one’s neighbor is without suspicion in the relationship, and therefore cannot become suspiciousness in the lover. Nevertheless, this love is not proudly independent of its object, its equality does not arise from the fact that love proudly withdraws into itself, indifferent to its object; no, the equality arises from the fact that love humbly turns out toward its object, embracing everyone, and yet loving each one individually, but no one in particular.

Let us consider here what we developed in the preceding chapter, that love in a man is a necessity to him, is an expression of his wealth. Hence the deeper this need is, the greater his wealth; if the need is infinite, then, too, is his wealth. When a man's need for love is satisfied with loving only one, then we must nevertheless, although admitting that this need is wealth, say concerning it, that he really needs that man. On the other hand, when a man's need of love consists in loving everyone, then it is a need, and it is so powerful that it is almost as if it must be able to produce its own object. In the first case the emphasis lies on the particular object of love, in the second case on the essentiality of the need, and only in the latter sense is the need an expression of wealth; and only in the latter case are the need and the object in an infinite sense related to one another on equal terms, for to the first man every man is the neighbor, or there is in a special sense no object, while in an infinite sense every man is the object. If one feels a need to talk with a certain particular man, then he really needs this man; but if his need for talking is so great that he must talk even if he is placed on a desert isle or in solitary confinement; if his need is so great that any man is the one he wishes to talk to, then his need is wealth. And he who loves his neighbor, his love is a need, the deepest need; he does not need men in order to have someone to love him; but he needs to love men. Still there is no pride or arrogance in this wealth, for God is the middle term, and the "shalt" of eternity binds and directs this powerful need so that it does not go astray and become pride. But there are no limitations in the object, for the neighbor is all men, unconditionally every man.

The man who truly loves his neighbor, therefore loves also his enemy. This distinction, "friend or enemy," is a difference in the object of love, but love for one's neighbor truly has an object which is without discrimination;

the neighbor is the absolutely indistinguishable difference between man and man, or it is the eternal resemblance before God — and the enemy also has this resemblance. We think that it is impossible for a man to love his enemy, alas! for enemies can hardly bear to look at each other. Oh, well, then close your eyes — then the enemy absolutely resembles your neighbor; close your eyes and remember the commandment that thou shalt love, then you love — your enemy? No, then you love your neighbor, for you do not see that he is your enemy. That is, if you close your eyes, then you do not see the earthly difference; but enmity is also one of the earthly differences. And when you close your eyes, then your mind is not distracted and diverted at the very moment when you should listen to the word of the commandment. Then when your mind is not distracted and diverted by looking at the object of your love and at the difference in the object, then you become merely an ear for hearing the word of the commandment which said to you, and to you alone, that "thou" shalt love thy neighbor. Lo, then are you on the way of perfection toward loving your neighbor, when your eye is closed and you are become only an ear for hearing the commandment.

And it is true (as we have already explained where we showed that the idea of neighbor is a purely spiritual determination) that one sees the neighbor only with the eye closed, or by looking away from the differences. The sensual eye always looks at the differences. Therefore earthly prudence always cries early and late; "Look out, whom you love!" Alas, if one truly loves his neighbor, then it is better not to look out for everything; for this prudence, when it comes to testing the object, will actually bring it about so that you never get to see your neighbor because he is every man, any man taken quite blindly. The poet despises this seeing blindness of prudence which teaches that one should take care as to whom one loves; the poet teaches that love is blind; according to the poet, the lover will find his object in a mysterious, inexplicable manner, or fall in love and so become — blind from love, blind to every fault, every imperfection in the beloved, blind to everything except this beloved — but yet not blind to the fact that this is the only beloved in the whole world. When this is so, then certainly earthly love makes a man blind, but it also makes him very particular not to confuse any other man with this one beloved; hence it makes him blind as regards the beloved, by teaching him to make a tremendous distinction between this one beloved and all other men. But love for one's neighbor makes a man blind in the deepest and noblest and most blessed sense, so that he blindly loves every man as the lover loves the beloved.

Love for the neighbor has the perfections of eternity — which is perhaps the reason why it sometimes seems to fit in so little with the relations of the earthly life, with the temporal difference of worldliness; that it is so easily misunderstood and subjected to hate; that in any case it is a very unthankful task to love one' s neighbor.

Even the one who is not ordinarily inclined to praise God and Christianity, nevertheless does so when he shudderingly contemplates the terrifying facts of how in paganism the discriminations of the earthly life, or how the caste system, inhumanly separate man from man; how this ungodly wickedness inhumanly teaches one man to disavow kinship with another; teaches him presumptuously and madly to say about another man that he does not exist, that he is "not born." Then even that man praises Christianity which has saved men from this evil by deeply and forever unforgettably emphasizing the kinship between man and man, because the kinship is assured by every individual's equal kinship with and his relation to God in Christ; because the Christian teaching applies equally to every individual, and teaches him that God has created him, and that Christ has redeemed him; because that Christian teaching calls every man aside and says to him, "Close your door and pray to God, then you have the highest a man can have; love your Saviour, then you have everything both in life and death; and disregard the differences, they neither add to nor subtract from."

And I wonder if the one who from the mountain peak sees the clouds below him, I wonder if he is disturbed by this sight; I wonder if he is disturbed by the thunder storm that rages in the region down below him. And so high has Christianity set every man, unconditionally every man — for before Christ, as little as before the face of God, there is no number, no multitude, the innumerable are numbered to Him, the multitude is made up of individuals; so high has Christianity set every man, so that he may not harm his soul by becoming arrogant, or by groaning over the discriminations of the earthly life. For Christianity has not taken away the differences, any more than Christ Himself would, or would ask God to take the disciples out of the world — and this amounts to one and the same thing. There has never lived in Christendom, any more than in heathendom, any man who has not been arrayed in or clothed upon with the differences of the earthly life. As little as the Christian lives or can live without a physical body, just as little can he live outside the differences of the earthly life to which every individual by birth, by condition, by circumstances, by education and so on, specially belongs — none of us is the pure man. Christianity is too earnest to talk nonsense about pure man, it only wishes to make all men pure. Christianity is not a fairy tale, although the happiness it promises is more glorious than that in any fairy tale; nor is it an ingenious chimera which is intended to be difficult to understand, and which also requires one single condition, an idle head and an empty brain.

Consequently Christianity has a horror of that heathendom, and has once for all overridden it; but it has not taken away the differences in the earthly life. These must continue as long as the temporal existence continues, and must continue to tempt every man who comes into the world. For by being a Christian he is not exempt from the differences, but by triumphing over the temptation of the differences, he becomes Christian. In the so-called Christendom, therefore, the earthly difference is always a temptation. Alas! perhaps it does more than tempt, so that one man becomes arrogant, the other defiantly envious. Both cases are rebellion, rebellion against the Christian. Far be it from us, in truth, to confirm anyone in the presumptuous error of assuming that only the powerful and the distinguished are guilty of this; for if the poor and the impotent man merely defiantly aspires to the advantages denied him in the earthly life, instead of humbly aspiring to the blessed equality of the Christian life, then he also harms his own soul. Christianity is not blind, nor is it one-sided; with the calm of eternity it looks dispassionately at all the differences of the earthly life, but it does not contentiously take sides; it sees, and certainly with sadness, that earthly busyness and the false prophets of worldliness will conjure up this appearance of equality in the name of Christianity — as if it were only the powerful who are tempted by worldly differences, as if the poor would be justified in doing everything to gain equality — not merely by becoming a Christian in deed and in truth. I wonder if by that way one could come any nearer to the Christian likeness and the Christian equality.

Christianity will not take the difference away, either the difference of rank or the difference of insignificance; but on the other hand, there is no temporal difference, not the most favorable and acceptable in the eyes of the world, with which Christianity will side in partiality. Whether the temporal difference, in which a man offends by clinging fast to it in worldliness, is in the eyes of the world revolting and shocking, or innocent and honorable, simply does not interest Christianity, which makes no worldly distinctions, which does not look at that thing by which a man harms his soul, but only at the fact that he does injure his soul — is that an insignificance? Perhaps; but the fact that he does injure his soul is certainly not insignificant. Between the extremes of distinction and insignificance there lie a great many closer qualifications of worldly differences; but there are none of these closer and therefore less obvious differences of which Christianity makes an exception. The worldly differences are like a huge net in which the temporal existence is caught; the meshes in this net are of varying sizes, one man seems more bound and snared in the net of existence than another; but all these differences, the difference between difference and difference, the comparative difference, have no interest for Christianity, not the least; such an occupation and concern remains a worldly one.

Christianity and worldliness can never come to understand each other, even if for a moment — to a lesser scrupulousness, they may delusively seem to. To secure an equal place in the world with other men, to make temporal conditions as similar as possible for all men, those are certainly things that worldliness considers of extreme importance. But even in this respect, what we may venture to call the well-intentioned worldly effort never completely understands Christianity. The well-intentioned worldliness holds itself piously — if one wishes to call it that — convinced that there must be one temporal condition, one earthly difference — which one may find by the help of calculations and surveys, or in any other preferred manner — where there is equality. If this condition were to become the only one for all men, then equality would be brought about. But partly, this cannot be done, and partly, this common equality of all arising from having the same temporal differences, is not at all Christian equality; worldly equality, even if it were possible, is not Christian equality. And to bring about a perfect worldly equality is an impossibility. The well-intentioned worldliness itself really admits it; it rejoices when it succeeds in making temporal conditions more and more equal, but it recognizes that its attempt is a pious wish, that it has set itself a tremendous task, that the chances of success are remote — if it rightly understood itself it would see that this could never be attained in the temporal existence; that even if this endeavor were carried on for a thousand years, it would never attain its goal. Christianity, on the contrary, by the help of the short cut of eternity, is immediately at the goal: it allows all the differences to continue, but it teaches the equality of eternity. It teaches everyone to rise above the earthly distinctions. Pay close attention to how equitably it speaks; it does not say that it is the humble who should lift himself up, while the mighty man should perhaps descend from his exalted position; ah, no, such a speech is not equitable. And the equality which is brought about by the mighty descending and the humble ascending, is not Christian equality, it is worldly equality. No, whether it was the one who stood highest, even if it were the king, he must lift himself above the differences of high place, and the beggar must lift himself above the difference of insignificance. Christianity always allows the differences of the earthly life to persist, but this equality in rising above earthly differences is implicit in the commandment of love, in the loving one's neighbor.

Because this is so, because the humble as completely as the distinguished and powerful, because every man in his own particular manner, may lose his soul by not being willing to rise above earthly differences in the Christian way, and, alas, because it happens in both and in the most diversified ways; therefore it happens that wishing to love the neighbor is frequently exposed to a double, moreover, a multiple danger. Everyone who has despairingly clung to one or another of life's earthly discriminations, so that his life is centered in it and not in God, he also demands that everyone who belongs in this same category, should ally with him — not in the good (for the good forms no union, unites neither two nor hundreds, nor all men together), but in an unholy union against the universal-human. The desperate call it treachery to wish to have fellowship with others, with all men. On the other side, those other men are again differentiated by other differences of the temporal existence, and then perhaps misunderstand it if some who do not belong to their class wish to unite with them. For as regarding the differences of the earthly life, there is strangely enough, due to misunderstanding, both strife and unity at the same time; one man wishes to do away with one difference, but he wishes to have another in its place. The difference can, as the word says, indicate the great difference, the supreme difference; but everyone who contends against discrimination in such a way that he wishes to abolish one definite discrimination in order to substitute another, he indeed fights to maintain discriminations. Whoever, then, wishes to love his neighbor, consequently does not concern himself in abolishing this or that discrimination, or, from a worldly point of view, in doing away with all of them, but is devoutly concerned in interpenetrating his own difference with the saving thought of Christian equality: he easily becomes as one who does not fit into the earthly life, not even into the so-called Christendom; he easily becomes exposed to attack from all directions; he becomes like a lost sheep among ravening wolves. Everywhere he turns he meets natural differences (for as was said, no man is pure man, but the Christian rises above earthly differences); and those worldly ones who have clung fast to temporal differences, any of them would be like those who are ravening wolves.

Let us take some examples from the differences of the earthly life, in order to make the matter clear, and let us proceed very carefully. And may you only have the patience to read, as I devote my time and industry to writing; for since being an author is my sole occupation and my sole task, I both can and am in duty bound to employ a precise, a petty, if you will, but certainly also a rewarding carefulness which others are not able to, since in addition to being authors, they must also use their possibly longer day, their possibly richer gifts, their possibly greater skill in other ways.

It is true that the time is past when only the powerful and the distinguished were men, the others thralls and slaves. This is due to Christianity. But this does not imply that the powerful and the distinguished can no longer become a snare to a man, if he looks too long at these differences and harms his soul, forgetting what it means to love his neighbor. If this should take place, it must certainly happen in a more hidden and secret way than before, but at bottom it remains the same. Whether a man openly, enjoying his arrogance and his pride, indicates to other man that they do not exist for him, and desires for sustaining his arrogance that they should feel it when he demands the expression of slavish submission from them — or whether cunningly and secretly by avoiding every contact with them (possibly also for fear lest the manifestation of his arrogance might arouse them and become dangerous to him), he shows that they do not exist for him; at bottom these are one and the same thing. The inhuman and the un-Christlike is not determined by the way in which it is manifested, but by a man's wishing to disavow his kinship with all men, with every man unconditionally. Alas, alas, to keep one's self unspotted from the world is the problem and teaching of Christianity — God grant that we may all accomplish it! But to cling in worldliness to this inhumanity, as if it were the most glorious of all differences, just that is defilement. For it is not the rough labor that defiles — if it is performed in purity of heart; and it is not humble circumstances which defile — if you reverently take pride in living quietly; but silk and ermine can defile, if they cause a man to injure his soul. It is defilement if the humble so shrinks from his misery that he does not have the courage to wish to be edified by the Christian teaching; but it is also defilement when the distinguished man so swaddles himself in his distinction that he shrinks from being edified by the Christian teaching. And it is also defilement if one whose distinction consists in being as most people are, never overcomes this difference in Christian elevation.

So this distinguished depravity wishes to teach the distinguished man that he exists only for the distinguished; that he must live solely in their restricted circle, that he must not exist for other men, just as these must not exist for him. But take care, it says, he must know how to do this as easily and adroitly as possible, so that it may not provoke men, that is to say, the secret and the art consist precisely in keeping this secret to himself. The avoiding of contact with others must not seem to be intended, nor must it be done in an obvious way, which would attract attention; no, it must be done evasively, and consequently as cautiously as possible, in order to make sure that no one notices it, to say nothing of any one's taking offense at it. Therefore he must walk with downcast eyes (alas, but not in the Christian sense), when he mingles in the throngs of men; proudly — and yet stealthily, he must flee from one distinguished circle to another; he must not look at these other men — so that they will not look at him; he must conceal the interest in his eyes if he should meet a fellow creature or an even more distinguished man; his glance must waver vaguely, hesitantly, over all these men, so that no one may catch his eye to remind him of their kinship; he must never be seen among the humbler classes, at least never in their society, and if this cannot be avoided, then must he display an aristocratic condescension — yet in its lightest form — in order not to offend or excite; he must be ready to employ exaggerated courtesy toward the humbler classes, but he must never associate with them as equals for that would indicate that he was — a human, but he is an — aristocrat. And if he can do this easily, skillfully, elegantly, evasively, and yet always preserve his secret (that other men do not exist for him, or he for them), then will the aristocratic snobbery vouch for him that he has — good form. Yes, the world has changed — and the form of snobbery has also changed; for it would still be overhasty if we were to believe that the world has become good because it has changed. If we imagine one of those proud, wayward figures who took pleasure in this ungodly sport of openly letting "those men" feel their wretchedness, how astonished would he not be if he came to know how much caution had now become necessary in order to preserve this secret! Alas, but the world has changed; and gradually as the world changes, the forms of snobbish depravity become more cunning, more difficult to detect — but they truly do not become better.

Such is the aristocratic snobbery. And if there were a distinguished man whose life by birth and circumstances belonged to the same earthly classification, a distinguished man who would not consent to this conspiracy of dissension against common humanity, that is, against the neighbor; if he could not find it in his heart to consent to it, if he, perceiving very well the results of this conspiracy, still trusted to God to give him strength to endure these things, while he did not have the strength — to harden his heart: experience might well teach him what he risked. First the aristocratic snobbishness would accuse him of treason and selfishness — because he wished to love his neighbor; for maintaining his connection with snobbery would be love and loyalty and sincerity and devotion. And if then, as so often happens, the lower class, in turn, from the standpoint of their differences, misunderstood and misjudged him, him — who did not belong to their synagogue, rewarded him with mockery and insults — because he wished to love his neighbor: then, indeed, he would stand there in a twofold danger. Had he been willing to place himself at the head of the lower classes — so that by means of a rebellion he might have swept away the class distinctions: then they might possibly have loved and honoured him. But he did not wish to do this; he wished only to express what to him was a Christian need, the need to love his neighbor. And this was why his lot was so dubious; the twofold danger came from this.

Then the aristocratic snobbishness might exultantly ridicule him, derisively condemn him and say it served him right. It would use his name as a bugbear to prevent inexperienced aristocratic youth from straying away — from the good form" of snobbishness. And many of the better men among the aristocrats, under the powerful influence of the "good form" of snobbishness, would not dare to defend him; would not risk being laughed at by the "counsel of the scornful," and this ridicule would reach its maximum if anyone were bold enough to defend him. Thus we might easily imagine that an aristocrat within the inspired circle of aristocrats might eloquently defend the idea of love to one's neighbor, but when it actually came to the point, he might not be able to subject his mind in obedience to the view he had perhaps successfully defended. However, to defend an opposing view within the partition wall of the differences, to defend behind this wall a view which, in the Christian sense (not in the sense of raising a rebellion), wishes to take the differences away, that is simply to preserve the differences. In the company of the learned, or within a circle of associates which assures and emphasizes his distinction as such, the scholar might perhaps be willing to deliver an inspired lecture on the equality of all men; but that is simply maintaining the differences. In the company of the wealthy, in surroundings which simply make the advantages of wealth obvious, a rich man might perhaps be willing to make every concession about equality between men; but this also means preserving the differences. The distinguished man who might possibly victoriously succeed in overriding all objections arising in that exclusive company out of court, would perhaps snobbishly and cowardly avoid coming in contact with real objections to the differences. "Go with God!" We use this expression as a salutation — if that better-intentioned man among the distinguished, instead of proudly avoiding men, were to go out with God among men, then he would perhaps try to hide from himself — and consequently from God, what he got to see — but what God saw that He hid. That is, if one walks with God, then one certainly walks free from danger; but one is also compelled to see, and to see in a quite peculiar manner. When you walk in company with God, then you need see but one wretched man, and you will not be able to evade what Christianity wishes to have you understand, the human equality.

Alas, but perhaps that superior man would not quite dare risk having to endure this walking in company with God and the impression it made upon him; he would perhaps withdraw — while, nevertheless, that same evening in the exclusive society of his friends, he would again defend the Christian view of life. Moreover, this walking with God (and it is only in company with God that one discovers his “neighbor,” for God is the middle term) for the sake of learning to know life and to know himself, is a serious walk. Then honor, power and glory lose their worldly glamor; in company with God you cannot take pleasure in worldliness. If you unite (for union is not always for the good) with some other men with a definite standing and position in life, even if it is only with your wife, then the worldly tempts you; even if it may not have great significance in your eyes, it tempts you comparatively in respect of persons; perhaps it tempts you for her sake. But when you walk with God, when you unite only with God, and in all that you understand, you understand that God is underneath: then you discover — shall I say to your own hurt? — then you discover your neighbor; then God compels you to love him — shall I say to your own hurt? For loving your neighbor is a thankless task.

It is one thing to let thought fight against thought; it is one thing to fight and conquer in a dispute; it is another thing to conquer one’s self when one fights in the realities of life; for however closely one conflicting thought presses on the other in life, however closely one contender presses on the other in a dispute, all this conflict is still carried on at a distance, like a battle in the air. On the other hand, this is a measure of a man’s disposition, of what he is; how far it is from what he understands to what he does; how great a distance there is between his understanding and his actions. At bottom we all understand the highest things; a child, the simplest man, the wisest man, they all understand the highest things, and all understand the same things; for it is, if I dare say so, a lesson set for us all. But that which makes the difference is whether we understand it only remotely — so that we do not act accordingly; or near at hand — so that we do act accordingly, and "cannot do otherwise," cannot refrain from doing it, like Luther, who understood quite definitely what he had to do, when he said: "God help me, I cannot do otherwise. Amen."

At the distance of a quiet hour from all the turmoil of life and of the world, every man understands what the highest is; when he starts out, he has understood it. When life looks like fair weather to him, he still understands it: but when confusion begins, then the understanding flees, or it appears that this understanding was at a distance. To sit in a room where everything is so still that one can hear a grain of sand fall, and understand the highest, is something every man is able to do; but, speaking figuratively, for one to sit in a kettle while the coppersmith hammers upon it, and then to understand the same thing about the highest: to do this one must have his understanding in himself; otherwise it will appear that his understanding was at a distance — because he was absent-minded.

At the distance of a quiet hour from the turmoil of life, the child and the simplest man and the wisest man understand, and almost equally easily, what every man ought to do — what every man should do; but in the midst of life's confusion, when the only question is about what will do, then it perhaps appears that that understanding was at a distance from him — was at the distance of humanity from him.

While a dispute is still remote from action, while the lofty resolutions are still awaiting action, while the solemn vows are unfulfilled and repentance still not proved, every man understands what the highest is. Within the habitual security of unchanged conditions, everyone can understand that a change is desirable, for this understanding is remote from the change. Is not the unchanged a tremendous distance from the change?

Alas, in the world there is perpetually the pressing question about what one can do and what one cannot do: eternity which speaks of the highest, calmly assumes that every man can achieve it, and therefore asks only whether he did so. From the height of his superior condescension, the great man understands equality between man and man. From the height of their mysterious superiority the scholar and the educated men understand equality between man and man; granted a little advantageous concession, the man whose difference consists in being like most other people, understands equality between men at a distance the neighbor is recognized by everyone: God alone knows how many really recognize him, that is, close by. And yet at a distance the neighbor is merely a figment of the imagination; he who is neighbor by virtue of being nearby, is any man, unconditionally every man. At a distance the neighbor is a shadow who in imagination passes through every man s thought — but, alas, perhaps he did not discover that the man who at that very moment really did pass by him, was his neighbor. Everyone knows his neighbor at a distance, and yet it is impossible to see him at a distance; if you do not see him so close at hand that, before God, you see him unconditionally in every man, then you do not see him at all.

Let us now consider the differences in the lower classes. The times are past when what one calls the lower classes had no conception of themselves, or only the conception of being slaves, not merely poor men, but actually not even men. The wild rebellions, the horror which followed on horror, are perhaps also past; but I wonder if viciousness cannot therefore lie hidden in a man. If so, then the vicious inferiority complex will make the poor man imagine that he sees an enemy in the powerful and the rich, in everyone who is favored by some advantage. But caution, it says, for these enemies still have so much power that it might easily become dangerous to break with them. Therefore the hidden viciousness will not teach the poor man to raise a rebellion, or absolutely refuse every expression of deference, or let his secret become manifest; but it will teach him that the deference shall be expressed and still not expressed, expressed and yet expressed in such a way that the powerful will find no pleasure in it, while he is still not able to say that this homage is refused him. Therefore in this submission there must be a cunning defiance which secretly embitters, a reluctance which secretly says “no” to what the tongue affirms; a dissonance of suppressed envy in the jubilation which honors the powerful. There must be no force used which might become dangerous; there must be no breach which might become a source of danger; but a secret hidden bitterness, a remotely suspected, painful dejection must make the power and the honor and the distinction into a torment for the powerful, the honoured, the distinguished m, who yet is not able to put his finger on any definite cause of complaint; for therein lies exactly the art and the secret of the resistance.

And if there was a poor man whose heart did not harbor this secret envy, and who was unwilling to permit this viciousness from without to get this power over him; a poor man who without being servilely submissive, without fear of man, modestly but above all gladly, gave every advantage of the earthly life its due, happier and more joyful in the giving perhaps than the one frequently is and can be who will receive it: then he would also surely discover the twofold danger. His equals will perhaps thrust him out as a traitor, despise him as servilely minded; and those favored of fortune will, alas, perhaps misunderstand him and make fun of him as a boot-licker. What in the preceding relationship might be regarded as too belittling for the distinguished — to love his neighbor, would here be regarded as too presumptuous for the humble — to love his neighbor.

So perilous a task it is to wish to love one's neighbor. For there are still distinctions enough in the world; there are distinctions everywhere in the temporal existence, which is precisely the different, the manifold. Perhaps too a man may be successful by virtue of his own personality, in getting on well with all the differences in a gentle and complaisant agreement which strikes a little off from one place and so requires a little again in a different place: but the equality of eternity, the willing to love one's neighbor, seems both too little and too much, and therefore, as applied to this love for the neighbor, does not really pertain to the relations of the earthly life.

Imagine a man who arranged a banquet and to it invited the halt, the blind, the lame, the beggars: now far be it from me to think that the world would find this anything but beautiful, even if peculiar. But imagine that this man who gave the banquet had a friend to whom he said: "Yesterday I gave a great banquet" — is it not true that the friend would first and foremost wonder that he had not been among those invited? Then when he came to know who had been invited: then far be it from me to think that the friend would regard it as anything but beautiful, even if peculiar. Still he would wonder, and he would perhaps say: "It is a strange use of words to call such a gathering a banquet, a banquet — where your friends are not present, a banquet — where the question is not about the quality of the wine, the choice of the company, the number of servants who waited on the table," that is, the friend would think one might call such a feeding an act of charity, but not a banquet. For however good the food they received had been, even if it had not been merely as "strengthening and palatable" as that of charitable institutions, but had really been choice and costly, aye, even if they had received ten kinds of wine: the company itself, the idea of the whole affair, a certain something lacking, I know not what, would preclude calling such a gathering a banquet; it is contrary to custom — which draws distinctions. Suppose now that this man who had given the banquet, answered: “Then I still believe I had usage on my side; do we not read in Luke’s Gospel these words of Christ: ‘When thou makest a dinner or a supper, call not thy friends nor thy brethren, nor thy kinsmen nor thy rich neighbors: lest they also invite you again, and you receive recompense. But when thou makest a banquet, call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind’; for here not only is the word ‘banquet’ used in this way, but at the beginning a less festal expression is used, ‘the midday or the evening meal,’ and not until the speech refers to inviting the poor and the crippled, is the word ‘banquet’ used. Does it not seem to you that it is as if Christ wished to indicate that to invite the poor and the lame is not only what we should do, but is also something far more festal than eating at midday or evening with friends and relatives and rich neighbors, which one ought not to call a banquet; for to invite the poor, that is really to give a banquet? But I perceive that our usage of words is different, for as commonly used, a list of those who are invited to a banquet is sufficient: friends, brothers, relatives, rich neighbors — who are able to reciprocate. But so scrupulous is the Christian equality and its usage, that it requires not only that you shall feed the poor, it requires that you shall call it a banquet. If, however, in actual daily life you wish to stand strictly on this usage, and do not think that in the Christian sense it is a matter of indifference under what name the meal is served to the poor, then will men laugh at you. But simply let them laugh, they laughed, too, at Tobias; for the fact of wishing to love one’s neighbor is always exposed to a twofold danger, as we see from the example of Tobias. The ruler had forbidden under pain of death that he should bury the dead; but Tobias feared God more than the ruler, he loved the dead more than his own life: he buried him. This was the first danger. And then when Tobias dared this heroic deed — then ‘his neighbors laughed at him.’ That was the second danger…" Thus spoke the man who gave the banquet. My hearer, does it not seem to you that he was right? But might there not be something else to object to in his conduct? For why so insistent on inviting only the halt and the poor, and, on the other hand, why take such pains, even almost defiantly, to omit to invite friends and relatives, when he might equally well have invited all? Undeniably. And if he was thus insistent, then we shall not commend him or his choice of words. But according to the words of the evangelist, the meaning is, however, that these others would not come. For that reason, too, the friend's surprise at not being invited also ceased as soon as he heard what company had been invited. Had the man, according to the friend's use of words, made a banquet and not invited him, then he would have been angry; but now he was not angry — for he would not have come anyway.

O my hearer, does it seem to you that what we have discussed here is only a dispute about the use of the word "banquet"? Or do you not see that the dispute is about loving your neighbor? For he who feeds the poor, but does not at the same time triumph over his own feelings so that he may call this feeding a banquet, he sees in the poor and the humble only the poor and the humble; he who gives a "banquet," he sees in the poor and humble his neighbor — however laughable this may seem in the eyes of the world. Alas, for it is still not so unusual for us to hear complaints in the world against this or that man because he is not earnest; but the question is, what the world understands by earnestness, whether it does not almost understand by it the pressure of the worldly concern. And the question is whether the world through constantly confusing earnestness and vanity, is not, in spite of its earnestness, so facetious that if in the highest sense it became earnest enough to see from this that one should thereby set about it earnestly, the question is, whether the world would not quite involuntarily burst into laughter. So earnest is the world! If the many and complicated distinctions of the temporal existence did not make it equally as difficult to see whether one loves his neighbor as it is difficult to see “the man”: then would the world always have cause for laughter — if there were otherwise a sufficient number of those who loved their neighbor.

To love the neighbor, while allowing the earthly difference to continue, is, as was here pointed out, essentially to wish to exist equally for every man unconditionally. Manifestly, merely wishing to exist for other men in proportion to the advantages provided by earthly distinctions, is pride and presumption; but the clever idea of not being willing to exist at all for others, in order secretly to enjoy the advantage of distinction in union with equals, is cowardly pride. In both cases there is dissension; but he who loves his neighbor is calm. He is calm through being satisfied with the conditions of the earthly life assigned to him, be they those of distinction or of poverty, and for the rest, he allows every earthly distinction to retain its power, and to pass for what it is and ought to be here in this life. For you shall not covet that which is your neighbor’s, not his wife, nor his ass, and hence not that advantageous position vouchsafed to him in life. If it is denied you, then you should still be glad that it was granted to him. In this way one who loves his neighbor is reassured; he does not servilely avoid the more influential men, but he loves his neighbor; nor is he supercilious to the humble, but he loves his neighbor, and wishes essentially to live equally for all men, whether he is actually known by many or not. It is undeniably a considerable wing-stretch, but it is not a proud flight which soars above the world; it is the humble and difficult flight of self-denial near the earth. It is far easier and far more comfortable to creep through life by living in more aristocratic seclusion, if one is a distinguished man, or in inconspicuous privacy if one is poor; moreover, one may, however strange it is, even seem to accomplish more by this surreptitious mode of life, simply because one exposes himself to much less opposition. But even if it is so pleasant for flesh and blood to avoid opposition, I wonder if it is also consoling in the hour of death? In the hour of death the only adequate consolation is that one has not evaded life, but has endured it. What a man shall accomplish or not accomplish, does not lie in his power to decide; he is not the One who will guide the world; he has only to obey. Everyone has, therefore, first and foremost (instead of asking which place is most comfortable for him, which connection is the most advantageous to him), to assure himself on the question of where Providence can use him, if it so pleases Providence. The point consists precisely in loving his neighbor, or, what is essentially the same thing, in living equally for every man. Every other point of view is a contentious one, however advantageous and comfortable and apparently significant this position may be. Providence cannot use one who has placed himself there, for he is plainly in rebellion against Providence. But he who duly took that overlooked, that despised and disdained place, without insisting on his earthly rights, without attaching himself to just one single man, essentially existing equally for all men, he will, even though he apparently achieves nothing, even if he becomes exposed to the derision of the poor, or to the ridicule of his superiors, or to both insult and ridicule, yet in the hour of death, he will confidently dare say to his soul: "I have done my best; whether I have accomplished anything, I do not know; whether I have helped anyone, I do not know; but that I have lived for them, that I do know, I know it from the fact that they insulted me. And this is my consolation, that I shall not have to take the secret with me to the grave, that I, in order to have good and undisturbed and comfortable days in life, have denied my kinship to other men, kinship with the poor, in order to live in aristocratic seclusion, or with the distinguished, in order to live in secret obscurity."

So let the one who, by the help of his associations and by not living for all men, accomplished so much, look well to it that death does not alter his life for him when it reminds him of his responsibility. For he who did his best to make men attentive, the humble or the distinguished, he who in his teaching, acting, striving, lived equally for all, he is not responsible if men, by persecuting him, showed — that they had become attentive. He has no responsibility, no, he has even benefited, for the condition through which one might derive benefit is always, first and foremost, that one become attentive. But the one who in cowardice would only exist within the partition wall of associations where he would accomplish so very much and gain so many advantages; the one who in cowardice dared not attract the attention of men, the poor or the rich, because he suspected that the attention of men was a dubious good — if one has something true to communicate; the one who in cowardice carried on his famous activities within the security of respect for persons: he bears the responsibility — that he did not love his neighbor. If such a one were to say: "Well, what good does it do to plan one's life according to such a standard?" then I should answer: "How do you think this excuse will help you in eternity?"

For the command of eternity is infinitely higher than any clever excuse. I wonder, too, if a single one of those whom Providence has used as instruments in the service of truth (and let us not forget that every man should and ought to be so used, at least he ought to plan his life so that he might become an instrument) has ever planned his life in any other way than for existing equally for every man. No such man has ever joined himself in alliance with the poor or with the distinguished, but has lived equally for the distinguished and the humblest. Truly, only through loving one's neighbor can a man accomplish the highest; for the highest consists in being capable of being used as an instrument in the hand of Providence. But as was said, everyone who has placed himself at some other point, everyone who forms parties and factions, or joins such, he steers on his own responsibility, and all his achievement, even if it were the transformation of the world, is a delusion. Nor will he have great joy from it in eternity, for it is certainly possible that Providence might make use of it, but, alas, it would not have used him as an instrument; he was a self-willed, a conceited man, and Providence also uses the efforts of such a man by accepting his difficult labor and letting him lose the reward.

However laughable, however slow, however inexpedient, loving one's neighbor may seem to the world, it is still the highest act a man is able to accomplish But the highest has never quite fitted into the relations of the earthly life, it is both too little and too much.

Look sometime at the world which lies before you in all its diversified manifestations; it is as when you look at a stage, except that the variety is far, far greater. Every individual of this innumerable multitude is someone in particular through his difference from others; he represents something definite, but essentially he is something different. However, you do not get to see this in life; here you see only what the individual represents and how he does it. It is as it is in a play. But when the curtain falls on the stage, then the one who played the king and the one who played the beggar, and so on severally, they are all much alike, all one and the same: actors. And when in death the curtain has fallen on the stage of reality (for this is an ambiguous expression, if we speak about the curtain being rolled up on the stage of eternity in the moment of death, for eternity is not a stage, it is truth), then they too are all one, they are men, they are all what they essentially were, which you did not see because of their differences; you see that they are men. The professional theater is an enchanted world; but imagine some evening that through a general absent-mindedness, the players all became confused so that they believed they actually were what they represented: would this not be what we might call, in contrast to the artistic enchantment, the enchantment of an evil spirit, a black art? And so too if in the enchantment of reality (for we are all under this spell through being fascinated by its differences) our fundamental ideas became confused, then would we believe that we essentially are what we represent. Alas, but is this not exactly the case? That the differences of life are only like the player's costumes, or like a traveling cloak which everyone ought to take care of and see that the strings with which this overgarment is fastened are loosely tied, and particularly not in hard knots, so that when the time comes to change, it may easily be thrown off: this seems to be forgotten. And yet we all have artistic understanding enough to be critical, if at the moment when he should cast off his outer garment, the player has to run off the stage to get the strings untied. Alas, but in actual life one fastens the upper garment of his difference so tightly that it completely conceals the fact that this difference is an outer garment, because the inner glory of the likeness to others never or so very infrequently shines through, as it nevertheless should and ought to do. For the player's art is the delusive one, the art of make-believe, the art of deceiving and being deceived on an equally large scale; therefore we must not be able or wish to see the player through the costume; therefore it represents the highest art when the player becomes identical with the character he represents, because this is the supreme delusion. But the reality of life, even if it is not, like eternity, the truth, ought to be truthful, and therefore the other man, who everyone essentially is, ought always to be glimpsed through the disguise. Alas, but in actual life, the individual in his temporal growth grows together with the temporal differences; this is the opposite of the growth of eternity which grows away from the differences; every such individual is crippled, is in the sense of eternity a deformity. Alas, in real life the individual grows fast to his differences, so that at last death must use force to tear them away from him.

Nevertheless, if one is truly to love his neighbor, he must remember every moment that the difference between them is only a disguise. For, as was said, Christianity has not wished to storm forth to abolish the differences, neither those of distinction nor of humbleness, nor has it wished in a worldly sense to effect a worldly agreement between the differences; but it wants the difference to hang loosely about the individual, loosely, like the cape the king casts off to reveal himself; loosely, like the ragged cloak in which a supernatural being has concealed itself. When the difference hangs thus loosely, then that essential other is always glimpsed in every individual, that common to all, that eternal resemblance, the equality. If it were this way, if every individual lived in this way, then would the temporal existence have attained its highest point. It cannot be like eternity; but this expectant solemnity, which, without halting the course of life, renews itself every day through the eternal and through the equality of eternity, every day saves its soul from the differences in which it still continues: this would be the reflection of eternity. Then you would indeed see the ruler in real life, gladly and respectfully offer him your homage; but you would, nevertheless, see in him the inner glory, the equality of glory which his magnificence merely conceals. You would indeed see the beggar, perhaps in your sorrow for him suffering more than he, but you would still see in him the inner glory, the equality of glory, which his shabby cloak conceals. Moreover, wherever you turned your eyes, you would see your neighbor. For there neither is nor has there ever been from the beginning of the world, a man who was a neighbor in the same sense as a king is a king, a scholar a scholar, your relative your relative, that is, in particular, or what amounts to the same thing, in the sense of discrimination; no, every man is your neighbor. In being king, beggar, scholar, rich, poor, man, woman and so on, we do not resemble one another, for just therein lie our differences; but in being a neighbor we all unconditionally resemble one another. The difference is the confusion of the temporal existence which marks every man differently, but the neighbor is the mark of the eternal — on every man. Take a number of sheets of paper; write something different on each of them so that they do not resemble each other; but then take again each individual sheet, do not be confused by the different inscriptions, hold it up to the light, and then you see a common mark in them all. And so the neighbor is the common mark, but you see it only by the light of the eternal, when it shines through the differences.

My hearer, there can certainly be no doubt that this must seem glorious to you, that it must constantly appear thus to you, whenever in quiet exaltation of spirit you allow the thought of the eternal to counsel you, and give yourself up to meditation; only then are you near this understanding. Oh, but might this not seem so glorious to you that for your part you would decide to make this agreement with God; that you wish to unite with Him in order to maintain this understanding, that is, to express in your life that with Him you will maintain this understanding as the only true understanding, whatever may befall you because of it, even if it should cost you your life; that with God you will hold it fast as your victory over all indignities and injuries. Remember that he, who in truth chose the one thing needful, wished the truly good, he has this blessed consolation that one suffers but once, but one conquers eternally.

Lo, the poet knows how to say much about the beginning of love, about what an ennobling power loving and being loved exercises over a man; about the transfiguration which penetrates his whole being; about what a heavenly difference, according to the poet, there is between one who is in love and one who has never felt the transforming power of love. Oh, the true consecration is nevertheless the one which surrenders all claims on life, all claims to power and honor and advantage, all claims — but the happiness of love and friendship are indeed the strongest claims — hence which surrenders all claims, in order to understand what a tremendous claim God and eternity have upon one’s self. He who will accept this understanding is prepared to love his neighbor. A man’s life begins with the illusion that a long, long time and a whole world lie before him, and he begins with the foolish conceit that he has plenty of time for all his many claims. The poet is the eloquent, inspired advocate of this foolish but beautiful conceit. But when in the infinite transformation a man discovers the eternal so near to life that there is not a single one of its claims, not a single one of its evasions, not a single one of its excuses, not a single one of its moments at a distance from what he must do at this very moment, this very second, this very instant: then he is in the way of becoming a Christian. The sign of childishness is to say: "Me wants, me — we"; the sign of youth is to say: "I" — and "I" — and "I"; the sign of maturity and the introduction to the eternal is to will to understand that this "I" signifies nothing if it does not become the "thou" to whom eternity unceasingly speaks, and says: "Thou shalt, thou shalt, thou shalt." The youth wishes to be the only "I" in the whole world; maturity consists in understanding this "thou" for itself, even if it is not said to any other single man. Thou shalt, thou shalt love thy neighbor. O my hearer, it is not you to whom I speak; it is to me, to whom eternity says: "Thou shalt."

III. A. LOVE IS THE FULFILLMENT OF THE LAW

Love is the fulfilling of the law. — Romans 13:10

TO PROMISE IS HONEST, but to keep it is difficult," says the proverb; but by what right? It is manifestly the keeping of a promise that is honest, and in that the proverb is right, that the keeping of a promise is honest and also difficult. But what is promising? The proverb, in the words quoted, says nothing about what a promise is; perhaps then a promise is nothing at all; perhaps it is less than nothing. Perhaps the proverb is even warning against promising, as if it would say: waste no time in promising; the keeping a promise, which is the honorable thing, is certainly difficult. And truly, the promising is certainly far from being honesty, even when the promise is by no means dishonesty intended. Should one not hesitate to give "the fact of promising" the name of honesty, hesitate in a world which deceitfully promises so much, in a generation which is only too inclined to promise and honestly deceives itself in promising? Should one not hesitate for the sake of the proverb itself, since there is another proverb which worldly men are also familiar with and know from experience, that "A penny loaned," if — according to the promise — it is repaid, "is a penny found"? One might rather go to the opposite extreme and say that promising is dishonest, assuming that the characteristic of true trustworthiness is precisely that it does not make promises, that it wastes no time in promising, does not flatter itself by promising, and then claim a twofold credit, first for promising, and then for the fulfillment of the promise. Nevertheless, one may prefer to try to center the attention exclusively and decisively upon the keeping the promise, while, as a preamble, a stimulating and authoritative reminder warns against promising.

There is a parable found in the Holy Scriptures which is but rarely referred to in the godly discourse, and which, nevertheless, is very instructive and stimulating. Let us consider it a little. There was a man "who had two sons"; therein he resembles the father of the prodigal son, who also had two sons. Moreover, the resemblance between these two fathers is even greater; for one of the sons of the father of whom we are speaking was also a prodigal son, as we shall learn from the story. The father went to the first and said: "Son, go out and work today in my vineyard." But he answered and said: "I will not"; but afterward he repented and went. And the father went to the other son and said likewise. But he answered and said, "Lord, I go," and he did not go. Which of the two did the father's will? We might also ask it in another way, "Which of these two was the prodigal son?" I wonder if it was not the one who said "yes," the obedient one, who not only said "yes," but said, "Lord, I will," as if to show his unconditional, obedient submission to his father's will. I wonder if it was not the one who said "yes," who was secretly lost, so that no notoriety attached to him as there did to that prodigal son who wasted his substance on harlots, and ended by herding swine, but who also ended by being reformed. I wonder if the one who said "yes" does not conspicuously resemble that brother of the prodigal son whose righteousness is made suspect in the Gospel, although he regarded himself as the righteous, or the good son; so, too, this brother (we have in our language a peculiar expression which for the sake of brevity we might use about him), this "yes-brother," regarded himself as being the good son — did he not say "yes," did he not say, "Lord, I go"? — and as the proverb says, it is honest to promise! The other brother, on the contrary, said "no." Such a "no," which still implies that one will do precisely what one said "no" to, may sometimes be caused by an inexplicable peculiarity. An honesty exiled and alien to the earth sometimes hides itself in such a simulated negation, whether because the speaker is so disgusted with repeatedly hearing the "yes," which signifies that one will not do what one says, that he has accustomed himself to saying "no" where others say "yes," in order to do then what the yes-brother leaves undone; or it is because the speaker has a troubled mistrust of himself, and therefore avoids promising anything, lest he promise too much. Or is it because the speaker, in a sincere zeal for doing good, wishes to abjure the hypocritical appearance of a promise? Still, in the Gospel this "no" is not mentioned in any way except as being intended to show that it really was disobedience on the part of the son; but he repents and goes out and does his father's will.

But I wonder if what the parable wishes to emphasize is not how dangerous it is to be over-precipitate in saying "yes," even if it is intended to mean "in a moment." The yes-brother is not represented as one who was a deceiver when he said "yes," but as one who became a deceiver because he did not keep his promise, and, still more exactly, as one who just through his readiness in promising became a deceiver — that is to say, his promise became a snare. If he had not promised anything, he would perhaps have been quicker to do it. When one says "yes," or promises something, then one so easily deceives himself and also easily deceives others, as if one had already done what he had promised, or as if by promising, he had already done some part of what he had promised to do, or as if the promise in itself was something meritorious. And then if one still does not do what he promised, then the road becomes very long before he comes back to the truth again, and only makes a beginning by still doing a little of what he had promised. Alas, what he had promised to do was perhaps complicated enough, but now, through the unfulfilled promise, he finds himself at an illusory distance from the beginning. It is now no longer as it was at the moment when he lost his way, and instead of beginning on the labor, swung about by the aid of the promise. He must traverse the whole circuitous way back before he again reaches the beginning. On the contrary, the way from having said “no,” the way through repentance to making good again, is much shorter and easier to find. The “yes” of the promise is soporific, but the “no” uttered and hence heard by one’s self is arousing, and repentance really not far away. He who says, “Lord, I will,” immediately seems virtuous in his own eyes; he who says “no” becomes almost afraid of himself. But this difference is very significant in the first moment, and very critical in the second; yet the first moment is the judgment of the immediate, the second moment is the judgment of eternity. That is why the world is so given to making promises, for the world is the immediate, and a promise at first looks so good. That is precisely why eternity is suspicious of promises, as it is suspicious of everything immediate. If we assume that neither of the brothers went and did his father’s will, then he who said “no” was still nearer to doing it, inasmuch as he at least realized that he was not doing his father’s will. A “no” does not conceal anything, but a “yes” so easily becomes a delusion, a self-deception, which of all difficulties is perhaps the hardest to overcome.

Oh, it is only too true that the “way to perdition is paved with good intentions,” and it is certain that the most dangerous thing of all is for a man to backslide by the aid of good intentions, that is, by the way of promises. It is so hard to realize that it actually is retrogression. When a man turns his back and goes away, then it is easy to see that he is going away; but if a man hits on the idea of turning his face toward that from which he is going away, hits upon the idea of going backwards, while with face and glance and voice he greets one, protesting again and again that he is coming at once, or even saying incessantly, “Here I am” — although, mind you, he is withdrawing farther and farther backward: then it is not so easy to realize it. And so, too, with the one who, rich in good intentions and swift to promise, withdraws farther and farther from the good. Aided by good intentions and promises, his direction is toward the good, he is turned toward the good, and yet with this tendency toward the good, he yet is going back farther and farther away from the good. Every time he renews his intention and his promise, it looks as if he took a step forward, and yet he does not merely remain stationary, but he actually takes a step backward.

The vain intention, the unfulfilled promise, leaves a despondency, a dejection, which perhaps soon blazes up again in an even more fiery purpose, only to die away again in an even greater languor. As a drinker constantly needs stronger and stronger stimulation — to become intoxicated, so he who forfeits his promises and good intentions constantly needs greater incitement — in order to go backward. We do not commend the son who said "no," but we endeavor to learn from the Gospel how dangerous it is to say, "Lord, I will." A promise may be compared to the dealing with a changeling — caution is needed. Just at the moment the child is born, when the mother's joy is greatest because her suffering is past, when just because of her joy she is perhaps less perceptive, then, as the superstitious believe, a hostile power comes and leaves a changeling in place of her child. And at the great but also dangerous moment of beginning, when one ought to begin, then comes the hostile power and slips the changeling promise into one's hand, preventing one from actually making the beginning. Ah, how many have not been deceived in this way, deceived by the changeling promise!

That is why it is so important for a man in all his relations, in his every task, immediately to center his complete undivided attention upon the essential and the decisive. So too with love, so that it may not at any time acquire the power to seem other than it is, or the changeling appearance be able to establish itself firmly and become a snare. For love does not come to have a good time, or to amuse itself with flattering conceits, but it is immediately in line with the task and is forced to understand that every previous moment was a wasted moment and more than merely wasted time, that any other expression of it is retardation and retrogression. This is exactly expressed in the words of our text:

LOVE IS THE FULFILLMENT OF THE LAW, and we shall now make these words the subject of our reflection.

Hence if someone asks, “What is love?”, Paul answers: “It is the fulfillment of the law,” and any further questioning is immediately halted by that answer. For the law is already a complicated matter, but to fulfil it — moreover, you yourselves perceive that if this is to be accomplished, then there is not a moment to waste. The world has certainly many times asked out of curiosity, “What is love?” and as many times there has been some idler who by answering joined himself with the curious, and these two, curiosity and idleness, liked each other so much that they almost tired each other out in asking and answering questions. But Paul pays no attention to the questioner, least of all to the difficulties; on the contrary, by his answer he catches the questioner in obedience under the law; by his answer he immediately gives the direction and gives the impetus to act accordingly. This is not only the case with this answer of Paul’s, but it is true of all Paul’s answers and with all of Christ’s answers; this method of replying, swinging far away from the direction of the question in order immediately to bring the task the questioner has to perform as near to life as possible, is simply characteristic of the Christian method.

That simple wise man of antiquity who by encouraging the pursuit of knowledge doomed paganism, he understood the art of asking questions; he knew how through his questions to ensnare in the web of their ignorance those who answered. But the Christian who does not restrict himself to knowledge alone but to action, is peculiarly able to answer and by his answer to commit everyone to the task. This was why it was so dangerous for the Pharisees and the sophists and the hairsplitters and the dialecticians to question Christ; for the questioner always received an answer, but through the answer he also learned in a certain sense far too much; he received an embarrassing answer which did not cleverly elaborate on the question, but which seized upon the questioner with divine authority and pledged him to act in accordance with it, whereas the questioner perhaps had only wished to satisfy his curiosity or his inquisitiveness or to define his own ideas, while keeping at a distance from himself and from — doing the truth. How many have not asked, “What is truth?” and have secretly hoped that it would be a long time before the truth came so close to them that it would in that very moment decide what it was their duty to do at once. When the Pharisee “in order to justify himself” asked, “Who is my neighbor?”, he certainly thought that it would call for a very long investigation, that it would perhaps require a very long time, and even then perhaps would end with the admission that it would be impossible to define with absolute accuracy the concept “neighbor” — and this was exactly why he had asked the question, in order to find an excuse for wasting time, in order to justify himself. But God takes the wise in their own foolishness, and Christ took the questioner captive in the answer which included the task.

And so with every answer of Christ. He does not warn against unprofitable questions by long, tiresome speeches which only breed quarrels and evasions, for the long elaborate speech would not be much better than the one it is designed to counteract. No, as He taught, so too He answers with divine authority, for the authority simply consists in setting the task. The hypocritical questioner got the answer he deserved, but not the one he desired. He did not get an answer which would encourage curiosity, nor one he could run with, for the reply has the remarkable quality that when it is spoken it at once commits the individual to whom it is spoken unequivocally to the task. Even if someone presumptuously wished to repeat erne or another of Christ's answers, merely as an anecdote, it is no good, it cannot be done; the answer catches by making the one to whom it is repeated responsible for the task. In the case of a clever answer which appeals to human ingenuity, it is of no consequence who has said it or to whom it was said. Every answer of Christ has exactly the opposite quality, which is, however, two-edged: it is infinitely important that it is Christ who has said it, and when it is said to an individual, it is precisely to him that it is said, the whole eternal emphasis is on that him, even if in a way it is said to all individuals. Human ingenuity is introspective, and inasmuch as it is blind, it is ignorant of whether anyone looks at it or not, and whether anyone comes close enough to look at it; the divine authority, on the contrary, is like the pure eye; it first compels the accused to see with whom he is talking, and then it fixes its piercing glance upon him and with this glance it says: "It is you to whom this is said." Therefore men will readily have dealings with ingenuity and intellectuality, for one can play blindman's bluff with them, but they are afraid of authority.

And this is why men will perhaps not so readily have anything to do with Paul's answer, which, as was said, is ensnaring. As soon as anything else is said in answer to the question about what love is, then there is also time, an interval, an idle moment, which then becomes a concession to curiosity and idleness and selfishness. But if love is the fulfillment of the law, then there is no time for a promise — for the fact of promising is here used as an expression for the last thing which wishes to turn love in the wrong direction away from doing, away from immediately beginning upon the task; the promise lies exactly at the beginning, and resembles it deceptively, yet without being the beginning. Therefore even if this promise about love were not so apt to be a momentary excitement, which in the next moment is a disappointment, an immediate blazing up which leaves a languor behind, a springing forward which leads backward, an anticipation which delayingly retards, an introduction which does not lead to the matter — even if all this were not so, the promise is still a dwelling upon love, a dreaming or gratifying or light-minded or conceited dwelling upon love, as if it must first collect itself, or consider itself, or as if it wondered at itself, or at what it was able to do; the promise is a dwelling on love, and therefore a jest, a jest which may become dangerous, for taken earnestly love is the fulfillment of the law. But the Christian love which gives everything away, has just for that reason nothing to give away, no moment and no promise. Still this love is not a busyness, least of all a worldly busyness, and worldliness and busyness are now inseparable ideas. For what does it mean to be busy? We generally think that the way in which a man occupies himself determines whether he can be called busy. But this is not so. It is only within more narrow limitations that the manner of occupation is decisive, that is, not until the object of the occupation is determined. He who occupies himself only with the eternal, uninterruptedly, at every moment, if this were possible, is not busy. Hence the one who really occupies himself with the eternal is never busy. To be busy is, dividedly and distractedly (which follows from the object of the occupation) to occupy one's self with the whole manifold, in which it is absolutely impossible for a man to be undivided, undivided as a whole, and undivided in any individual part of the whole, which only the insane succeed in doing. To be busy is dividedly and distractedly to occupy one's self with that which makes a man divided and distracted. But Christian love, which is the fulfillment of the law, is completely and undividedly present in its every utterance; and yet it is perpetually active; it is, consequently, just as far from being idleness as it is from being busyness. It never takes up something in advance and gives a promise instead of acting; it never satisfies itself by making believe that it has finished the task; never lingers with enjoyment on itself; never sits idly wondering about itself. It is not that hidden, secret, mysterious feeling behind the lattice of the inexplicable which the poet wishes to lure to his window; not a mood of the soul which fondly knows no law, wishes to know none, or wishes to make its own law, and only listen for the songs: it is sheer action, and each of its deeds is sacred, for it is the fulfillment of the law.

Such is the ideal Christian love; even if it does not or did not manifest itself in this way in any man (while yet every Christian by continuing in love, strives that his love may become such), it still was true in Him who was love, in our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore the same apostle says about Him, that "Christ was the end of the law." What the law could not bring to pass, any more than it could save a man, that Christ could do. Whereas the law, therefore, through its demand became the destruction of everyone, because they were not able to fulfil it, and only through it learned to know sin: Christ became the destruction of the law, because He was what it demanded, its destruction, its end; for when the demand is fulfilled, the demand exists only in the fulfillment, but hence it no longer exists anywhere as demand. As thirst when it is quenched exists only in the relief which follows the refreshment, so Christ did not come to abolish the law, but to perfect it, so that from this time forth it exists in its perfection.

Moreover, He was love, and His love was the fullness of the law. "No one could convict Him of any sin," not even the law which knows every conscience; "there was no deceit in His mouth," but everything in Him was truth; there was in His love not the hairsbreadth of a moment, of an emotion, of an interval between His purpose and the demand of the law for its fulfillment. He did not say "no," like that one brother, or "yes," like the other brother, for His meat was to do His Father's will; thus He was one with the Father, one with every demand of the law, so its perfecting was a necessity to Him, His sole need in life.

The love in Him was perpetually active; there was no moment, not one single instant in His whole life when His love was merely a passive feeling which seeks expression while it lets time pass; or a mood which produces a self-satisfaction and dwells on itself while the task is neglected. No, His love was expressed in perpetual activity; even when He wept, was this not redeeming the time? For not even Jerusalem knew what belonged to its peace, but He knew; if those who stood at the grave of Lazarus sorrowing did not know what was about to happen. He knew what He would do. His love was as completely present in His least as in His greatest acts; it rallied itself no more strongly in some single great moment than in the hours of daily life outside the demands of the law. It was equally present at every moment, not greater when He breathed His last upon the Cross than when He let Himself be born. It was the same love which said, “Mary has chosen the better part,” and the same love which with a glance rebuked — or forgave, Peter. It was the same love when He accepted His disciples who gladly left their homes to perform miracles in His name, and the same love when He found them sleeping. There was in His love no demand upon any other man, not on another man’s time or strength or assistance or reciprocal love; for what Christ demanded of him was solely the other man’s good, and He demanded that only for the sake of the other man. No man lived with Him who loved Him as deeply as Christ loved him. There was in His love no bargaining, no indulgent, partial agreement with any man except the agreement which was to Him the infinite demand of the law. There was in the love of Christ no exemption demanded for Him, not the poorest, not a farthing’s worth.

His love recognized no differences, not the tenderest between His mother and other men, for He pointed to His disciple and said, “This is my mother.” Again His love made no difference between His disciples, for His sole wish was that everyone should become His disciple, and He wished this for their own sakes. And again His love made no difference between the disciples, for His divine-human love was exactly the same to all men, in wishing to save them all, and equally for all men, who would allow themselves to be saved.

His life was pure love, and yet this whole life was only a single working day; He did not rest until the night came when He could no longer work; His labor did not cease with the changes of day and night, for when He was not working, then He watched in prayer. Thus was He the fulfillment of the law. And for a reward He demanded nothing, for His only requirement. His only purpose throughout His whole life from birth to death, was to sacrifice Himself as an innocent victim — which not even the law in its most extreme demand — dared to demand. Thus was He the fulfillment of the law. The only one privy to His life, as it were, who was even able to follow Him, who was attentive enough and sleepless enough to follow Him, was the law itself, which followed Him step by step, hour by hour, with its infinite demand; but He was the fulfillment of the law.

How poverty-stricken never to have loved! Oh, but the man who became richest through his love, how poor was not all his wealth of love in comparison with this fullness! And yet, not so. Let us never forget that there is an everlasting difference between Christ and every Christian; even if the law has been done away with, it still stands in power and fixes an everlasting yawning gulf between the God-man and every other man, who cannot even understand, but who can only believe what the divine law must admit, that He was the fulfillment of the law. Every Christian believes this and appropriates it in believing, but no one has known it except the law and He who was the fulfillment of the law. For what weakness in a man is present in his strongest moment, that weakness far more strongly and yet proportionately would be present at every moment — that fact a man can understand only in his strongest moment, but the next moment he cannot understand it; and that is why he must believe and cling to his faith, so that his life may not become confused through being able to understand at one moment, but not being able to understand at many other moments.

Christ was the fulfillment of the law. From Him we should learn how to understand this thought, for He was the explanation, and only when the explanation is what it explains, when the one who explains it is the thing explained, when the explanation is the transfiguration, only then is there the right relationship. Alas, if we are not able to explain in this way; for if we can do nothing else, we can learn from this, humility before God. The frailty of our earthly life must divide it into explaining and being explained, and this, our weakness, is an essential expression of our own attitude toward God. Let a man, humanly speaking, love God in all sincerity of heart, ah, God has first loved him, God is an eternity ahead — so far is the man behind. And so with every task of eternity. When a man finally comes to begin, what an infinite time has not already been wasted, even if for a moment we forget all the deficiencies, all the imperfections in the struggle which has finally begun! Let a man, humanly speaking, aspire first in all sincerity of heart to the kingdom of God and His righteousness, yet how long a time elapsed before he merely learned to understand this in the right way, and hence how infinitely long before he first aspired to the kingdom of God and His righteousness! And so at every point, before every human beginning, there is wasted time. We are accustomed to speak concerning worldly conditions, about the distressing fact that in order to prepare himself for some career, a man often must run in debt; in the God-relationship, man begins with an infinite debt, even if we forget how that debt increases daily after the beginning. Only too often this is forgotten in our daily life, and why should it be unless it is because God too is forgotten? So one man measures himself by another, and the one who has understood more than the other prides himself on being something. Oh, that he might himself understand that before God he is nothing. And since men are now so anxious to be something, what wonder that they, however much they talk about God's love, are so reluctant to have anything to do with Him, just because His demand and His standards make them into nothing.

For use one tenth part of the strength that is yours when you exert it to the uttermost, then turn your back on God, compare yourself with men — and in a very short time you will be distinguished among men. But turn around, turn toward God, use ten tenth parts of your strength, torture if possible every last makeshift into your service — and you will still be as nothing, at an infinite distance from having gained anything, in an infinite debt to God! Lo, therefore we have a right to say that in a certain sense it does not help to speak to a man about the highest, because a revolution must precede it, absolutely different from that which any speech can produce. If, for instance, you wish to have good times and easily get to be something, then forget God, never really notice Him, nor allow yourself to understand clearly that it was He who created you from nothing; start with the presupposition that a man has no time to waste in considering the One to whom he infinitely and unconditionally owes everything. Nor would one man be justified in asking another about it; hence, let it be forgotten, and shout in chorus with the multitude, laugh or weep, be busy from morning to night; be loved and respected and esteemed as friend, as officer, as king, as pallbearer; above all, be a serious man through having forgotten the only serious matter, that of maintaining your relation to God by becoming nothing. Oh, but consider then — still it does no good to talk, but God grant that you may understand what you lost, so that this annihilation before God may be blessed in such a way that you again retrace your way back to this annihilation every moment more strongly, more fervently, more inwardly than the blood returns to the place from which it was forced out. But to worldly wisdom this is and must be the greatest folly. Therefore never cling to God (for we must speak so, if in so many words we would reveal the secret of the indecision which with lying words also pretends to cling to God), “never cling to God, for by clinging to Him you lose what no man who clung to the world ever lost, not even the man who lost most — you unconditionally lose everything.” And this is true, for the world truly cannot take everything, simply because it cannot give everything; only God who takes everything, everything, everything — in order to give everything, who does not take piecemeal little or much, or immeasurably much, but infinitely everything, only God can do this, if you truly ding to Him. “Therefore, flee from Him! A king may certainly be dangerous to approach, if you wish to be something, the proximity of a powerfully endowed spirit is dangerous, but God is infinitely more dangerous to approach.”

Still, if God is left out and forgotten, then I do not know what meaning there can be in such an expression, or what meaning other than arrant nonsense there could be in any talk about this expression: that love is the fulfillment of the law. So let us not in timidity and treachery to ourselves deprive ourselves of understanding these words, as if we were afraid of that which the natural man, however much he shouts about his desire for knowledge and insight, fears — of getting to know too much; for to speak of love being the fulfillment of the law is an impossibility, without at the same time recognizing one’s own guilt and making every man guilty.

Love is the fulfilling of the law, for the law is, despite its many provisions, still somewhat indeterminate, but love is its fulfillment; like a powerful speaker, who despite his exertions still cannot say everything, so is the law, but love is the fulfillment of the law.

It might seem strange to say that the law is indeterminate, for its strength lies in its provisions; it owns and rules over all the provisions. And, nevertheless, it is so, and therein also lies the weakness of the law. As a shadow is weak in comparison with the powerful reality, so is the law; but as there is always something vague about a shadow, so too is there vagueness in the outline of the law, however meticulously this is executed. Therefore in the Holy Scriptures the law is called, “a shadow of things to come,” for the law is not a shadow which follows the reality of love; the law is assimilated in love, but the law is the shadow of things to come. When an artist outlines a plan, a sketch for his work, however exact the sketch is, it is always somewhat indefinite. Only when the work is finished, can one say: “Now there is not the least thing indefinite, not one line, not a single indefinite point.” There is, therefore, only one sketch that is absolutely definite, that is the work itself, but that is saying that no sketch is or can be absolutely and unconditionally definite. So the law is the plan, love the fulfillment and the absolutely definite; in love the law is absolutely definite. There is only one power which can carry out the work for which the law furnishes the preliminary sketch, and that is love. Still the law and love, like the sketch and the finished work, are by one and the same artist, from one and the same source; they are not at variance with one another anymore than the finished work of art, which completely corresponds to the sketch, is at variance with that, because it is even more clearly defined than all the outlines of the sketch.

Therefore Paul says in another place, “The end of the commandment is love.” But in what sense is this said? It is said in the same sense as it is said that love is the fulfillment of the law. In another sense, it is the sum of all the individual commandments, “Thou shalt not steal,” and so on. But try to see if in this way you can find the sum however long you continue to count, and you will see that this is labor in vain, because the concept of the law is inexhaustible, endless, irresistible in its provisions; every provision produces an even more exacting provision, and then from that another still more exacting, and so on interminably.

Here love stands in the same relation to the law as reason does to faith. Reason counts and counts, reckons and reckons, but it never attains the certainty which faith possesses: so too with the law, it makes provisions and more provisions, but it never reaches the end, which is love. When the sum is mentioned, the very expression seems to suggest counting; but when a man has become tired of counting, and yet is even more anxious to find the sum, then he understands that this expression must have a deeper significance. And so, too, when the law has sicked all its provisions on a man and pursued him to exhaustion, because there are provisions everywhere, and yet every provision, even the most definite, has the uncertainty of interpretation that permits it to be made even more definite (for there is perpetually a vagueness in the provisions and an anxiety caused by their numbers, which never dies): then a man becomes trained to understand that there must be something different which constitutes the fulfillment of the law. But there is no more conflict between the law and love than there is between the sum and those numbers whose sum it is; as little as there is conflict between the vain attempt to find the sum and the successful finding of it, the happy decision that it has been found.

Man groans under the law. Wherever he looks he sees only its demand, never the limitation of its demand; like one who looks out over the sea and sees wave after wave, but never an end to them; wherever he turns he meets only the severity which can always become infinitely more severe, never the boundary where it passes over into mildness. The law is starving, as it were; by its aid one does not attain fullness, for it provides simply for taking away, for imposing demands, for exhausting to the uttermost, and the vagueness constantly inherent in its multitudinous provisions is the inexorable collecting of the claims. In each of its provisions the law demands something, and yet the number of provisions is unlimited. The law is, therefore, the exact opposite of life, but the life is the fulfillment. The law resembles death. But I wonder if life and death do not really know one and the same thing; for just as accurately as life knows everything that makes for life, just so accurately does death know everything which makes for life. There is, therefore, in a certain sense no dispute between the law and love as regards knowledge, but love gives, the law takes, or, that we may express the relationship more properly, the law demands, love grants. There is not one provision of the law, not a single one, which love wishes to abolish; on the contrary, it is love which first gives them all fulfillment and definiteness; in love all the provisions of the law are far more clearly defined than in the law. There is no more conflict between them than there is between hunger and the blessing which satisfies that hunger.

Love is the fulfillment of the law, for love is no shirker of tasks; no indulgence, which demanding immunity or making excuses, coddling or being coddled, slips in between love and the fulfillment of the law, as if love were an idle emotion, too superior to express itself in action, an exigent incapacity, which neither can nor will give satisfaction. Only folly speaks thus about love, as if there were a conflict between the law and love, as there certainly is, but in the love there is no conflict between the law and the love which is the fulfillment of the law; as if there were an essential difference between the demands of the law and love, as there certainly is, but not in the love in which the fulfillment is completely one and the same with the demand. Only folly sows dissension between the law and love, believes it speaks wisely when it whispers between them, or even maligns one of them to the other.

Fulfillment of the law — still, what law are we speaking about? Our text is the apostolic word, we are speaking about Christian love; hence this discourse can only refer to the law of God. In this the world (insofar as this is different from what we have called "folly") and God, worldly wisdom and Christianity, agree that there is a law which love must fulfil in order to be love, but they disagree about what the law is, and this disagreement is an infinite difference. Worldly wisdom believes that love is a relationship between man and man; Christianity teaches that love is a relationship between man — God — man, that is, that God is the middle term. However beautiful a love-relationship has been between two or among many, however absolutely this love has been to them the source of all their happiness and all their blessedness in mutual sacrifice and renunciation, whether all men have praised this relationship — if God and the God-relationship have been neglected, then from the Christian viewpoint it has not been love, but a mutually enchanting illusion of love.

For to love God is in truth to love ones self; to help another man to love God is to love the other man; to be helped by another man to love God is to be loved. Worldly wisdom certainly does not believe that the one who loves will arbitrarily determine what he wishes to understand by love. Love truly means devotion and sacrifice; therefore the world thinks that the object of love (be it the beloved, or a friend, or all those loved, or a social union, or one's contemporaries, which for the sake of brevity we shall hereafter call "the beloved") must decide whether self-sacrifice and devotion are displayed, and whether the self-sacrifice and devotion displayed are love. Hence it will depend on whether the men who do the judging know how to judge correctly. If the object of love, the judge, does not before God have a true conception in himself of what it means to love himself, that it means to love God, then neither will the beloved have any true conception of what it means to be loved by another man, that it means to be helped to love God; but if this is true, then, as a result, the beloved will take a false kind of devotion and self-sacrifice for true love, and true love for false love. The merely human judgment about love is not a true judgment, for to love God constitutes the true self-love. If God, on the other hand, is the middle term in judging love, then there follows a final and twofold judgment, which still only, although the only one at bottom decisive, begins where the human judgment has finished and has decided whether it is love or not.

The judgment is this: is it really love, from the divine standpoint, to show such a devotion as that demanded by the object of love? Next, is it, from the divine standpoint, really love to demand such devotion from the object of love? Every man is a bond servant unto God; therefore he dares not belong to anyone in love unless in the same love he belongs to God, or to own anyone in love unless this other and he himself in this love belong to God: a man dares not belong to another man in such a way that this other man is everything to him; a man dares not permit another to belong to him in such a way that he is everything to the other. If there were a love-relationship between two people or among many, so happy, so perfect, that a poet must rejoice over it, moreover, so blissful that one who was not a poet must become one from wonder and joy at this sight: that by no means ends the matter. For now Christianity enters and inquires about the God-relationship, whether each individual has first established a relationship with God, and whether the love-relationship maintains itself in God. If this is not the case, then will Christianity, which is still the protector of love, or just because it is, not hesitate to break up this relationship in the name of God, until the lovers are willing to understand it. And if only one party is willing to understand it, then Christianity, which still is the protector of love, will not hesitate to carry him into a horrible conflict, such as no poet has dreamed of or ventured to describe. For just as little as the poet will have anything to do with the Christian teaching of loving one's enemy, just as little, and even less if possible, can he accept the Christian teaching of hating the beloved from love and in love. Still Christianity does not hesitate in the name of God, to strain the relationship so intensively. Christianity not only does this in order, as it were, to collect the outstanding debts due to God (since God is indeed the master and owner of bound men), but He does it out of love for the lovers; for to love God is to love one's own self; to love another man like God is to deceive one's self; and to allow another man to love one like God, is to deceive that other man. To such an extreme madness, humanly speaking, can Christianity drive its demand, if love is to be the fulfillment of the law. Therefore it teaches that the Christian must, if required, be able to hate father and mother and sister and the beloved — I wonder if it really means that he should hate them! Oh, may such an abomination be far from Christianity! But certainly in that sense, love, the divinely understood, steadfast and sincere love, may be looked upon as hate by the beloved, the neighbor, the contemporaries, because these will not understand what it means to love themselves, that it means to love God, and that to be loved means to be helped by another man to love God, whether this is actually achieved or not by the lover submitting to being hated. Lo, worldly wisdom has a long list of diversified expressions for sacrifice and devotion; I wonder if among these, this is also found: hating the beloved from love; hating the beloved and insofar himself from love; hating the contemporary and insofar his own life from love. Lo, worldly wisdom knows many and highly diversified cases of unhappy love; I wonder if among all these you find the suffering that might seem to hate the beloved, that might have hate as the last and sole expression of its love, or that suffering which for a reward of its love must be hated by the beloved, because there is the infinite difference of the Christian truth between that which the one party understands by love, and that which the other understands by it.

Whatever the world before the time of Christianity had seen of unhappy love, whatever it had seen of the collision of love with appalling events, whatever it had seen of its collision with what, within the same fundamental conceptions of what love is, is the converse of love, whatever it had seen of its collision with partially divergent ideas within the common fundamental idea: before the time of Christianity the world had never seen that in loving, there was a collision possible between two conceptions between which there is an eternal difference — between the divine conception and the merely human conception. But if there is such a collision, then it is, divinely understood, precisely love to cling to the true, the eternal conception, to love by virtue of it, whereas that one, or those, who were loved, if they had only the human conception of love, must regard it as hate. If we may be permitted to speak quite humanly about the highest, we are unfortunately easily tempted to imagine in our so-called Christendom, that one believes that which one does not even have an impression of, at least not noticeably so; if we may be permitted to speak quite humanly about the highest, yet never forgetting that the one about whom we speak is separated by an eternal distance from every other man: the life of Christ is really the only unhappy love. He was, divinely understood, love. He loved by virtue of the divine understanding of what love is; He loved the entire race; He dared not — on account of His love, give up this. His understanding, for that would precisely be to deceive the race. Therefore His whole life was a terrible collision with the purely human understanding of what love is. It was the ungodly world which crucified Him; but even His disciples did not understand Him, and constantly sought to win Him to their conception of what love was, so that even to Peter He was obliged to say, "Get thee behind me, Satan." Unfathomable suffering in the terrible collision: that the most sincere, the most faithful disciple, when he, not only meaning well — oh, but burning with love — wishes to counsel Him for the best, wishes only to express how greatly he loves the Master — that this disciple, then, because he had a false conception of love, spoke in such a way that the Master must say to him: "You do not know it, but to me your words are as if it were Satan himself who spoke!" Thus Christianity came into the world, and with Christianity came the divine explanation of what love is.

Oh, we often complain about misunderstanding, especially when it is most bitterly mixed with love; when in each one of its expressions we know that the love is unhappy, that we are certainly loved but not understood; that everything is so bitter because it is done by love through a misunderstanding: but to be misunderstood as no other man was ever misunderstood by another man, to be thus misunderstood as Christ was — and then to be love as Christ was! We pretend that it was only the ungodly who were offended at Christ. What a misunderstanding! No, the best and most kindly man, humanly speaking, who has ever lived, must be offended at Him, must misunderstand Him; for what love is, divinely understood, this the best of men could learn only from Him. The love of Christ, humanly understood, was not self-sacrificing — anything but that; He did not make Himself unhappy, in order, humanly understood, to make His disciples happy. No, He made Himself and His disciples, humanly speaking, as unhappy as possible. And He who had had it in His power to establish the kingdom of Israel and make everything so pleasant for Himself and His followers, as every contemporary could see clearly enough!

Consequently He could have done it, consequently He would not do it, consequently the fault must have lain in Him, in His heart, that He would not sacrifice His ideas and His conceptions, but cruelly preferred to sacrifice Himself and His followers, that is, to forfeit His own life and the lives of those He loved! He did not establish any kingdom on earth, or sacrifice Himself so that the apostles might inherit the established kingdom. No, humanly speaking, it was indeed madness: He sacrifices Himself — in order to make the beloved equally unhappy with Himself! Was this really love: to gather some poor, simpleminded men about Him, to win their devotion and love, as no other had ever won it, to pretend for a moment to look out for them, as now the prospect of the fulfillment of the proudest dream is revealed to them — in order suddenly to reconsider and change the plans; in order without being moved by their prayers, without paying the least attention to them, to plunge them down from this seductive height into the abyss of all dangers; in order, without resistance, to give His enemies power; in order, under mockery and insult while the world rejoiced, to be nailed to the Cross as a criminal! Was this really love?

Was it really love: to be thus separated from the disciples, to leave them forsaken in a world which hated them because of Him, to drive them out as wandering sheep among ravening wolves, whose bloodthirstiness He had Himself aroused against them: was this really love! What does this Man want, what does He want of these honest, simple-hearted even if simple-minded men whom He so cruelly deceives? Why does He call His relation to them love? Why does He continue to call it love? Why does He die without confessing that He deceived them, so that He therefore dies asserting that it was, nevertheless, love — alas, while the disciples with bruised hearts, but with touching loyalty, do not venture to have any opinion of their own about His conduct, presumably because He had overborne them? Meanwhile every other man can easily see that, whatever He was to the rest of the world, perhaps excusable as a fanatic, in relation to His disciples He acted like a deceiver! And yet He was love, and He exalted love above everything, and wished to make men happy, and how? Through their relationship to God — for He was love. Yes, He was love, and He knew in Himself and in God, that it was the sacrifice of reconciliation that He brought, that He truly loved His disciples, loved the entire race of men, or at least everyone who would permit himself to be saved!

The fundamental error in the merely human apprehension of love is, that love is deprived of its relation to God, and thereby of its relation to the law to which it refers when it says, “Love is the fulfillment of the law.” By a strange misunderstanding one is perhaps inclined to believe that love for a neighbor must not be without a relationship to God; but only earthly love and friendship. As if Christianity were something halved, as if it could not penetrate every relationship, as if the teaching about love for the neighbor did not exactly count on this, and therefore transformed earthly love and friendship; while many, through a strange misunderstanding, perhaps believe that they need God's help to love their neighbor — the less lovable object, but as to earthly love and friendship, they believe that, on the contrary, they can best help themselves — alas! as if God's intervention here would even be disturbing and inconvenient!

But no love and no expression of love may, in the merely human and worldly sense, be deprived of a relationship to God. Love is a passionate emotion, but in this emotion, even before he enters into a relation with the object of his love, the man must first enter into a relationship with God, and thereby realize the claim that love is the fulfillment of the law. Love is a relation to another man or to other men, but it is by no means and dares by no means be a matrimonial, a friendly, a merely human agreement, however steadfast and tender the connection between man and man. Everyone individually before he in love enters into a relation with the beloved, with the friend, the loved ones, the contemporaries, has first to enter into a relation with God and with God's demands. As soon as one leaves out the God-relationship the questions at issue become merely human determinations of what they wish to understand by loving; what they will require of one another; and their mutual judgment because of this becomes the highest judgment. Not only the one who listens absolutely to the call of God will not belong to a woman, in order not to be delayed through wishing to please her; but also the one who in love belongs to a woman, will first and foremost belong to God; he will not seek first to please his wife, but will first endeavor to make his love pleasing unto God. Hence it is not the wife who will teach her husband how he ought to love her, or the husband the wife; or the friend the friend, or the contemporary the contemporary, but it is God who will teach every individual how he ought to love, even if his love still only lays hold on the law referred to when the apostle says, “Love is the fulfillment of the law.” This makes it quite natural that the one who has only a worldly, or a merely human conception about what love is, must come to regard that as self-love and unkindness which, understood in the Christian sense, is precisely love. When, on the other hand, the God-relationship determines what love is between man and man, then love is kept from pausing in any self-deception or illusion, while certainly the demand for self-abnegation and sacrifice is again made more infinite. The love which does not lead to God, the love which does not have this as its sole goal, to lead the lovers to love God, stops at the purely human judgment as to what love and what love’s sacrifice and submission are; it stops and thereby escapes the possibility of the last and most terrifying horror of the collision: that in the love relationship there are infinite differences in the idea of what love is.

Merely humanly understood this collision can never enter, for merely humanly understood, the fundamental conception of what love is must essentially be a common conception! Only when understood in the Christian way is the collision possible, since it is the collision between the Christian and the purely human understanding. Nevertheless, Christianity knows how to steer through this difficulty, and no other doctrine has ever taught how to persevere so long in love as has Christianity. Unchanged and immovable, it teaches, precisely for the sake of the beloved, how to hold fast to the true conception of what love is, and then be willing to find the reward for its love in being hated by the beloved — for there is indeed the difference of infinity, an eternal difference in language, between what one party understands by love, and what the other party understands by it. To yield to the conception of the beloved as to what love is, that is humanly regarded as loving, and if one does it, then one is loved. But to hold out against the beloved's purely human conception of what love is by denying the wish, and insofar, also against what the lovers, from the human standpoint, must themselves wish, in order to hold fast the God-idea: that is the collision. It can never occur to the purely human apprehension of what love is, that a man through being loved as intensely as possible by another man, might be an obstacle in the way of the other man. And yet from the Christian standpoint this is exactly possible, for to be loved in this way may interfere with the God-relationship of the lovers. But what is there then to do?

That the beloved should wish to caution against this will certainly not help much, for that would only make him even more lovable — and consequently the lovers would be even more deceived. Christianity knows how to remove the collision without breaking off the love; there is required only the sacrifice (that is certainly in many cases the hardest thing possible, and always very hard): of being willing to find the reward for his love in being hated. Wherever a man is so loved, so admired by others, that he is in the way of becoming dangerous to their God-relationship, there is a collision; but where there is a collision there is also demanded the sacrifice which the merely human conception of what love is does not suspect. For the Christian conception is: truly to love one's self is to love God; truly to love another man is by every sacrifice (even to one's self being hated), to help the other man to love God or in loving God.

This is certainly very easy to understand; in the world, on the contrary, it certainly meets with great difficulties, because a contrary view of what love is, a worldly, a merely human, but withal a both effectively ingenious and poetical view, either explains that all this about the God-relationship is really a delusion, a retardation, or else, in speaking about love, it keeps silent about the God-relationship. As in these times there is an effort made in so many directions to free men from all restraint, even the beneficial restraint, so there is an effort to free the emotional relation between man and man from the bonds which bind him to God, and which bind him in everything, in every expression of life. One wishes in relation to love, to teach men something entirely new, something for which the now outmoded Holy Scriptures already have the significant expression — one wishes to teach men the liberty which "is without God in the world." The abominable age of serfdom is past, so one thinks to go farther by the aid of the abomination: to abolish man's bondage with relation to God, to whom every man — not by birth, but by his creation from nothing — belongs as a serf, and thus as no serf has ever belonged to an earthly master, who does still admit that the thoughts and emotions of his serfs are free: but he belongs to God in every thought, the most hidden, in every feeling, the most secret, in every movement, the most inward. Still, one finds this serfdom to be a troublesome adjunct, and therefore more or less openly considers setting God aside and establishing man — in the rights of man? No, that is not needed, God has already done that — Whence in the rights of God; consequently the place remains vacant, if God is dismissed. Lo, as a reward for such presumption, one will in this way tend more and more to transform the whole of existence into doubt or turmoil.

After all, what is the law? What does the law require of a man? That must be decided by men. Which men? Here the doubt begins. Since one man does not essentially stand higher than the other, then the condition is entirely left to me as to whom I wish to agree with in determining what the highest is, insofar as I might not by myself be able, if possible even more arbitrarily, to hit upon a new provision, and as promoter gain support for it. It is likewise left to my decision to select one requirement of the law today, another tomorrow. Or shall the determination of what the law requires perhaps be an agreement between men, a common decision of all men, to which agreement the individual must then subject himself? Excellent! If it were otherwise possible to select a place and fix the moment for this assembling of all men (all living, all? — but how about the dead?), and if that were possible, which is manifestly impossible, possible that they would all agree on one thing! Or is perhaps an agreement of a majority, a certain number of votes sufficient for a decision? How great a number is needed then? And, above all, if the purely human determinations of what the law requires is the requirement of the law (yet not the individual man's, for thereby we fall into the purely arbitrary, as was shown), how can the individual come to begin to act; or if it is not left to chance, where does the individual happen to begin, instead of everyone starting at the beginning? Before the individual can begin to act, he must first learn from "the others" what the law requires; but each one of the others will again as individuals have to learn from "the others." In this way, all human life transforms itself into one huge excuse — can this possibly be what we call the great, matchless, common undertaking, the great achievement of the race? The category of "the others" becomes fantastic, and the fantastically aspiring determination of what the law requires a false alarm.

And if now this inhumanly extensive effort toward a common agreement among all men were not finished in a single evening, but dragged along from generation to generation, then as a consequence it would be quite accidental as to where the individual happened to begin; it would depend, so to speak, on where he came into the game. Some would begin at the beginning, but would die before they reached the halfway mark; others would begin midway, but die without seeing the end, which no one would ever really see, for that would only come when the whole thing was past and world history ended; only then would one completely learn what the requirement of the law was. What a pity that human life should not be forced to begin until just as it is over, and in consequence have to be carried on by all men without complete knowledge of what the law required!

When of seven men who are all suspected of having committed a crime which could not have been committed by anyone else, the seven each say: "It wasn't me, it was the others," then we understand that "the others" refers to the other six, and so on. But now when all seven, each severally, have said, "It was the others," what then? Is there not a phantasm conjured up which has doubled the actual seven, and which would have us believe that there were many more, although we know that there were only seven? So, too, when the whole race, each individual severally, hits upon the idea of saying "the others," then a phantasm is conjured up, as if the race had once existed before the time which marks its actual existence; but here it becomes so difficult to prove the falsity, the dazzling appearance of profundity, because the race is innumerable. Nevertheless, the situation is entirely the same as in what we might be tempted to call a fairy story about the seven and the seven others. For this is exactly the situation that arises when the purely human determination of what the law's requirement is, constitutes the law's requirement: one helps one's self up by using that romantically fantastic "the others," and down below they assist each other by forming a little union. For certainly if there is to be a second existence of the human race, but not a fantastic one, its existence the second time must be its existence in God, or rather this is its first existence, wherein each individual learns from God the requirement of the law. The actual existence is the second existence.

But what then does that confused condition described resemble? I wonder if it is not like a mutiny. Or should we hesitate to call it by that name if at a given moment it were the whole race who became guilty of this, and we then, it is well to note, add that it is a mutiny against God? Or is the moral so subordinated to the accidental that when a great number do wrong, or we all do wrong, then this wrong becomes the right? This explanation would again be merely a repetition of the mutinous thought, or of its thoughtlessness, for if it is still, in the final analysis, men instead of God who determine what the law's requirement is, he who forgets this is not only guilty of rebellion against God on his own account, but he also assists others in becoming guilty, so the mutiny gets out of hand. For who could halt such a mutiny if it started? Should we perhaps, only in a new pattern, repeat the error of the mutiny, and everyone in particular say, "I cannot stop it, 'the others' must"? I wonder if every individual is not pledged to God to halt the mutiny, naturally not by shouting and imaginary self-importance, not by ruling and wishing to force others to obey God, but through his own unconditional obedience, his own unconditional laying hold on the God-relationship and the God-requirement, and thereby expressing for himself personally that God exists and is the only ruler, he, on the contrary, the unconditionally obedient.

Only then is there sense and meaning and truth and reality in existence, when all of us, each one personally, if I may say so, accept our orders at one place, and then, each one personally, unconditionally obey this same order. Since it is one and the same order, then to that extent one man might be able to learn it from another — if it was certain, or at least reasonably certain, that this other man would communicate it rightly. However, there would still be a confusion everywhere, as it is in conflict with God's order, for God wishes, for the sake of certainty and equality and responsibility, that every individual should learn the law's requirement from Him. When this is so, then there is stability in existence, because the stability has God in it; there is no turbulence in it, for each individual does not begin with "the others," and consequently not with excuses and evasions, but he begins with the God-relationship, and hence he stands firmly, and thereby he also checks, as far as he can reach, the capriciousness which is the beginning of mutiny.

So, too, in relation to the law of love — when there is sense and truth and stability in existence, when we all, each one personally, learn from God what the requirement is to which we must conform, and when, for the rest, we all, each one personally, defend ourselves against the human confusion (it goes without saying that if we all did this, there would then be no confusion), aye, if necessary, defend ourselves against the beloved, against the friend, against our nearest, who are, nevertheless, especially the objects of our love, insofar as these in some way wish to teach us a different explanation, or help us on a bypath; on the other hand, indebted to them if they wish to help us in the right direction. Let us not forget this, let us not deceive or be deceived by vague, misty conceptions of what love is, but let us heed God's explanation, indifferent as to whether the beloved, the friend, or the loved ones believe or do not believe — yet no, not indifferent, on the contrary, inwardly concerned if they disagree with us, but still calmly and unchanged continuing to love them.

There is really a conflict between what the world and what God understand by love. It is easy enough to bring about an apparent agreement (as is already apparent in the use of one and the same word, "love"); on the other hand it is more difficult really to detect the disagreement; but this difficulty is inevitable if we are to know the truth. There is a saying current in the world: "Selfishness is the wisest policy." Certainly this saying does not give one the most favorable opinion of the world; for that is scarcely a good world in which selfishness is the wisest policy or that which brings the greatest advantage. But now, even if the world regarded selfishness as the wisest policy, it by no means follows that it might not in turn regard love as the nobler quality. It does this too, only the world does not understand what love is. Again, it is easy enough to bring about a surface agreement between God and the world's interpretation of love; it is even apparent in the use of the familiar expression that "love is noble." Still, misunderstanding hides in this. What good does it do to commend love as noble, as Christianity also does, if the world understands by love something different, and hence also understands something different by the word “noble”! No, if the world will be explicit, it must say: “Not only is selfishness the wisest policy, but if you wish to be loved by the world, if you wish it to praise your love and you as noble, then you must, in the Christian sense, be selfish, for that which the world calls love is selfishness.” The distinction which the world makes is, namely, this: If one wishes to be alone in being selfish, which, however, very rarely happens, then the world calls it selfishness; but if in his selfishness he unites with some other selfish people, especially with many other selfish people, then the world calls it love. The world can never get any further in determining what love is, because it has neither God nor the neighbor as the middle term. What the world honors and loves under the name of love, is a union in selfishness. The union also demands sacrifice and devotion from the one whom it will call affectionate; it demands that he shall sacrifice a part of his own self-love in order to unite in the united selfishness; and it demands that he shall sacrifice the God-relationship so that in worldliness he may enter into the union which excludes God, or at most accepts Him for the sake of appearances. On the contrary, God understands by love sacrificial love; in the divine sense, sacrificing love, which sacrifices everything in order to secure God a place, even if the heavy sacrifice became even heavier because no one understood it, which, however, in another sense, is proper for true sacrifice; for that sacrifice, which is understood by men, truly has its reward in their approbation, and insofar is not the true sacrifice which must unconditionally be without reward. Therefore we dare not in our understanding of the apostolic word, that love is the fulfillment of the law, assent to the superficial saying that if a man really has love, then he will also be loved by men. He will far more probably be accused of selfishness, just because he will not love men in the same sense in which they selfishly love themselves. The facts are these: the highest degree of self-love, the world also calls selfishness; the self-love of the union, the world calls love; a noble, sacrificial, magnanimous, human love, which yet is not the Christian love, is ridiculed by the world as foolishness; but the Christian love is hated and abominated and persecuted by the world. And so let us not again, through a doubtful compromise, conceal irregularities by saying: “That is the way of the world, but it is otherwise with the Christian.” For this is quite true, but if every baptized individual is a Christian, and a baptized Christendom sanctifies the Christian, then the “world” simply does not exist in a Christian land, which in such a case is proved by the help of the lists of the sexton and the superintendent of police.

No, there is really a conflict between what God understands by love and the world’s understanding of it. Oh, but if it is inspiring to fight for home and fatherland, then it is also inspiring to strive for God, which he does who before God and in His sight, holds fast to the God-relationship, and its definition of what love is! It is true God does not need any man, any more than He needs the whole race, or everything which exists at the moment, which to Him is the nothing from which He created it; but he fights for God who fights the good fight, in order to express the fact that God exists and is the Lord, whose explanation must unconditionally be obeyed.

The God-relationship is the sign by which the love for men is recognized as genuine. As soon as the love-relationship does not lead me to God, and as soon as I in the love-relationship do not lead the other man to God, then is the love, even if it is the greatest happiness and delight of affection, even if to the lovers it is the highest good of the earthly life, still not the true love. The world can never get this into its head, that God does not thus merely become the third party in every love-relation, but really becomes the sole object of affection, so it is not the husband who is the wife’s beloved, but it is God; and it is the wife who is helped by her husband to love God, and conversely, and so on. The merely human interpretation of love can never get any further than reciprocity: the lover is the beloved, and the beloved is the lover. Christianity teaches that such a love has not yet found its right object — God. A love-relationship is threefold: the lover, the beloved, the love; but the love is God. And, therefore, to love another man is to help him to love God, and to be loved is to be helped to love God.

What the world says about love is confusing. When it is said to a youth who is going out into the world, “Love, then you will be loved,” this is quite true — especially if the journey he entered upon were into the eternal, into the land of perfection. But the youth must go out into the world, and therefore it is deceitful to speak thus, without reminding him about laying hold on God in order to learn what love is, and in order to learn that the world, if it had not learned the same lesson from God (alas, for then it would have been the land of perfection the youth entered!), has a completely different conception. If Christ had not been love, and the love in Him the fulfillment of the law, I wonder if He would have been crucified! If He had abated His demand for Himself and had agreed with those who make love anything but the fulfillment of the law, divinely understood; if instead of being the world’s Teacher and Saviour, He had in conformity with the world’s conception, transformed His conception of what it means to love: I wonder if He then would not have been loved and praised by everyone, even idolized (oh, terrible madness!) by His followers. If the apostles had not held fast to the idea that love is the fulfillment of the law, and hence something different from the fulfillment of the human agreements and participation in the human society; if they had not held fast in this same sense to loving men without being willing to accommodate themselves to the world’s conception of what it means to love: I wonder if they would have been persecuted! For what is it the world loves and calls love, what other than indecision and completely earthly union in worldliness, which from the standpoint of eternity, is precisely indecision?

I wonder if any man ever became more notorious for selfishness than the One who really held to the God-requirement, and, faithful to this, loved men, and therefore also continued to love them, although persecuted and misjudged. Is it not also natural that the world should be angry if there is One who is loved more dearly by such a man. One in love to whom such a love exists for men? When one's endeavor is exerted to gain earthly advantage, then one certainly complains unjustly about the world if one complains about not finding friends; for at that price one can be loved enough, gain friends, have many or few with whom — one affectionately associates.

But when a man's endeavor is put forth unconditionally in a total sacrifice, in the sacrifice of everything, impoverished, despised, excluded from the synagogue, in order to unite with God in loving men: then you can, for that matter, advertise in the paper that you are looking for a friend — if only you add the conditions, and hence with special emphasis, "that it is not for the sake of advantage"; you will have trouble in finding anyone. We ourselves marvel that Christ chose such humble men for apostles, but, disregarding what was certainly intentional in the choice, the humbler the apostle was as man, the stronger the impression of that which the divine authority granted to him. I wonder if it is not almost more wonderful that Christ nevertheless got them, hence that He really succeeded in forming a union of eleven, whose purpose was to unite in their readiness to let themselves be scourged, persecuted, mocked, crucified, beheaded, and whose purpose too was not mutually to flatter one another, but, on the contrary, mutually to help one another in humility before God. I wonder if this would not sound like a terrible mockery of what the world understands by love, but I wonder if it might not besides act like a beneficial awakening, if in these times, when so many societies are being formed, someone were to advertise that he planned to establish such a union of love! For that there are a lot of people, if someone wishes to make all sacrifices, who would indolently like to take advantage of his sacrifices, that is something the world can understand; the kind of participation which is for one hundred per cent profit but less than half of that for the work, is common enough in the world. And it goes without saying that there is also true participation to be found here on earth, but where you find it, you will find it hated and persecuted by the world.

Try it. Imagine a man (and you need not even think of him as possessing the perfection which distinguished that glorious One who, repudiated by the race, became the honor of the race), imagine a man who was or became, or was and became, so unhappy that earthly goods and earthly advantage had lost their allurement for him; so unhappy that he, "weary of his groaning," as we read in the Holy Scriptures about the unhappy Sara— "so distressed she wished to hang herself" imagine that then, just in his darkest hour of need, it became quite clear to him that in spite of his unhappiness, which certainly would not be alleviated by gaining the goods of the whole world, since their possession by encouraging happy enjoyment would be to him a painful recollection of his wretchedness, and would really not be augmented by worldly adversity, which, like dark weather for the melancholy, would harmonize with his mood; imagine that it became quite clear to him that the highest even still remained to him in wishing to love men, in wishing to serve the good, in wishing to serve the truth for the sake of truth alone, the only thing which could truly cheer his anxious heart and fill him with an eternal joy of life — imagine such a one in the world, and you will see it will go hard with him. He does not gain the love of the world, he will not be understood or loved by the world. In proportion as men belong a little more or less to the world, some will pity him, some smile at him, some will prefer to get rid of him because they would feel the sting, some will envy him and yet not envy him, some will feel attracted to him but also repelled by him; some will work against him, but yet have everything in readiness to honor him after his death. Some young women will feel themselves fascinated by him, but those only a little older will not completely understand him. But the world would simply and plainly prove his selfishness because he secured no earthly advantage either for himself or others, not for a single other man. The world is not better; the highest it recognizes and loves, when it aims highest, is: to love the good and men, but in such a way that one also secures an earthly advantage for one's self and some others. Anything more the world, even with the best of intentions — now this is of course only playing with words — cannot grasp; one step too far and you have lost the friendship and love of the world. Such is the world and its love. No scientist who tests with a hydrometer the specific gravity of a liquid, can more certainly vouch for how many degrees it registers, than I am willing to vouch for this appraisal of worldly love, which is not entirely evil, as it is sometimes passionately represented to be, or entirely sound, but to a certain degree both good and bad. But from the Christian standpoint this "to a certain degree" is evil.

Nevertheless, we do not say this in order to judge; let us not waste time on it. Reflection only seeks by the aid of thought and by the help of a little knowledge of human nature, to penetrate the illusion, or to understand that apostolic saying with respect to the daily life, where the illusion exactly belongs. Certainly no time is needed in order to be deceived; one can be deceived immediately and continue to be so for a long time; but it takes time to notice that one is deceived. It is certainly easier hastily to imagine what love is, and then satisfy one's self in the imagination; it is far easier hurriedly to get some kinds of men to associate themselves in selfishness, loved and honoured by them to the last: there is after all nothing so easy and nothing so sociable as tins going astray. But if this is your ultimate and highest ambition, to get life made easy and sociable, then never have anything to do with Christianity; flee from it, for it wishes exactly the opposite, wishes to make life difficult for you, and to do it just by making you solitary before God. No earnest man therefore becomes tired of tracking down illusions; for insofar as he is a thinker, he fears most of all being in error — however convenient the arrangement, however pleasant the company might be. And as a Christian, he fears most of all being lost without knowing it — however flattering, however brilliant the environment and the company are.

That such pretentiousness is not love seems so easy to perceive that one might believe that no one would think of supporting it. Still this is not always the case, and here is precisely an example of an illusion insofar as the merely human judgment might be decisive. If the pretentious man himself were to think of calling it love, then one would certainly raise a protest, since there was no illusion; the illusion arises only when others wish to become the object of this pretentiousness, regard it as love, praise it as love, and the pretentious man as kind. Without pretending to be any great judge of human nature, it is not difficult to point out life-relationships where a man can be so placed that there are those who, just to gain his good will, simply praise his love if in the name of love he wishes to demand everything from them. There are indeed men who really know nothing about love other than that it is petting. Such men would like to have the one they love and are fond of, be pretentious. There are men who have inhumanly forgotten that every man ought to develop himself through that divine resemblance common to all men, and that therefore, whether a human being is man or woman, poorly endowed or richly endowed, lord or bond servant, beggar or rich man, the relation between man and man should never and dare never be such that the one adores and the other is adored. This is so easy to perceive that one perhaps thinks that this abomination can originate only from the misuse of superiority, hence in the supercilious.

Alas, it can also arise in the impotent, in the one who himself desires it in order thus to have some significance for the superior.

Take away the equality of eternity and its divine satisfaction, that is, assume that it is forgotten: then the weak woman in her relation to the supercilious man, the man poorly endowed who is yet vain of his relation to the mighty man, the poor man who has but a worldly concern in his relation to the "big man," the very subservient and yet worldly-minded man in his relation to his master — none of them know any other way to express this relationship except by abjectly prostrating themselves. And since they still, because they wish to know nothing higher, know nothing higher, therefore they themselves desire this abomination, desire it passionately. Their desire is to exist for the powerful; as power cannot be secularized, so subserviency becomes the thing desired. Is it perhaps not apparent that a girl would prefer ruthlessly to throw herself away and worship the idolized (desiring only one thing from him, that he would ruthlessly demand everything from her, and under these circumstances she would highly praise his love), rather than to understand that before God all these human differences are a joke, are nonsense, often leading to perdition? And yet the girl would call it selfishness for the adored to try to impart this knowledge to her. Have we not seen that the man weak through forgetting God, the debased man, had but one wish, that he might cast himself in the dust before his lord in order to exist for him; only one desire, that the lord will tread upon him so that he may joyfully praise the gracious love and goodness of his lord! Have we not seen that the vainglorious man, who had quite forgotten God, desired only some relation to the distinguished man and readily called the most debased actions a sign of his love! And if the distinguished man does not desire this, if he wishes to prevent this by helping that man to the blessed equality before God, this is called selfishness. Oh, if the eternal is taken away from a man, or is in him as if it were not present, the eternal which can at once cool the unsound passions in the relation between man and man, but which can also enkindle when the temporal existence would chill; if the eternal is taken away from a man, then there is no assurance that it will not occur to him to call the most abominable practices by the name of love, and even passionately desire to be the object of these abominable practices. One can ruthlessly wish to make himself indispensable through his power, but he can also do this through his weakness, and therefore, cringing and begging, call another man's superciliousness love.

But the demand of eternity will not excuse a man from fulfilling the law of God, even if the whole world were to excuse him, even if the whole world were to love his pretentiousness but misunderstand his love, because perhaps only through despair can the despairing learn to hold themselves to God, instead of through their importunities injuring their own souls. The demand of eternity will prevent love from lingering in any self-deception, and from being satisfied with any illusion; and it will be no excuse to say that the men themselves wished it, that they themselves called it love, and believed that being loved consisted in being the object of such pretentiousness. It is God who has implanted love in man, and it is God who must decide what in every case is love.

But then when your friend, your beloved, your loved ones, your contemporaries, notice that you wish to learn from God what it means to love, instead of learning it from them, then they will perhaps say to you: "Spare yourself; give up this overstraining; why will you make your life so hard? Lessen your demands; then we shall live a beautiful, a rich, a significant life in friendship and joy." And if you give way to the suggestions of that false friendship, then you will be loved, be praised for your love. But if you will not do it, if you will not in loving be a traitor to God or to yourself or to the others, then you may find yourself being called selfish. For your conviction that to love yourself is in truth to love God, that loving another man is helping him to love God, this, your conviction, your friend will perhaps not trouble about. He notices indeed that your life, if it truly conforms to the God-demand, contains, even if you say nothing, a reminder, a demand upon him — this he will have nothing to do with. Your reward is, therefore, the sacrifice of your friendship and your reputation for being a friend.

In the world the worldly has, so much the worse, the upper hand to the dee that when one talks about false friendship, one immediately thinks of some deception with respect to worldly advantages, or a faithlessness regarding earthly goods. And this was certainly not your friend's intention or meaning. He only wished to defraud you of the God-relationship, and that you as his friend would be helpful to him in deceiving himself: then in the deception he would loyally unite with you for life and death. We speak about the duplicity of the world, and in so doing at once suggest that it deceives one with respect to earthly goods, disappoints one's great expectations, mocks one's bold plans. But, if in this respect it honestly fulfils its obligations almost more abundantly than it had promised, that this is just the time when it can deceive most dangerously, that this its most dangerous duplicity, one more rarely thinks about: that the world through its — sincere friendship (for false friendship would consist in its defrauding one of the temporal things), wishes to teach one to forget God. They talk about making a covenant with evil, and if one asks what advantage is offered as compensation, then people will mention power, glory, honor, the satisfaction of desires and so on. But that one can by such a covenant also win the love of men, be praised for one's love, that is something they forget to speak about and to think about. Nevertheless, this is the case — for the converse is and would indeed be the case, that they who in love to God loved men, would be hated by the world. As the world by offering power and might has wished to tempt a man to forget God, and then has treated the same man as refuse because he endured its temptation: so has the world also temptingly offered a man its friendship, and then hated him because he would not be its friend. The eternal, the God-demand for love, the world will not readily hear anything about, even more reluctantly will it see it expressed in life. But I wonder if the world therefore says about itself that it is selfish. By no means. And then what does the world do? The world says about the one who insists on maintaining his relation to God, that he is selfish. The way out is old: sacrifice one, if all the others can profit thereby.

In this God and the world agree, that love is the fulfilling of the law; the difference is that the world understands by law something it hit on itself; and he who agrees to this and observes it faithfully, he is kind. How many a man has not a maiden's love, from the divine standpoint, destroyed, just because he, defrauded of his God-relationship, remained too true to her, while she in turn was unlimited in her eulogies over his love! How many a man has not been corrupted by family and friends, while yet his corruption did not appear to be so, for now he was loved and praised for his love — by his family and friends? How many a man has not an age corrupted, the age which for compensation adored his affectionate disposition because it made him forget the God-relationship, and transformed it into something one can vociferously make a show of, rejoice over and effeminately admire without being consciously reminded of anything higher? For, in order to raise another and truly earnest question, and also in order not even to point at the highest pattern but to be content with a humbler one, which yet in the so-called Christendom unfortunately is adequate enough: why, I wonder, did that simple wise man of antiquity when, accused before the court of frivolity by the worldly and selfish, he was condemned to death, defend his life; why, I wonder, did he compare himself to a "gadfly" at the same time he called himself a divine gift; and why, I wonder, did he love the young so much? Was not the first because, as a pagan could, he had loved men in some higher sense, hence because he had really awakened, and had not in any way allowed himself to be seduced by the temporal existence, or by anything human; not by a dull or fiery union in love, in friendship, in agreement with others or with an age, but he had preferred to be the selfish, the teasingly annoying man whom no one loved! Was not the latter because he perceived that the young still had the susceptibility to the divine which is so easily lost with the years in business, in love and friendship, in submission to a merely human judgment and to the demands of the times? Hence, because through his concept of the eternal and through "something divine," he had prevented his love for men from halting in self-deception and illusion; hence, because through keeping himself close to the demand, he had made himself a demand on men.

If, therefore, in some way, even if in human frailty, you aspire to fulfil the apostolic saying that "Love is the fulfillment of the law," then give heed to men! Does this mean that you would be loved by them? Oh, how absurd! How then could your love become the fulfillment of the law? But give heed that it does not become more important to you that you should be esteemed for loving them than that you do love them! Take care that being loved is not more important to you than the fact of loving each other! Take care that you do not deprive yourself of the highest, because you cannot bear to be called selfish! Do not appeal to men's opinions of you in order to prove your love; for the opinion of men has validity only insofar as it harmonizes with God's demand; otherwise men are only your accomplices! Learn also, and never forget the lesson, this sad truth of the earthly life, that no love between man and man ever can or will be perfectly happy, will ever dare to be perfectly confident! For, divinely understood, even the happiest love between man and man has still one danger which the merely human understanding of love does not consider, the danger that the earthly love might become too intense, so that the God-relationship would be interfered with; the danger that the God-relationship, when humanly speaking there is nothing but peace and no danger even in sight, may exact even this, the happiest love, as a sacrifice. And from this possibility of danger it follows that even in the happiest love-relationship, you must always anxiously watch, although this concern is not the fear that you might grow tired of the beloved or the beloved of you, but lest you should both forget God, or that the beloved might do so, or you yourself. And from the possibility of this danger it follows, recalling the introduction to these reflections, how difficult it may be in the Christian sense, to promise love, when the fact of keeping the promise may signify that you will come to be hated by the beloved. Only God, who, as we have explained, is also the only true object of love, is always happy, always blessed in loving; you must not watch in concern, but watch only in adoration.

Love is the fulfillment of the law. But the law consists of an inexhaustible multitude of provisions. How then could we be prepared to speak about them? So let us then assemble the multitude of decisions. The demand of the law must therefore be twofold, partly a demand for inwardness, and partly a demand for continuity.

What then is the required inwardness? The merely human understanding of love also requires inwardness, devotion, sacrifice, but it defines these only humanly. The devotion of inwardness is: that every sacrifice should satisfy the conception of the beloved (the object of love) as to what love is, or, on its own responsibility, venture to decide what love is. But divinely understood, inwardness believes that loving one’s self is loving God, and that truly loving another man is being helpful to him for or in loving God. Hence inwardness is not here determined merely by the love-relationship, but by the God-relationship. The inwardness demanded is then the inwardness of self-abnegation, which is more closely defined, not according to the understanding of the beloved (the object of affection) about love, but with regard to helping the beloved to love God. It follows as a matter of course that the love-relationship may, as such, be the sacrifice which is demanded.

The inwardness of love must be sacrificial, and consequently must not demand any reward. The purely human understanding of love teaches also that love demands no reward — except that it wishes to be loved, as if that which constitutes the entire relationship, yet not within the category of the relation between man and man, were no reward. But. the inwardness of Christian love is willing, as the reward of its love, to be hated by the beloved (the object of affection). This proves that this inwardness is a pure God-relationship; it has no reward, not even the reward of being loved: thus it belongs absolutely to God, or absolutely to man in God. The self-abnegation, the self-control, the self-sacrifice, which are still but media of exchange within the temporal, within the human horizon, are not truly Christian; they are as a jest in comparison with the Christian earnestness; they are like the first start toward a Christian decision. One will sacrifice this or that or everything, but one still hopes that this sacrifice will be understood and have sense and meaning for men, who then must recognize and rejoice at one's sacrifices. One is willing to forsake everything, but still one does not think that along with that his sacrifice should be forgotten in the conversation and understanding of men.

The promptings of the sacrifice then become apparent; it pretends to abandon the world, but it still remains within the world. We by no means wish to disparage this. Oh, even this merely human sacrifice is perhaps met with seldom enough. But from the Christian standpoint, we must say that it remains standing at the halfway mark. It ascends to a high place, for, humanly speaking, the sacrifice stands high; it throws everything away in order to ascend to this exalted place, whose elevation admiration discovers, while the sacrifice perceives that it is seen. But to stand upon this exalted place (for truly, sacrifice is elevation) accused, despised, hated, ridiculed almost worse than the most debased among the base; hence superhumanly taxed in attaining the lofty place, to stand there in such a way that it seems to everyone as if one stood at the lowest level of the contemptible: from the Christian standpoint this is sacrifice, and from the human point of view it is also madness. Only One sees the true connection, and He does not admire; for God in heaven does not admire any man.

On the contrary, while true sacrifice has but one single place of resort: God, so he is as if once more forsaken by God, for he understands that before God he is simply without merit. But humanly he also understands that had he but sacrificed a half of what he did sacrifice, then men would have understood him, loved and admired him, and yet, in a certain sense, that before God this partial sacrifice would have the same significance as the true sacrifice, for before God no sacrifice, not one, has merit. This is sacrifice according to the Christian standpoint, and also, humanly understood, it is madness. This is loving from the Christian standpoint; if it is true that loving is the highest happiness, this is indeed the hardest suffering — if then the holding of one's self to God were not the highest bliss!

The other requirement of the law is for the continuation of love for the duration of time. The merely human conception of love also demands this; still from the Christian standpoint it is a different demand, since the inwardness demanded is different. The demand for the continuation in time means that the same inwardness of love shall be preserved throughout the duration of time, which insofar is in a certain sense a new expression for inwardness. As soon as you think that you have done enough in your love, or have loved long enough, and now may ask something from the other, then through that you discover that your love is prepared to become a demand, as if, however devoted and sacrificing your love is, there were still a limit where it must at bottom appear to be a demand — but love is the fulfillment of the law. For it is not some great moment of self-abnegation that we are speaking about; the law demands the same inwardness for the duration of time. The duration of time! But is not this, as it were, to do violence to one's soul, and a self-contradiction in the demand, at the same time to demand continuation in such different directions, in the direction of length and in the direction of depth? Lo, the arrow flies swiftly forward through the air, but if at the same time it ought to bore itself down into the earth and still continue to fly with the speed of an arrow: ah, what a demand! Lo, in the great moment of enthusiasm, then the eternal tarries, but then when time begins its restless activity, when it continues to pass — then not to go enthusiastically with time, but to go hurriedly with the haste of time, and yet slowly with the lingering of eternity! To lie on one's deathbed (and when a man in self-renunciation has been obliged to make the heaviest sacrifice: and for a reward of his love is hated by its object, then he is like the one who lies at the point of death), and then to have a future, a long life before one, although everything is past, hence, at once and at any moment, lying on his deathbed to have to stand erect and go forward: what a demand! To lie down is exactly the opposite of walking upright, but to lie upon one's deathbed is certainly the most decisive expression for lying down, and hence the farthest possible removed from standing erect. Have you ever seen a weary traveler bearing a heavy burden, fighting at every step in order not to sink to earth? He holds himself erect only with the greatest difficulty, he struggles in order not to sink down. But to have sunk down, to lie down, to lie upon his deathbed, and then to hasten confidently forward with the stride of the erect: wonderful! And the demand may require this, and also require its continuance for the duration of time.

Alas! in the world of the spirit there is something fraudulent, for which there is nothing analogous found in the external world. We say for instance that a child must learn to spell before it can learn to read. Fortunately or unfortunately, this is undoubtedly a necessity. It has never happened to any child that through a phenomenon, an illusion, it had occasion to imagine that it could already read long before it could spell. But in the spiritual relation, how seductive! For here does not everything begin with the great moment of the resolve, of the purpose, of the promise — where one reads as fluently as the most accomplished reader, the one best trained in reading by book? And so, if the next comes first, what is the use of the very petty things, the plainly commonplace things, which simply do not make any strong impression, or wish to help one by the daring context? Alas! on the contrary, it is like the spelling which tears the words apart into letters, so that there are long, long hours when one cannot arrive at the meaning, and vainly waits to see the connection. To strive with one's self in self-abnegation, especially if one must conquer, is regarded as the most difficult struggle; and to strive with time, if one would completely conquer, is regarded as an impossibility.

The heaviest burden laid upon a man (for he has laid, the burden of sin upon himself) is in a certain sense, time — do we not say, too, that it can be deadly long! And yet, on the other hand, how gentle, how soothing, how seductive a power time has! But this alleviation, this seductiveness, is a new danger. If a man became guilty of something — let but a little time pass, especially if he seems to have made some progress toward betterment: how much more trivial his guilt appears! But is this really so? Is it then also true that if the next moment the thoughtless has forgotten his own guilt, it is then forgotten?

Tell me then if it is possible to speak about this saying, that love is the fulfillment of the law, without judging against one's will, if one's will is merely to judge one's self! Is there any more precise way of expressing how infinitely far a man is from fulfilling the law than this, that the distance is so great that he really cannot even compute it, cannot make up his reckoning! For not only is so much neglected daily, not to speak about what is deserved, but then when some time has passed, one is not even able to state the debt exactly, as it appeared to one's self, because time changes and softens one's judgment about the past — alas! but time never changes the demand, eternity's demand: that love is the fulfillment of the law.

B. LOVE IS A MATTER OF CONSCIENCE

Now the end of the commandment is love out of a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned. — I Timothy 1:5

IF IN A SINGLE WORD we wished to point out and indicate the victory Christianity has won over the world, or even more correctly, the victory whereby it has more than overcome the world (since Christianity has never wished to conquer in the worldly sense), that infinite change at which Christianity aims, whereby everything has in truth remained as it was and yet in an infinite sense has become new (for Christianity has never been the friend of neo-mongering) — then I know no briefer or more decisive expression than this: it has made every human relationship between men into a matter of conscience. Christianity has not wished to tumble governments from the throne in order to set itself in their place; it has never in an external sense striven for a place in the world of which it is not a part (for even if it finds a place in the heart's room, it still has no place in the world), and yet it has infinitely changed everything which it permitted and does permit to continue.

As the blood pulses in every nerve, so Christianity in the conscience-relation wishes to penetrate everything. The change is not in the external, not in the obvious, and yet the change is infinite. As if a man instead of having blood in his veins had that divine elixir of which paganism dreamed, so Christianity wishes to inspire the everlasting life, the divine in the human race. That is why someone has said that the Christians were a people of priests, and that is why, when we consider the conscience-relation, we might say that the Christians are a people of kings. For take the humblest, the most downtrodden servant, imagine what we call a really simple, poor, wretched charwoman who makes her living by the humblest kind of labor: she has, from the Christian standpoint, the right, moreover we urgently beseech her in the name of Christianity to exercise it, she has the right while she is carrying on her work, to speak with herself and with God, which in no way retards her work; she has the right to say: "I do this work for a daily wage, but that I do it as carefully as I do, that I do — for conscience's sake!" Ah, from the worldly point of view there is only one man, only one, who recognizes no other obligation than that of conscience: that is the king. And yet that poor woman, from the Christian viewpoint, has the royal right to say to herself before God: 'I do it for conscience's sake!" If the woman is dissatisfied because no man will listen to this speech, then it merely proves that she is not Christ-minded. Otherwise, it seems to me that it would still be enough that God has permitted me to speak thus with Him — covetously to desire freedom of speech in this respect would be a great folly on my part. For there are certain things, and among them particularly the mysteries of inwardness, which lose through being made public, and which are quite lost when the publicity has become the thing of supreme importance to one; moreover there are mysteries which under such circumstances are not merely lost, but straightway become altogether meaningless. Christianity's divine intention is to say in confidence to every man; "Do not worry about the changing forms of the world or about your condition, as if in order to become an example, instead of being a poor workingwoman, you had to be called 'My Lady.' Oh, no, dedicate yourself to the Christian way, and then it will show you a point outside the world; by the aid of this point you will be able to move both heaven and earth, moreover, you will accomplish the even greater miracle, you will move heaven and earth so quietly, so easily, that no one notices it."

This is the miracle of Christianity, more wonderful than that one of changing the water into wine; this miracle in all stillness, without any change of rulers, moreover without a hand being moved, of making every man, divinely understood, into a king, so easily, so smoothly, so miraculously, that the world in a certain sense does not need to know it. For in the world outside, there the king will and ought to be the only one who rules according to his conscience; but to obey — for conscience's sake will be permitted everyone; moreover, no one, no one can prevent it. And there within, there far within, where the Christian dwells in the conscience-relation, there is everything changed.

Lo, the world raises a tumult just to bring about a little change; it sets heaven and earth in motion for nothing, like the mountain which brought forth a mouse; Christianity in all stillness brings about the change of the infinite as if it were nothing. It is so quiet, quiet as nothing worldly can be; as quiet as only the dead and inwardness can be; and what else is Christianity but inwardness!

Thus Christianity transforms every relation between men into a conscience-relationship, and thus also into a love-relationship. It is this we now wish to contemplate, that, according to the Christian understand love is a matter of conscience.

In the apostolic words we read, there are evidently contained two premises. First, "The end of the commandment is love." In the preceding deliberation we developed this when we associated the deliberation with another expression, that "Love is the fulfillment of the law." But next there follows in our text; if love is to be the end of the commandment, then it must be from a pure heart, and of a good conscience, and of an unfeigned faith. Nevertheless, we prefer to focus our attention on the one provision, that love is a matter of conscience, in which the other two are essentially contained, and to which they essentially refer.

That a certain kind of Christian love is made a matter of conscience is familiar to everyone. We speak about marriage. Before the minister unites the two in die wedlock which has been their hearts' choice, about which, however, he does not ask them; he asks them first, each one individually: "Have you consulted with God and with your conscience?" Hence the minister refers the love to conscience, as he speaks in a manner strange to them, without using the familiar "thou"; he lays upon the hearts of the two, each one in particular, that it is a matter of conscience; he makes an affair of the heart into a matter of conscience. More clearly and definitely this cannot be expressed, and yet there is still an expression for the same consideration in the form of a question, or in that which each one is specially asked. To ask — the individual is the more general expression for the conscience-relation, and therefore it is also Christianity's essential consideration of the human race, first and foremost to consider all these countless numbers each for himself, each especially as the individual.

Consequently, the minister asks the two, each severally, whether he has consulted with God and his conscience. This is the infinite change which in Christianity takes place in all love. It is, like all Christian transformations, so gentle, so secret — because it belongs only to the inwardness of the hidden man, to the incorruptible essence of a soul at peace. What abominations has not the world seen in the relation between man and woman, so that she, almost an animal, was a contemptible being in comparison with the man, a being as of another kind; what a battle there has been to give woman equal rights with man in worldly matters: but Christianity brings about only the change of the infinite, and therefore in all stillness. The external remains in a manner the old; for the man must be the woman's lord, she submissive to him. But in inwardness everything is changed, transformed by the aid of this little question to the woman, as to whether she has consulted with her conscience, so that she will have this man — for lord, for otherwise she does not get him. Still the question of conscience about the matter of conscience makes her in inwardness before God absolutely equal with the man. What Christ said of His kingdom, that it was not of this world, applies to all things Christian. Like a higher order of things, it will everywhere be present, but not apprehended. As a friendly spirit everywhere surrounds those dear to it, follows their every footstep, but may not be pointed out: so will the Christian spirit be a stranger in life because it belongs to another world, a stranger in the world because it belongs to the inner man. Foolish men have foolishly busied themselves in the name of Christianity to make it evident to the world that woman should be installed in equal rights with man: Christianity has never asked or desired this. It has done everything for women, if she will in a Christian spirit be satisfied with the Christian; if she does not wish this, then she gains only a moderate compensation, for what she loses in trifling externals she can in a worldly sense gain by threats.

So with marriage. But because Christianity through marriage has made earthly love into a matter of conscience, it still does not seem to follow that on the whole it has made love into a matter of conscience. However, there are some who are of a different opinion, in error concerning the Christian teaching. Christianity has not made earthly love, with rare exceptions, into a matter of conscience, but because it has made all love into a matter of conscience, earthly love has also been included. And besides, if any kind of love would be difficult to transform into a matter of conscience, then surely earthly love which is based on impulse and inclination. For impulse and inclination seem to be alone sufficient for the decision of the question of whether love is present or not, and insofar seem to object as strongly to the Christian as the Christian does to them. If, namely, two human beings love each other, something they themselves must know best, and there is otherwise nothing to prevent their union, then why raise difficulties, as Christianity nevertheless does, by saying: “No, they must first answer the question as to whether they have consulted with God and their conscience”? Christianity never cares to make external changes, it never wishes to abolish impulse and inclinations; it wishes only to make an infinite change in the inner man.

And the change of infinity (which is the inwardness of the secret man, which has its direction inward toward the God-relationship, and so is different from the inwardness that is directed outward) Christianity wishes everywhere to bring about; therefore it wishes also to transform all love into a matter of conscience. Therefore it is a wrong conception of Christian love that thinks it is an individual kind of love which, as a rare exception, is made a matter of conscience. After all, one cannot make any individual thing into a matter of conscience; either one must make everything so, as Christianity does, or else nothing at all. Conscience has the inward power of expansiveness, like the omnipresence of God: one cannot restrict it to a single place and say that God is omnipresent in that single place, for that is simply denying His omnipresence. And in the same way to restrict the conscience-relation to something in particular is really to deny the conscience-relation.

If we were to consider a starting point for the teaching of Christianity about love (although it is impossible to fix a starting point in a circular motion), then we cannot say that Christianity begins by making earthly love a matter of conscience, as if this matter had primarily attracted the attention of scholars, who have something quite different to think about than getting people married. No, Christianity began with fundamentals, and therefore with spiritual teaching about what love is. In order to determine what love is, the teaching begins either with God or with the neighbor, which is the essential Christian teaching, since in order in love to find one's neighbor one must start from God, and in the love for the neighbor must find God. Starting from this fundamental principle Christianity now seizes upon every expression of love, and is zealous for itself. We can therefore just as well say that it is the teaching about man's God-relationship which has made earthly love into a matter of conscience, as to say that it is the teaching about love to one's neighbor. Both statements are equally the Christian protest against the wilfulness of impulse and affection. Because man primarily belongs to God before he belongs to any other relationship, he must first be asked whether he has taken counsel with God and with his conscience. Likewise with the woman. And because man, even in relation to the beloved woman, is primarily her neighbor and she is primarily his neighbor, therefore both he and she must be asked severally whether they have consulted with their consciences. In the Christian understanding there is an equality between all men before God, and in the teaching about loving one's neighbor there is equality of all men before God. One perhaps believes that love for a neighbor is something like a castoff earthly love; alas, love for one's neighbor is the last and the highest love, and must therefore be assured a place before the first and highest moment of the lovers themselves.

This is the Christian love. The idea on the contrary, that we should first busy ourselves in finding the beloved, so that in loving the beloved we shall first love the neighbor, is very far from being Christian love. To impulse and inclination this is certainly a strangely chilling preposterousness; but still it is the Christian idea and not more chilling than the spirit is with respect to the sensual or the sensual-psychical, while for the rest it is simply a spiritual attribute to be burning without blazing. Primarily your wife must be your neighbor, the fact that she is your wife is then a closer definition of your special relation to each other. But that which is the foundation of the eternal must also lie at the bottom of every expression of the special.

If this were not so, then how could one find a place for teaching about love for one's neighbor? — and yet one quite commonly does forget it. One speaks heathenishly, without really even noticing it, about earthly love and friendship, arranges his own life in this respect as if he were a heathen, and then one adds a little of the Christian teaching about loving one's neighbor, that is, some other men. But he who does not take care to see that his wife is his neighbor before she is his wife, will never come to love his neighbor, no matter how many men he loves; he has made his wife an exception. This exception he will now either love too ardently his whole life through, or he will at first love her too ardently and then too coldly. For certainly a wife is loved differently from the friend, and the friend differently from the neighbor, but this is not an essential difference, for the fundamental likeness lies in the category "neighbor." It is with "neighbor" as with the category "human." Every one of us is human, and is thus again the difference he especially is; but the fact of being "human" is the category. No one must look too long at the difference, so that, cowardly or arrogantly, he forgets that he is human; no man through his special dissimilarity is an exception to the fact of being human, but he is first human and then he is the specially different. So Christianity has nothing against the husband loving his wife specially, but he must never love her so specially that she is excluded from being his neighbor, which every human being is; for then he disturbs the Christian category: then his wife is not his neighbor, and therefore the rest of men are not his neighbors. If there were a single living man who by his dissimilarity was excluded from being human, then would the concept "human" be confused: the exception is not human, and neither are the other men human.

One talks about a man loving his own wife conscientiously, or his friend, or his nearest kin; but one often speaks in such a way that what he says involves a great error. Christianity teaches that you shall love every human being, therefore also your wife and your friend, conscientiously; it is a matter of conscience. When, on the contrary, one speaks about loving his wife or his friend conscientiously, then one generally means in the discriminatory sense, or, what amounts to the same thing in the sense of the context, in loving them so preferentially that one has nothing at all to do with other men. But this kind of conscientiousness is from the Christian viewpoint, unconscientiousness. We see too that it is the wife or the friend who will consequently determine whether the love manifested is conscientious. Herein lies the falsity, for it is God who by Himself and by the help of the middle term, "neighbor," looks to see whether the love for wife or friend is conscientious love. Only then is your love a matter of conscience; but still this is clear, that one can only be truly conscientious in a matter that involves the conscience, for otherwise one might speak of being conscientious in receiving stolen goods. Love must first be determined to be a matter of conscience before there can be anything said about loving conscientiously. But love is not defined as a matter of conscience until either God or the neighbor is the middle term, hence, not in earthly love and friendship as such. But if the love in the earthly love and friendship, as such, is not defined as a matter of conscience, then is the so-called conscientiousness precisely increasingly doubtful, the more firmly established the connection is.

Christian love must not be regarded as a more precise definition of what in paganism and elsewhere has been called love, but as a fundamental change. Christianity has not come into the world in order to teach you some change or other as to how you shall specially love your wife or your friend, but in order to teach you how in common humanity you shall love all men.

And it is also this change which in a Christian way changes earthly love and friendship.

One sometimes hears it said that to ask one about his earthly love is an indiscreet question. But frequently this is not understood quite correctly. The reason it is an indiscreet question is because a man in his earthly love primarily belongs to God. Therefore no one is angry when the priest asks this, for he asks it in the name of God. But this is usually not considered; on the contrary, they only suggest that love is such a personal matter that any third person is an irrelevance, any third person — even God, which from the Christian standpoint is a lack of conscience. Still it is an indiscreet question, altogether inconceivable regarding a matter in which a man does not have a God-relationship; for a God-relationship simply means having a conscience. Therefore a man could not have anything upon his conscience if God did not exist, for the relationship between the individual and God, the God-relationship, is the conscience, and that is why it is so terrible to have even the least thing upon one's conscience, because one is immediately conscious of the infinite weight of God.

Love is a matter of conscience, and hence is not a matter of impulse and inclination; nor is it a matter of emotion, nor a matter for intellectual calculation.

Worldly or merely human reflection is familiar with many kinds of love, and is well-informed about every individual difference, and how the individual differences mutually differ from each other; worldly reflection absorbs itself in the difference of the differences, loses itself — that is, if it is ever possible to lose one's self in superficiality. In Christianity the converse is the case. It really knows only one kind of love, spiritual love, and it does not pay much attention to elaborating on the different ways in which this fundamentally common love may manifest itself. All the distinctions between the different kinds of love are essentially swept away in the Christian love.

The merely human consideration interprets love either merely as purely immediate love, as impulse, inclination (earthly love), as affection (friendship), as emotion and affection with one or another discriminating additions of duty, natural relations, custom and so on, or as something which is to be aimed at and acquired, because the reason perceives that being loved and favored is an earthly good, just as having men one loves and favors is an earthly good. All this Christianity is not really concerned with, either with the immediate kind of love, or with the convenient kind. Christianity allows all this to have validity, to have its own significance in external matters; but at the same time it wishes through its teaching about love, which is not calculated on convenience, to let the transformation of the infinite take place inwardly.

There is something wonderful, and perhaps for many something strange, something incomprehensible, in the fact that the eternal Christian power is so indifferent to recognition in externals, something wonderful in the fact that this is precisely earnestness, that the inwardness just for the sake of earnestness thus plays ‘stranger’ in worldliness. There have therefore been times in the course of Christianity when people have believed that it was necessary to betray the secret, and thereby secure Christianity a worldly expression in worldliness. So someone wished to abolish marriage and lived no doubt — hidden in the cloister. Nevertheless, the secret of inwardness, or the inwardness of the hidden man who “holds the mystery of faith,” is a far more certain hiding place. The concealment of the cloister in the solitude of the forest, or remote on the inaccessible mountain top, and the hiding place of the quiet dweller in the cloister, were therefore childishness compared with the true Christian inwardness, a childishness like that of a child who hides itself — so that someone shall come and find it. The cloister’s hidden occupant informed the world that he had hidden himself, that is, from the Christian point of view he had not seriously hidden himself, but he was playing hide-and-seek. By a similar misunderstanding of the Christian teaching, by a similar childishness, people then believed that it was Christian to betray the mystery, worldly to express the Christian indifference to friendship, to family relations, to patriotism — which nevertheless is untrue, for Christianity is not indifferent to anything secular, on the contrary, it is solely spiritually concerned for everything.

Still to express indifference in such a way that one is eager that those concerned should get to know about it, is not exactly to be indifferent. Such an indifference is as when one man goes to another and says: “I don’t care about you.” Whereupon the other replies: “Then why do you take the trouble to tell me so?” That, too, would be childishness, it would be a childish way of being conscious of the Christian teaching. But Christianity is too earnest to notice this. Externally it does not wish to bring about any change at all in the external; it wishes to understand the external, to purify it, to consecrate it, and so make everything new, while everything remains old. The Christian may freely marry, freely love his wife, especially as he ought to love her, freely have friends and love his fatherland; but nevertheless there ought to be in all this a basic understanding between himself and God in the Christian sense, and this is Christianity. For God is not like a man; it is not important to God to inspect the matter, to see for Himself whether His cause triumphs or not; He sees in secret just as well. And it is far from necessary for you to help God to learn that it is He who must help you to learn whether you are weaned from the worldliness which wishes a demonstration. Had Christ felt any need of a demonstration, then would He indeed have acted. He would have summoned the twelve legions of angels. This He simply did not want; on the contrary, He rebuked the disciples who wished to act in the matter because they did not know what manner of spirit they were when they wished for a decision in the external. Christianity simply does not wish a decision in external matters (except insofar as it wishes to establish one or another symbol, which is to worldliness a sign of offense, as, for example, the sacraments); it wishes, on the contrary, in the absence of this, to test the faith of the individual, to prove whether the individual will hold and be content with the mystery of faith. The secular always presses for a decision in externals; distrustful, it does not believe that otherwise there is a decision. But the cause of this distrust is precisely the temptation in which faith must be tested. From the worldly point of view, would it not be a far more certain way to decide, and to make it absolutely certain that God exists, to have an image of Him set up — so that one might then see that He existed? or that a false god existed, which yet does not exist?

Would it not have given a far greater assurance to worldliness if Christ in an external manner, perhaps by showy processions, had tried to prove who He was, instead of assuming the humble form of a servant, yet always inconspicuously, so that He looked exactly like any other man, and from the worldly point of view utterly failed in His task? But this is just the temptation by which faith is tested. And so, too, as touching the Christian interpretation of love. Worldly misunderstanding is insistent to have it expressed in an outward way that Christian love is spiritual love — alas, but this cannot be expressed outwardly in any externality, for spiritual love is precisely inwardness. But this is an offense to worldliness, like everything Christian, and therefore, as it were, the opposite, so that Christianity makes one arbitrarily external symbol the sole decision in the external, like the water in baptism. The world is always dead against; where Christianity wishes to have inwardness, there will secular Christendom have the external; and where Christianity wishes to have the external, there secular Christendom will have inwardness, which may be explained by the fact that where the Christian is, offense stands at his side.

Nevertheless, Christianity knows only one kind of love: spiritual love; but this can lie at the bottom of and be present in every other expression of love. How strange! For this, the Christian thought of life, has something in common with the thought of death. Imagine a man who wished to gather together all his impressions of the discriminations of life, as between men, which he had seen, and then, when he had reckoned these up, would say, "I see all these different men, but I do not see the man." It is the same with Christian love in relation to the different kinds of love; it is in them all, that is to say, it may be, but the Christian love itself you cannot point out. You know earthly love by the fact that a woman is the beloved, friendship by the friend, love for the fatherland by the object; but the Christian love you cannot even know by the fact that it loves its enemy, for this manifestation of love may also be a secret form of resentment, as if someone did it for the sake of heaping coals of fire on his head. Nor can you know it by the fact that it hates the beloved, for it is really impossible for you to see this, if you are not the one concerned, and you are in the secret with God. From God's side, what confidence, in a certain sense, in a man, and what earnestness! We men, we take care to have certain and infallible signs by which love is known. But God and Christianity have no distinguishing marks — is this not having great, moreover all possible confidence in men! When we in regard to some man waive the sign by which his love is known, then we say that we show unbounded confidence in him, that we will believe in him in spite of all appearances. But why do you think that God shows such confidence? Is it not because He sees in secret? How earnest!

But you never see, nor has any man ever seen, the Christian love, just as no one has ever seen the "human." Nevertheless, "human" is the essential category, and Christian love is the essential love, as, from the Christian viewpoint, there is only one kind of love. For, to repeat, Christianity has not changed anything in what men had formerly learned about loving the beloved, the friend, and so on; it has neither added a little to it, nor taken anything away, but it has transformed everything, has transformed all love. And only to the degree that this fundamental change is followed by a change of inwardness in love and friendship, only insofar has it changed those. And it has done this by making all love a matter of conscience, which with respect to earthly love and friendship, and so on, can just as well indicate a cooling of the passions as it indicates the inwardness of eternal life.

Love is a matter of conscience, and must therefore be of a pure heart and of an unfeigned faith.

"A pure heart." Generally we mention provisionally that a free heart is required for love or in order to give itself up in love. This heart must not belong to anyone or anything else; moreover, even the hand which gives it away must be free; for it must not be the hand which takes the heart by force and gives it away, but on the contrary, it must be the heart which gives away the hand. And this heart, free as it is, will then find complete freedom in giving itself away — not the bird you release from your hand, not the arrow released from the bowstring, not the branch which has been bent, when it recovers its direction, nothing, nothing is as free as the free heart when it freely gives itself. For the bird is still free only because you release it, and the arrow speeds forth only because it leaves the bowstring, and the branch again grows erect because the restraint ceases; but the free heart does not become free by the cessation of resistance; it was free, it had its freedom — and yet it found its freedom. Beautiful thought, blessed freedom, which finds what it has! However I talk almost like a poet, which may also be permissible if the main point be not forgotten, if it is done precisely to illuminate this — for this is why we endeavor to speak ingratiatingly, if possible, about what it generally pleases men to hear, precisely so that it may not tempt anyone, as if it were lack of sense or ability to speak about this, which held us back from speaking about it, or from speaking exclusively of it as of the highest, forgetting the principal thing: the Christian freedom.

A pure heart is not in this sense a free heart, or it is the free heart which does not here come under consideration; for a pure heart is first and last a bound heart. Therefore it is not as pleasant to speak about it as it is to speak about the blessed self-esteem of freedom, and the blessed pleasure of the self-esteem in the boldness of renunciation. A bound heart, moreover in the most profound sense a bound heart — no ship which lies at anchor is so bound as that heart must be which will be pure — this heart must be bound to God. And no king who bound himself by the harshest charter, and no man who bound himself by the most rigorous pledge, and no day-laborer who bound himself for every day, and no private tutor who bound himself for every hour, is so bound. For everyone thus bound can still say how far he is bound, but the heart must be bound inimitably to God, if it will be pure. And no power can bind like this; for the king can die and escape his charter, and the lord can die so the pledge of the day-laborer ceases, and the time of instruction can pass — but God does not die, and the bond which binds to Him is never broken.

Thus must the heart be bound. You who burn with the desire for earthly love, or with the craving for friendship, remember that what you say about freedom has never been denied by Christianity; but yet there must first be this infinite bond, if the heart of the beloved and your own will be pure! Consequently, first the infinite binding, and then the talk about freedom may begin. There is a strange word which is much used in philosophy, but even more in ordinary business; it is heard so often in the streets and alleys, in business circles and in the mouths of businessmen: it is the word

“priority”; for philosophy talks much about God’s priority, and businessmen talk about priorities. So let us use this strange word to express the thought so that it will most certainly make the right impression; let us say: Christianity teaches that God has the first priority. Philosophy does not speak quite this way about God’s priority; it would rather forget what businessmen know about priorities, that a priority is a claim. God has the first priority, and everything which a man owns, is pledged as a security for this claim. If you remember this, then for the rest you may talk as much as you please about the pleasure of freedom. Oh, but if you really remember this, then this pleasure will not tempt you.

The free heart has no consideration for anything; heedless, it plunges into the pleasure of renunciation; but the heart infinitely bound to God has an infinite consideration; and not even the one who every moment must use the most manifold consideration is so bound by consideration as the heart which is infinitely bound to God. Wherever it is, in solitude by itself, or filled with the thought of others or with others, whatever an infinitely bound heart otherwise occupies itself with, it is always considerate. You who speak so beautifully about how much the beloved means to you, or you to the beloved, remember that this consideration must first be in your soul as in the beloved’s, if a pure heart will be given away in love! This consideration must be the first and the last; from this consideration there can be no separation without guilt and sin.

The free heart has no history; when it renounced itself it acquired no history of its love, happy or unhappy. But the heart infinitely bound to God has a preceding history, and therefore it understands that earthly love and friendship are but an interlude, a contribution to this, the sole history of love, the first and the last. You who know how to speak so beautifully about earthly love and friendship, if you understood that these constitute only a very little section within that eternal history; how brief you would be compared with the brevity of the section! You begin your history with the beginning of love and you end with a grave. But that eternal history of love began far earlier; it began with your beginning, when you came into existence from nothing, and as truly as you do not become nothing, so truly the history does not end with the grave. For when the deathbed is prepared for you, when you have gone to bed, never more to rise, and they only wait for you to turn to the other side to die, and the stillness grows about you — when gradually the nearer friends go away, and the stillness grows because only the dearest remain, while death comes nearer you; then when the dearest go softly away, and the stillness grows, because only your own family remain; and when then the last one has bent for the last time over you and turns away, for now you turn to the side of death: there yet remains One by that side. He the last at the deathbed. He who was the first, God, the living God — if for the rest your heart was pure, which it became only by loving Him.

There is this to be said about the pure heart and about love being a matter of conscience. If love and earthly love constitute the chief pleasures of life, so that the happy man can say with truth: “Now for the first time I live,” so it is the joy of life merely to hear the lover talk about his happiness, about life, that is, about its pleasure: then must the dead speak about that conscientious love, the dead who, it is well to note, did not become tired of life, but simply won the joy of eternity. But it is a dead man who speaks, and this seems so forbidding to many that they dare not listen to his glad message, while everyone is glad to listen to one of whom we say in a superior way, “He is alive.” And yet death must come, and just at the moment when his contemporaries are joyfully wishing the happy man a long life, eternity says, “Die,” if otherwise your heart will be pure. For no doubt there was someone who became happy, indescribably happy, or unhappy, by loving a human being; but no man’s heart ever became pure unless it became so through loving God.

“An unfeigned faith.” Could there ever be any more abominable combination possible than love — and duplicity? Still such a combination is an impossibility, for to love deceitfully is to hate. And this not only holds true about duplicity, but it is impossible to associate the least lack of sincerity with the idea of loving. As soon as any sincerity is lacking, then there is always something concealed, but the selfish self-love hides itself in this concealment, and insofar as this self-love is present in a man, he does not love. In sincerity the lover offers himself to the beloved; and no mirror is so accurate in catching the least trifle as sincerity is, if it is true sincerity; or if in the lovers there is the true fidelity which is reflected in the mirror of sincerity, which love holds between them.

But now if two men are thus able to become in sincerity intelligible to each other, is it not somewhat arbitrary for Christianity to speak about an unfeigned faith in another sense, insofar as by that it means sincerity before God? Is it not exactly necessary, if two men are to love each other in an unfeigned faith, that this must be preceded by an individual sincerity toward God? For is there dissimulation only when a man consciously deceives himself or others? Is it not also dissimulation when a man does not know himself? And can such a man promise love from an unfeigned faith, or can he — keep what he promises? Aye, he may do that, but if he cannot promise, can he then keep what he cannot even promise? And one who does not know himself cannot promise love from an unfeigned faith.

The thought of confidence contains in itself a reduplication, and it is this: the one with whom a man has the most intimate relationship, hence the relationship which best fitted him to be the object of confidences, or of confidential communications, only in him can this man really confide or trust, or open his heart to him in confidence. But thus the confidence keeps itself to itself, and thus there is, as the essential in the confidence, the unutterable, instead of a man having to believe that the confidence lay in the stating of it. Thus if, humanly speaking, a wife has her most inward relationship with her husband, she may reveal one or another thing in confidence to her parents, but this confidence is a confidence about something confidential. The wife will therefore feel that she is far from being able to confide everything to them or to confide it to them as she confides it to her husband with whom she has her most intimate relationship — but also her most confidential one, and to whom alone she can really open her heart concerning her most intimate relationship, which is her relation to him. Business affairs and unimportant external matters one cannot talk about confidentially, or at least only foolishly and irresponsibly. But see, if a wife wished to tell someone else about her most intimate concern, her relation to her husband, she would herself perceive that there was only one in whom she could completely confide, and this one was the same as the one in whom and with whom she has this relationship.

With whom now has a man his most intimate relationship, with whom can a man have his most intimate relationship? Is it not God? But hence all confidence between men finally becomes only confidence about confidence. Only God is confidence, just as He is love. When then two men sincerely pledge their faith to each other, is this then to promise faith to each other, if they first, each one severally, promise and have promised their faith to another? And yet, on the other hand, this is necessary if they, in the Christian sense, would love from an unfeigned faith. If two men absolutely confide in each other, is it absolutely confiding in each other if they first, each one individually, have confided in a third? And yet this is necessary if they wish absolutely to confide in each other, even if in each individual's confidence in God there is the unutterable, which is exactly the sign that their relation to God is the most inward, the most confidential.

How inviting, how attractive the talk sounds about the confidence of two lovers in each other, and yet there is dissimulation in this speech as in this confidence. But if love from an unfeigned faith is to be spoken about, then must the dead speak, and it sounds at first as if it wrought a division between the two, although they will still be united in the most intimate and confident companionship. Moreover it is like a separation, and yet it is the confidence of eternity which is set between them. Many, many times two have become happy in a confidential relation to each other, but never has any man loved from an unfeigned faith except through the confidence of the separation in God, which is also God’s consent to the confidence of the lovers. — Only when it becomes a matter of conscience is there love from a pure heart and from an unfeigned faith.

IV. OUR DUTY TO LOVE THE MEN WE SEE

IF A MAN say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? — I John 4:20

HOW DEEPLY IS THE NEED for love grounded in man's being! The first thing, if we may speak in this way, which was said about man, and said by the only One who in truth could say it, by God Himself, and about the first man, says just this. We read in the Holy Scriptures: "God said, it is not good for man to be alone." So woman was taken from the side of man and given to him for a companion — for love and companionship first take something from a man before they give. Therefore throughout all ages everyone who has thought more deeply about the nature of man, has therefore recognized in him this need for companionship. How often it has been said, and repeated again and again; how often has one cried woe upon the loneliness, or pictured the pain of loneliness and its wretchedness; how often has one, wearied by the vitiating, noisy, confused associations of everyday life, wandered out to the solitary place — only to learn again to hunger for companionship! For thus one always returns to that thought of God's, that first thought about man.

In the busy, teeming multitude, which as company is both too much and too little, man becomes tired of company; but the cure does not consist in discovering that God's thought was wrong, not at all; but the healing consists in learning from the very first to understand one's self in the yearning for companionship. So deeply is this need entrenched in human nature that it has remained unchanged since the creation of the first man; no new discovery has been made, but that first observation, one and the same, has been confirmed in many ways, varying from generation to generation in the form of expression, or in the way in which it was presented, or in the turn of the thought.

So deeply is this need grounded in man's nature, and so essentially does it belong to the fact of his being human, that even He who was One with the Father, and in community of love was One with the Father and the Holy Spirit, He who loved the whole race, our Lord Jesus Christ, still humanly felt this need to love and be loved by an individual man. He was indeed the God-Man, and so eternally different from every other man, but He was, nevertheless, also true man, tried in everything human. And, on the other side, the fact that He experienced all this, is exactly the expression for the fact that He was essentially human. He was an actual man, and can therefore have sympathy with all things human; He was not an airy form which beckoned in the clouds, without understanding or wishing to understand what humanly befalls a man. Oh, no. He could have pity on the multitude who needed food, and that in the purely human sense, He who had Himself hungered in the wilderness.

And so too He could sympathize with men in their need to love and to be loved, sympathize in a purely human way. We find this pictured in the Gospel of John. Jesus says to Simon Peter: "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" Peter answers Him: "Yea, Lord, Thou knowest that I love Thee." How touching this is! Christ asks: "Lovest thou me more than these?" It is almost like a prayer for love. Thus speaks the One to whom it is all important to be the best-loved. Peter himself is conscious of this inconsonance, like that when Jesus would be baptized by John. Therefore Peter not only answers, "Yes," but he adds, "Lord, Thou knowest that I love Thee." This reply indicates the inconsonance. For ordinarily if a man knows that he is loved, because he has heard it asserted before, then he is more than willing to hear it again, and therefore wishes to hear it again, although he knows it in many other ways than by this mere assertion, to which he once more returns, anxious to hear it again. Of course it is in another sense that Christ can be said to know that Peter loves Him. Still, Christ again a second time says to him: “Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?” Peter answers Him: “Aye, Lord, Thou knowest that I love Thee.” What else is there to answer, while the inconsonance only becomes clearer because the question is asked a second time! Christ says to him the third time: “Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me?” Peter was grieved because He said a third time to him, “Lovest thou me?” and Peter said to Him: “Lord, Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love Thee.” Peter does not carry his answer further; instead, in his reply he refers to what Christ must know from experience about Peter’s feeling— “Thou knowest that I love Thee,” he answers, “Thou knowest all things, Thou knowest that I love Thee.” Hence Peter says no more, he almost shudders at the inconsonance; for a “yes” is like a real answer to a real question, whereby the questioner learns to know something or learns it more definitely than he knew it before. But One who “knows all things,” how can He get to know something, or through another’s assurance get to know it more certainly than He knew it before? And yet, if He cannot do this, then neither can He love quite humanly, for this is just the mystery of love, that there is no higher certainty than the beloved’s renewed assurance; humanly understood it is unconditionally to be certain of being loved, not of loving, since it is superior to the relation between friend and friend. Terrible contradiction: that the One who is God, loves humanly; for to love humanly is indeed to love an individual man and to wish to be the one best loved by this particular man. That is why Peter was grieved at the question being asked a third time! For in a similar relation of love between men, there is a new joy in the question being asked three times, and a new joy in answering three times; or else the question repeated too often grieves, because it seems to betray mistrust. But when He who knows all things asks three times, hence finds it necessary to ask three times, then must it not be because, since He knows everything. He knows that the love is not strong enough, not inward enough, not ardent enough, in the one who is questioned, the one who would also deny Him three times? Peter must certainly have thought that this was the reason the Lord found it necessary to ask the question three times — for it truly could not be because the Lord Himself felt the need to hear this "yes" three times; such a thought would be beyond man's power to imagine. Even if the thought is allowed, it is simply out of the question. Oh, but how human! He who answered not a word to the high priests who condemned Him to death, He who answered not a word to Pilate who held His life in his hands — He asks three times if He is loved; moreover. He asks if Peter loves Him— "more than these"!

So deeply is love rooted in human nature, so essentially does it belong to the human-, and yet men so frequently find excuses in order to deprive themselves — of this blessedness, hence they elicit deception — in order to deceive themselves, or to make themselves unhappy. Sometimes the excuse assumes the form of sadness; one sighs over men and over his own unhappiness; one can find no one to love. For to sigh over the world and its unhappiness is always easier than to beat one's breast and sigh over one's self. Sometimes the self-deception sounds like an accusation; one accuses men of not being worthy of love — one "groans against" men; for it is always easier to be the accuser than the accused. Sometimes the self-deception lies in the proud self-satisfaction which believes that it seeks in vain for a worthy object of its love — for it is always easier to show superiority by being fastidious about others than by being strict with one's self. And yet, yet we are all agreed that this is an unfortunate attitude, and that such behavior is wrong. And what is it then that is wrong? What other than the constant seeking and rejecting by these men! Such men do not notice that their talk sounds like a mockery of themselves, because the fact of their not being able to find any worthy object for their love among men, indicates that they are themselves utterly lacking in love.

Is it really love to wish to find it outside one's self? I supposed love consisted in bringing it with one. But he who has love in himself when he is seeking an object for his love (and otherwise it is not true that he seeks an object — for his love), he will easily, and the greater his love the more easily, find an object, and find it to be such that it is lovable. For the ability to love a man in spite of his weaknesses and faults and imperfections is not the perfect love, but perfect love consists in being able to find him lovable in spite of and with his weaknesses and faults and imperfections.

Let us understand each other. It is one thing to be finicky and wish to eat only the most delicate and rarest dishes, most exquisitely prepared, and even when they are of this kind, then to be finicky in finding one fault or another in them. It is quite a different matter not only to be able to eat the more modest fare, but to be able to find this simpler fare the choicest, because the problem set for him is not to develop his fastidiousness, but to transform himself and his tastes.

Or if there were two artists, and one of them were to say: "I have traveled a great deal in my time and have looked about a good bit in the world, but I have looked in vain for a man who was worth painting. I have never found a face which pictured such perfect beauty that I could decide to draw it; in every face I have always found one or another little defect, and therefore I have sought in vain." Would this be a sign that he was a great artist? On the other hand, the second artist said: "Now I do not really pretend to be an artist. I have not traveled in foreign countries, but have remained in the little circle of people who were my neighbors; among these I have not found a single face so insignificant or so irregular that I could not distinguish a more beautiful side and discover something pleasing in it.

Therefore the art I practice gives me pleasure and satisfies me, without my claiming to be an artist." Would this not indicate that this man really was an artist, who by bringing a certain something with him found at home what the much-traveled artist found nowhere in the world, perhaps because he did not bring a certain something with him! Hence the second man was the artist.

Would it not be distressing if that which was intended to embellish life were only to be a curse upon it, so that "art," instead of beautifying life for us, merely fastidiously discovered that none of us was beautiful! And how much more distressing as well as confusing it would be if love should only become a curse, because its requirement alone revealed that none of us was worthy of love, instead of love being precisely recognizable by the fact that it is loving enough to find something lovable in all of us, hence loving enough to be able to love all of us.

It is a distressing absurdity, which is, however, altogether too general, always to be perpetually talking about how the object of love ought to be, in order to be worthy of love, instead of talking about how love ought to be in order to be love. It is so common, not only in daily life, but, oh, how often is it not seen, that even the one who calls himself a poet ascribes all his merit to the refined, soft, aristocratic fastidiousness which, in contrast to loving, cold-bloodedly knows how to reject and reject; assumes it to be his task in this respect to initiate men into all the abominable mysteries of fastidiousness. Still some are inclined to do this; many are still so disposed, so inquisitive to learn this, that is, to get a knowledge which really only serves to embitter life for themselves and others! For of how much in life does it not hold true that if one had never learned it, then one would have found everything beautiful, or at least more beautiful than one does. But after one has been infected with the taint of fastidiousness, how difficult it becomes to regain what he lost, the natural gifts of good nature and love, with which God has fundamentally endowed every man!

But if no one else can or will, an apostle always knows how to lead us in the right way in this respect, the right way which both leads us to do right to others and to make ourselves happy. So we have chosen some words of the apostle John: “If any of you say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar, for he who does not love his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?” We shall make these words the object of our reflection, as rejoicing in the task, we choose to speak about

THE DUTY OF LOVING THE MEN WE SEE.

But this is not to be understood as if the discourse were about loving all the men we see, for that is the love for the neighbor which we discussed earlier. On the contrary, let it be understood that the discourse concerns the duty of finding those in the actual world whom we might love in particular, and in loving them to love the men we see. If this is our duty, then the task does not consist in finding — the lovable object; but the task consists in fielding the object already given or chosen — lovable, and in continuing to find him lovable however changed he is.

However, we shall first consider a little difficulty respecting the Gospel passage read, a difficulty which it might occur to an earthly shrewdness, perhaps conceited at its own cleverness, to raise, whether it actually does so or not. When the apostle says: “He who does not love his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?” then a clever man might raise the objection that this is a deceptive turn of thought. For he had really assured himself that the brother he had seen was not worthy of love, but from this fact (that he did not love the one he regarded as undeserving of love) how could it be inferred that there was anything to prevent such a man from loving God whom he had not seen? And yet the apostle believes that there is something which prevents such a man from loving God, although by this word "brother" he certainly is not speaking about some quite definite individual man, but chiefly about the matter of loving men. The apostle believes that it is a divine contention that is submitted against the unreliability of a man's assertion about loving the invisible, when it appears that this man does not love the visible; whereas it might seem just as visionary to say that one loves the invisible by not loving anything visible. It is a divine contention submitted against human romanticism with respect to loving God, for it is visionary, even if it is not hypocritical, thus to wish to love the invisible. The matter is quite simple. Man must begin by loving the unseen, God, for thereby he will himself learn what it means to love; but the fact that he really loves the unseen will be recognized precisely by the fact that he loves the brother he sees; the more he loves the unseen, the more he will love the men he sees. Not conversely, that the more he rejects those he sees, the more he loves the unseen. If that were true then God would be transformed into an unreal something, a figment of the imagination. Therefore only a hypocrite and a deceiver would hit upon such ideas for the sake of finding an excuse; or one who misrepresents God by making it seem as if God were jealous for Himself and for being loved, instead of the blessed God being merciful, and, as it were, constantly subordinating Himself by saying: "If you will Jove me, then love the men you see; what you do to them you do to me."

God is too exalted to be able simply to accept a man's love, to say nothing of His being able to find pleasure in those things in which a visionary delights. If someone says about a gift through which he would be able to help his parents, that it is "Corban," that is, that it is already dedicated to God, this is not well-pleasing to God. If you wish to show that it is dedicated to God, then give it in the name of God. If you wish to show that your life is dedicated to the service of God, then let it serve men, but always in the name of God. God is not a party to existence in such a way that He demands His share for Himself. He demands everything, but when you bring it you learn to know at once, if I may speak thus, by the endorsement on it, where it will be further negotiated; for God demands nothing for Himself, although He demands everything from you. So the apostle's words, if rightly understood, lead directly to the subject of the discourse.

When it is a duty to love the men one sees, then must one primarily renounce all imaginative and overstrained ideas of a dream-world, where the object of love would he to seek and to find; that is, one must become sober, gain reality and truth by finding and remaining in the world of reality, as the sole appointed task.

The most dangerous of all evasions as regards loving, is to wish to love only the invisible, or that one has not seen. This evasion is so high-flying that it soars completely above reality; it is so intoxicating that it easily tempts and easily imagines itself to be the all-supreme and most perfect kind of love. Certainly it seldom occurs to a man shamelessly to speak derogatorily about loving; on the contrary, that deception is more general by which men defraud themselves of really beginning to love, just because they talk too enthusiastically about loving and of love. The reason for this has a far deeper ground than we might suppose; otherwise the confusion could not have established itself as firmly as it has, the confusion that arises from calling that a misfortune which is a fault: the fact of their not finding any object of love whereby they still further hindered themselves from finding it; for as soon as they realized that it was their own fault, then they found it. The general conception of love is that it is the opened eye of admiration which is looking for superiority and perfections. That is why one complains that one looks in vain. We shall not attempt to decide how far the individual is right or not; whether or not that lovable superiority and perfection which he seeks, are to be found; whether he has not confused his search by his fastidiousness. No, we shall not dispute in this way. We shall not dispute within the limits of this conception of love, for this whole conception is an error, since love is rather the closed eye of forbearance and mildness, which does not see the deficiencies and the imperfections.

But it is very essential that we emphasize the difference between these two conceptions, for there is a world of difference, a revolutionary difference between them. It is only the latter conception that is true, the first is an error. And it is well known that an error never halts of itself, it only leads farther and farther astray, so it becomes increasingly difficult to find the way back to truth. The way of error is easy to find, but to find the way back is so difficult — as we are told in the legend about that mountain of Venus, which must lie somewhere on earth, that no one who found his way to it could ever find his way back. So if a man with the wrong idea of what love is, goes out into the world, then he seeks, and seeks, as he believes, to find the object of love, but, as he thinks, in vain. However, he does not change his conception of what it is; on the contrary, enriched by his manifold knowledge of the fastidious, he seeks ever more fastidiously, but, as he believes, in vain. It never occurs to him that the mistake might lie in himself or in his wrong conception of what love is. On the contrary, the more refined he becomes in his fastidiousness, the more exalted opinion he entertains of himself and of the perfection of his conception of love — the more clearly he sees how imperfect men are, and this can be discovered only through the assistance of his own perfection! Nevertheless, he is absolutely certain that this is not his fault, that he does not act from any evil or hateful motive — he who is seeking only love.

For far be it from him to renounce love, he who so vividly realizes how his conception of it becomes ever more enthusiastic — what indeed could ever become more enthusiastic than an error! And he has not checked the error, exactly the reverse; by its aid he has made himself giddy — in loving the invisible, an apparition one does not see. Or does not all this come to one and the same thing: seeing an apparition — and: not seeing? For if you take away the apparition you see nothing, the man himself admits that; but the man forgets that if you take away the seeing, then you still see an apparition. But, as was said, he will not give up love or talk humbly about it; he will talk enthusiastically about it and preserve it — the love of the unseen. Distressing error! We say about worldly honor and power, about wealth and happiness, that it is as a vapor, and this is indeed true. But that the strongest power in man, a power which according to his own definition is simply nothing less, since it is life and strength, that this should become as vapor, and that the man intoxicated by these vapors, proudly believes that he has apprehended the highest — that man has indeed seized upon clouds and fancies, which always soar high above reality: lo, that is terrible! Ordinarily one devoutly warns against wasting the gifts of God; but which of God's gifts is comparable to the love which he implanted in the human heart? Alas, and then to see it wasted in this way! For the clever man believes — foolishly, that one wastes his love in loving the imperfect, the weak men. I should suppose that this would be to apply his love, to make use of it. But to be able to find no object for love, to waste it in a vain search, to squander it in empty space by loving the unseen: that is truly wasting it.

Therefore be sober, come to your senses; understand that the fault lies in your conception of love, that this ought to constitute a claim, a most glorious one, since the whole of existence would not be able to pay it, any more than you can prove your right to collect this claim. At the very moment in which you changed your conception of love, that it is the exact opposite of a claim, that it is an outstanding indebtedness to which God binds you; that very moment you have found reality. And just this is your duty, thus with closed eyes (for in love you close your eyes to weakness and frailty and imperfection) to find reality, instead of with open eyes (aye, open and staring like a sleepwalker's) to overlook reality. For duty this constitutes the first condition, so that in loving at all you may come to love the men you see. The condition is to find a foothold of reality. Error always vacillates, that is why it sometimes looks so easy and so spiritual, because it is so airy. Truth takes firm and therefore sometimes difficult steps. It stands upon solid ground, and therefore sometimes looks so simple. There is also a significant change: instead of having a claim to recover to get a duty to fulfil; instead of having a world to traverse to take, as it were, a world upon one's shoulders; instead of ardently wishing to seek the pleasant fruit of admiration to have to bear patiently with want. Ah, what a change! And yet it is through this change that love comes into being, the love which can perfect the duty: in loving, to love the men we see.

When it is a duty in loving to love the men we see, then it is important that in loving the individual, actual man, we do not slip in an imagined conception of how we believe or might wish that this man should be. He who allows himself to do this does not love the man he sees, but again something unseen, his own idea, or something like it.

There is in loving a manner of conduct which contains a considerable alloy of doubt and fastidiousness. It is one thing to reject and reject, and never find an object worthy of love; it is another thing in loving what one calls the object of his love, truly and sincerely to perfect this duty in loving what he sees. It is in truth a worthy wish, a truly worthy wish, that the one we love should possess the lovable perfections; we wish it not merely for our own sake, but also for his. Above all, it is worthwhile to wish and to pray that the one we love might always act and be such as we are able to approve of and agree with. But, for God's sake, let us not forget that it is not to our credit if he is so, even less to our credit to demand it of him — should any question of our merit arise, which is, however, improper and unseemly talk in relation to love, which should simply be to love equally faithfully and tenderly.

But there is a fastidiousness which always, as it were, works against love, and wishes to prevent it from loving what it sees, when the fastidiousness with a wavering and yet in a certain sense critical glance, effaces the actual form of love or offends against it, and cunningly demands to see something else. There are men about whom one may say that they have not yet taken form, that their reality has not consolidated itself, because inwardly they cannot make up their minds as to what they are and what they wish to be. But by the way in which one sees, one can also make another man's form vacillating and unreal, because the love, which should love the man it sees, cannot really decide, but sometimes would do away with one fault in its object; sometimes would demand a perfection in it, which would be, if I may say so, as if a bargain was not quite completed. Yet the one who by loving in this way is inclined to be fastidious, does not love the man he sees, and really makes his love objectionable, as hard for the beloved.

Your beloved, your friend, is also in the more general sense a man, and he exists as such for the rest of us; but for you he should essentially exist as the beloved, if you will to perfect your duty in loving the man you see. If there is duplicity in your relationship, so that he partly exists for you in a general sense as an individual man, partly in a particular sense as the beloved, then you do not love the man you see. It is rather as if you had in that sense two ears, so that you do not as ordinarily hear the same thing with both ears, but you hear one thing with one ear, and another thing with the other ear. You hear with one ear what he says, and whether it is wise and correct and shrewd and spiritual and so on; alas, and with the other ear you hear that it is the voice of the beloved. You scrutinize him probingly with one eye, searchingly, critically, alas, and only with the other eye do you see that he is the beloved. Oh, but thus to divide, that is not to love the man one sees. Is it not as if there were constantly a third party present, even when the two are alone, a third party who tests and rejects, a third party who disturbs the inwardness, a third party who may sometimes make the concerned disgusted with himself and his love, because it is so critical; a third party who would alarm the beloved if he knew that this third party was present! What, too, does it mean, that this third party is present? It signifies that if... this or that is not in accordance with your wish, then you might not love; hence the third party signifies divorce, separation; so consequently the thought of separation is present — confidentially, alas, as when in paganism the destructive being is insanely included in the unity of the godhead. Does the presence of the third party not signify that the love-relationship is yet in a certain sense no relationship, in that you stand above the relationship and test the beloved? Do you not consider that in such a case something else is tested, whether you really have love, or rather that there is something else decided, that you do not really love? For life certainly has tests enough, and these tests should precisely find the lovers, find friend and friend, united in order to endure the test. But if the test is to enter into the relationship, then a treachery has been committed.

Truly this mysterious reserve is the most dangerous kind of faithlessness; such a man does not break his vow, but he makes it constantly indecisive whether he is bound by his vow. Is it not faithlessness when your friend clasps your hand, and there is in this handclasp something vague, as if it were doubtful to him who pressed your hand how closely at that moment he corresponded to your idea of him, so that you would reciprocate in the same way? Is the relationship to be such that it must every moment begin from the beginning to come into the relationship; is this to love the man you see, every moment to test him, as if it were the first time you saw him? It is abhorrent to see the fastidiousness which rejects all food, but it is also abhorrent to see the one who, to be sure, eats the food which is politely offered him, and yet in a certain sense does not eat, but constantly, as if he were already satiated, only tastes of the food or takes pains to taste a tidbit, while he is satiated by plainer food.

No, if a man wishes to fulfil his duty in loving to love the men he sees, then he must not only find those he loves among actual men, but he must eradicate all doubt and fastidiousness in loving them, so that in earnestness and truth he loves them as they are; he must in earnestness and truth apprehend the task: to find the given or the chosen object lovable. We do not mean by this to recommend a childish infatuation with the accidental circumstances of the beloved, even less a fond indulgence in the wrong place; far from it, the earnestness lies in the fact that the relationship itself must with a united effort fight against the imperfect, overcome the defects, remove the differences. This is earnestness; fastidiousness makes the relationship itself ambiguous. His weakness or his fault does not make the one a stranger to the other, but the union regards the weaker as the stranger, which it is equally important to both to overcome and to remove. It is not you who because of the weakness of the beloved must, as it were, withdraw from him, or make your relationship less close; on the contrary, the two must hold themselves more closely and inwardly together in order to remove the weakness. As soon as the relationship is ambiguous, so that you do not love the man you see, then it is as if you demanded something else in order to be able to love; since on the contrary, the fault or the weakness makes the relationship more inward, not as if the fault should be retained, but just in order to overcome it, so you love the man you see. You see the fault, but the fact that the relationship becomes more inward, shows precisely that you love the man in whom you still see the fault or the weakness or the imperfection.

As there are hypocritical tears, hypocritical sighing and complaining about the world, so too is there hypocritical sorrow over the weaknesses and imperfections of the beloved. It is so easy and so complacent to wish the beloved to have all possible perfections,, and then, if some are lacking, it is again so easy and so complacent to sigh and sorrow and become self-important over one's own presumably pure and profound distress. It is perhaps, on the whole, a more general form of sensualism selfishly to wish to show off the beloved or the friend, and to wish to despair over each insignificant fault. But would that be loving the men we see? Oh, no, the men we see, and hence ourselves when others see us, are not so perfect; and yet it is so often the case that a man develops in himself this delicate frailty which is only calculated to love the complete conception of the perfect. And although we are all of us so imperfect, one rarely sees the strong, sound, efficient love which is calculated to love those imperfect ones, that is, the men we see.

When in loving it is a duty to love the men we see, then is there no limit to the love; if the duty is fulfilled, the love must be limitless, that is, unchanged, however its object changes.

Let us consider what we were reminded of in the introduction to this meditation; the relation between Christ and Peter — wonder if Peter, especially in his relation to Christ, was like an epitome of all perfections. And, on the other side, Christ certainly knew his faults! Let us speak in human fashion about this relation. God knows how many generally insignificant trifles are yet scrupulously gathered up and carefully concealed, which either at once, or, what is even more distressing, after a long lapse of time, give us occasion to accuse the one the other of selfishness, faithlessness or treachery. God knows how very infrequently the accuser makes even a slight effort to put himself in the place of the accused, so that the judgment, the strict, the merciless judgment, might not be an overhasty one, but judicious, but at least insofar thoughtful, that it knows with certainty about that which it judges. God knows how often one sees this sorry sight, how passion immediately equips even the perhaps ordinarily restricted man, if he is presumably the injured party, with a shrewdness which is astonishing; and on the other hand, how it strikes even the perhaps ordinarily intelligent man with stupidity with respect to every appeasing, extenuating, exonerating interpretation of the injury, because it pleases the offended passion to be shrewdly blind: but this we shall all agree upon, that if in a relation between two friends there had happened what happened to Christ with Peter, then there would truly be a sufficient reason for breaking — with such a traitor. If your life had been brought into the utmost danger, and you had a friend who of his own accord had sworn a solemn oath of loyalty, moreover, of being willing to lay down his life for you; if then when the danger came, he did not even remain away (that would almost have been more forgivable), no, he came, he was present, but he did not move a hand; he stood and looked on quietly, or, no, he did not stand quietly, his only thought was to save himself and on any condition; he did not even take to flight (that would almost have been more forgivable), no, he remained standing as a spectator, which he asserted that he was — by denying you: what then? We shall not even let the apodosis follow; let us only present the relationship very vividly and speak in quite human fashion about it. Hence, you stood accused by your enemies, condemned by your enemies. It was literally true that you stood everywhere surrounded by enemies. The powerful, who might perhaps have been able to understand you, had hardened themselves against you, they hated you. Therefore, you now stood accused and condemned — while a blinded, raging mob hurled insults against you; maddened, even rejoiced at the thought that your blood would be upon them and upon their children. And this pleased the rulers who ordinarily despised the mob so deeply; it pleased them because it satisfied their hatred, so that it was animal ferocity and the lowest paltriness which had found its victim and its prey in you. You had reconciled yourself to your fate; you understood that there was not a single word to say, since the insult only sought occasion, so that the magnanimous word about your innocence would only give insult a new occasion, as if it were defiance; so the clearest proof of your righteousness would embitter the mob and make the insults even more violent; so that an expression of pain would give a new occasion for insults, as if it had expressed cowardice. Thus you stood, an outcast from human society, and yet not an outcast; you stood surrounded by men enough, but none of them saw in you a man, even if in another sense they saw in you a man, for they would not have treated a wild beast so inhumanly. Oh, horror, more terrible than if you had fallen among wild beasts; for I wonder if even the nightly howling of the most bloodthirsty beasts of prey is as horrible as the inhumanity of a raging mob. I wonder if in a herd of wild animals one beast can so excite another to a greater ferocity than that which is simply natural, as in an innocent crowd one man can excite another to more than animal bloodthirstiness and cruelty. I wonder if the baleful or burning eye of the most bloodthirsty beast has such an evil burning as this which inflames the eye of the individual when, excited and exciting, he joins with the wild, raging mob! So you stood accused, condemned, insulted; vainly you looked about to discover a figure which still resembled a man, to say nothing of a friendly face on which your eye could rest — then you saw him, your friend, but he denied you, and the insult which had before sounded raucous enough was now like an echo multiplied a hundredfold! If this had happened to you, would you not truly have considered yourself magnanimous if, instead of considering revenge, you had turned your eyes away from him and said to yourself: “I do not care to look at this traitor”!

How differently Christ acted! He did not turn His eyes away from Peter, as if He were unconscious that Peter existed; He did not say, “I will not look at this traitor”; He did not leave him to shift for himself. No, He “looked upon him”; He reminded him at once with a glance; had it been possible He certainly would not have refused to speak to him. And how did Christ look at Peter? Was it an indignant glance? Was it like a glance of dismissal? Oh, no, it was as when a mother sees her child in danger through his own carelessness, and then, if she is not able to reach the child, she overtakes it with her reproachful yet also saving glance. But was Peter in danger? Ah, who cannot see this: for how terrible for a man to have denied his friend! But an injured friend cannot see in the passion of anger that the one who denied him is in danger. But He who is called the Saviour of the world. He could see clearly where the danger was, that it was Peter who was in danger, Peter, who should and must be saved! The Saviour of the world was not mistaken. He did not see His cause lost if Peter did not hasten to help Him, but He saw Peter lost if He did not hasten to save him. I wonder if there lives or ever has lived a man who cannot understand this which is so clear and so obvious; and yet Christ is the only one who saw this at the critical moment, when He Himself was the accused, the condemned, the mocked, the spit-upon, the denied.

A man is seldom tried in a crisis which involves life and death, and hence he seldom gets occasion to test the devotion of friendship to its extreme limit. But merely in some more important moment to find timidity and shrewdness where you were prepared because of your friendship to look for courage and resolution; to find duplicity, fickleness and evasion instead of candor, decision and refuge; to find only frivolity instead of sober-minded reflection: alas, how difficult then in the haste of the moment and the heat of passion, to be immediately able to understand on which side the danger lies, which one of the friends is in the greater danger, you or he who thus leaves you in the lurch; how difficult then to love the man you see — when you see him so changed!

Nowadays we are accustomed to praise Christ's attitude towards Peter; let us guard against this commendation becoming a delusion, a figment of the imagination, because we are not able or willing to exert our thought, to imagine ourselves contemporary with the event, so that while we praise Christ on the one hand, on the other hand, insofar as we are contemporaneous with a similar event, we act and speak quite differently. We have no report handed down concerning the contemporary interpretation of Christ's attitude towards Peter, but if you meet them, those contemporaries, then ask them, and you will learn that on this occasion, just as on the occasion of almost everything which Christ did, people said: "The fool! Even granting that his case was desperately lost, yet not to have power to muster all his strength for the last time in a single glance which would crush this traitor! What craven, unmanly weakness! Is that acting like a man!" Thus was He judged, and the insult found a new expression. Or it would be said by the powerful ruler who intended to review the circumstances: "Well, why did he seek his company with publicans and sinners, his followers among the poorest class of people? He should have associated himself with us, the leaders of the synagogue, but as it is, he gets what he deserves. This shows how far one can rely on that kind of people. Well, as he has always abandoned himself to that class, he keeps it up to the last. He does not even become infuriated by their shabby faithlessness."

Perhaps the more clever among them, wishing to seem magnanimous, would explain: "The fact that the high priests have allowed him to be taken, the fact that he, fanatic though he was, now sees that everything is lost, may have weakened his reason and broken his courage, so that he has become depressed in a cowardly, spiritless stupor. Perhaps this explains his forgiving such betrayal, for of course no real man would behave in this way!” Alas, it is only too true: no man does behave in this way. That is just why Christ’s life furnishes the only instance where a teacher, just at the moment His case is lost along with His life, and everything is most terribly forfeited through the apostasy of His disciple, by His glance at that very instant wins His most zealous adherent in this disciple, and thus His cause to a great extent, although the latter fact is hidden from everyone.

Christ’s love for Peter was, therefore, boundless; in loving Peter He perfected the task of loving the man one sees. He did not say: ‘Peter must first be changed and become another man before I can love him.” No, exactly the converse. He said: “Peter is Peter, and I love him. My love, if it amounts to anything, will precisely help him to become another man.” Hence He did not break off His friendship, in order perhaps to resume it again when Peter had become another man. No, He maintained His friendship unchanged, and through that was helpful to Peter in becoming another man. Do you believe that without this loyal friendship of Christ Peter would have been rewon? But it is so easy to be a friend when this does not entail anything more than asking some definite favor from the friend, and, if the friend does not comply with this request, then allowing the friendship to lapse, until it is perhaps renewed when he complies with the request. Is this the relation of friendship? Who should be more ready to help an erring one than the one who calls himself his friend, even if the fault was committed against the friend! But the friend avoids him and says (and it is as if some third party were speaking): “When he changes and becomes another man, then he may perhaps again be my friend.” And it is not far from being the case that we men regard such conduct as magnanimous. But truly, it is far from being true that a man can say about such a friend, that in loving he loves the man he sees.

Christ’s love was boundless, as it must be if this is to be perfected: in loving to love the man one sees. This is very easy to perceive. However much and however a man is changed, he is not yet so changed that he becomes invisible. If this — the impossible — is not the case, then we see him, and our duty is to love the man we see. Generally we are inclined to believe that when a man has essentially changed for the worse, he is then so changed that one is excused from loving him. What a confusion of language: to be excused — from loving, as if it were a compulsory matter, a burden one wished to cast off! But Christianity asks: “Can you because of this change no longer see him?” To this the answer must be: “Certainly I can see him. I see exactly that he is no longer worthy of love.” But if you see that, then you do not really see him (which in another sense you cannot deny doing), you see only the unworthiness, the imperfection, and thereby you admit that when you loved him, in another sense you did not love him, but you loved only his superiority and his perfections. From the Christian standpoint, on the contrary, loving consists exactly in loving the man one sees. The emphasis lies not on loving the perfections one sees in a man, but the emphasis is placed on the man one sees, whether one now sees in this man perfections or imperfections, moreover, no matter how sadly this man has changed, since he still has not ceased to be the same man. He who loves the perfections he sees in a man, does not see the man, and therefore he ceases to love when the perfections cease, when a change enters, which change, even if distressing, still does not indicate that the man has ceased to exist. Alas, but even the wisest and most intelligent purely human interpretations of love are still somewhat highfalutin, somewhat hazy; Christian love, on the other hand, descended from heaven to earth. Its direction is consequently opposite. Christian love will not soar to heaven, for it comes from heaven and with heaven; it descends and thereby it succeeds in loving the same man in all the changes, because it sees the same man in all the changes. The merely human love is constantly prepared, as it were, to flee away after, or to flee away with the perfections of the beloved.

We say about a seducer that he steals a maiden's heart; but we must say about all merely human love, even when it is most beautiful, that there is a little thievishness in it, that it still steals the perfections of the beloved, while the Christian love grants the beloved all his imperfections and weaknesses, and in all his changes abides with him, loving the man it sees.

If this were not so, then Christ would never have come in love; for where would He have found the perfect! Wonderful! What it would really do would be to prevent Christ from finding the perfect; for was He not Himself exactly the perfect, which is recognized by His boundless love for the men He saw? What a wonderful crossing of concepts! We speak constantly with regard to love, about the perfect and the complete; Christianity also speaks constantly in relation to love about the perfect and the complete: ah, but we men speak about finding the perfect in order to love him; Christianity speaks about being the perfect which inimitably loves the man it sees. We men wish to look up in order to see the object of perfection (the tendency is still constantly towards the invisible), but in Christ perfection looked down to earth and loved the man it saw. And from Christianity we should learn, for it is still so in a far more general sense than is realized, that no one ascends to heaven except One who first descended from heaven: however enthusiastic the speech sounds about soaring to heaven, it is a delusion, unless you first, as Christianity says, descend from heaven. But from the Christian point of view to descend from heaven means to love infinitely the man you see, just as you see him. If you will, therefore, become perfect in love, then strive to perfect this duty, in loving to love the man you see; to love him just as you see him, with all his imperfections and weaknesses; to love him as you see him when he has completely changed, when he no longer loves you, but perhaps indifferently turns away to love another; to love him as you see him when he betrays and denies you.

V. OUR DUTY TO REMAIN IN THE DEBT OF LOVE TO ONE ANOTHER

OWE NO MAN anything but to love one another. — Romans 13 18

MEN HAVE TRIED in various ways to depict and describe how love is felt by the one who has it, his condition in love, or what it means to love. Love has been called a feeling, a mood, a life, a passion; yet since these are very general definitions, an effort has been made to describe love more precisely. Someone has called it a want, but it is worth noticing that the lover constantly wants what he already possesses; it has been called a longing, but, it is well to note, a constant longing for something the lover already has — for otherwise the love described is an unhappy one.

That simple wise man of old said that "love is the son of wealth and poverty." Who in truth could be poorer than the one who has never loved! But, on the other hand, does even the poorest, who bending over gleans up the crumbs and is humbly grateful for a penny, really have any idea how small a trifle may have infinite value for the lover; how small the trifle may be which the lover (in his poverty) gathers up with infinite care and cautiously hides — like the most precious treasure! I wonder if even the poorest is able to see that which may be so little that only the sharp glance of passion (love in its poverty!) sees and tremendously magnifies! But the smaller the object which poverty gathers up, when it is grateful beyond all measure for it, as if the object were extraordinarily great, the greater it proves the poverty to be. Not even all the assurances about the greatest poverty prove this so conclusively; as if the poor man to whom you gave less than a shilling were to thank you for it as passionately as if you had given him wealth and superfluity; as passionately as if he were now rich.

Alas, for it is only too certain that the poor man remained essentially as poor as before, so it was only his — crazed idea that he had now become rich. So poor is the poverty of love!

A noble man has said about love: “It takes everything and it gives everything.” Who indeed received more than the one who received a man’s love? And who gave more than he who gave a man his love? But, on the other hand, can even envy, when it enviously strips a man of his actual or supposed greatness, thus penetrate to the inmost undergarment! Oh, envy is still so stupid; it does not even suspect where the enclosure might be, or that this enclosure exists, where the really rich man has his true treasure hidden. It does not even suspect that there is a burglar-proof receptacle against thieves (hence, also against envy), just as there is treasure which thieves (hence, also envy) are not able to steal. But love can press forward into the inmost enclosure and strip a man so that he has nothing left, owns nothing, so that he must himself admit that he has nothing, simply nothing, owns nothing. Wonderful! Envy takes, as it thinks, everything, and, when it has thus taken, the man says, “I have really lost nothing.” But love can take everything, so that the man himself says, “I own nothing at all.”

However, love is perhaps most correctly described as an infinite debt: so that when love seizes upon a man he feels that he is infinitely in debt. Generally we say about the one who is loved, that through being loved he becomes a debtor. Thus we say that children are in love indebted to their parents, because these have loved them first, so that the children’s love is only a partial payment on the debt, or a repayment. And this of course is true. But still such a statement reminds one too much of an actual business relation: where an indebtedness has been incurred and must be paid off in installments. It is love which has been shown us, and it must be repaid with love. We are not now speaking of the fact that the receiving one runs into debt. No, he who loves is in debt; when he feels himself gripped by love, he feels this as being in an infinite debt. Wonderful! To give a man his love is, as was said, the highest thing one man can give another — and yet, just when he gives his love and just through giving it, he becomes infinitely indebted. Therefore can one say: this is love's characteristic, that the lover by giving, infinitely, comes — into infinite debt. But this is the relation of the infinite, and love is infinite. By giving away money one does not really run into debt; on the contrary, the receiver is in debt. On the contrary, when the lover gives what is infinitely the highest gift one man can give another, his love, then he places himself in an infinite debt. What a beautiful, what a sacred diffidence does not love bring with it; it not only dares not persuade itself to regard its own act as something meritorious, but it is ashamed even to regard its own act as a part payment on the debt; its own gift becomes consciously like an infinite debt which it is impossible to repay, since in giving, it is constantly running into debt.

Thus one might describe love. Yet Christianity never lingers on the condition or on the description of it; it always hastens to the task, or hastens to set the task. This is precisely expressed in the Gospel passage we read: "Owe no man anything except to love one another" which words we shall use as the basis for this meditation:

OUR DUTY TO REMAIN IN THE DEBT OF LOVE TO ONE ANOTHER.

To remain in debt! But should that be difficult? Nothing is easier than running into debt! And, on the other hand, could remaining in debt be a task? We usually think otherwise, that our problem is the one of getting out of debt: the indebtedness may be anything, there are money debts, debts of honor, promissory notes, in short, anything whatever, the problem ordinarily always being how to get out of debt, the sooner the better. But here the task would be, and hence the honor, to remain in debt! And if this is the task, then it must be an action, perhaps an extensive, a difficult action. But to stay in debt is still precisely the expression for not undertaking the least thing; it is the expression for inactivity, indifference, sluggishness. And this same phrase, as used here, will be the expression for that which is precisely the opposite of indifference, the expression for infinite love.

Lo, all this, all these strange difficulties, which, as it were, heap themselves up against this strange saying, indicate that the matter may have a peculiar connection, so that a certain reorganization of mind and thought is needed in order merely to realize what the discourse is really about.

Let us begin with a little thought-experiment. If the lover, humanly speaking, had done something for the beloved so extraordinary, so exalted, so self-sacrificing, that men might say, "This is the greatest thing one man can do for another": then this would be beautiful and good. But suppose he were to add: "See, now I have paid my debt!" Would this not be ungracious, cold, and, strictly speaking, if I may venture, an indecency which ought never to be heard, and which never is heard in the good society of true love! If, on the other hand, the lover had done this high-minded and self-sacrificing thing, and now were to add: "I still have one prayer — oh, let me remain in your debt": would this not be graciously said! Or if the lover by means of every sacrifice indulges the wishes of the beloved, and now says, "It is a joy to me to pay off by this means a fragment of the indebtedness — in which, however, I still wish to continue": would this not be graciously said! Or if he simply kept silent about its involving sacrifice, merely to avoid the confusion it might produce, in that this sacrifice might for a moment seem like a partial payment on the debt: would this not be a gracious thought! If this is true, has it not really indicated that any business relation is inconceivable, is most abominable to love? Reckoning can only find a place where there is a finite relation, because the relation of finite to finite permits calculation. But love cannot calculate. If its left hand never gets to know what its right hand does, then it is impossible to cast up the accounts, and equally so when the debt is infinite. To reckon with infinite greatness is impossible, for reckoning is exactly to make finite. The lover consequently wishes for his own sake to remain in debt; he does not wish exemption from any sacrifice, far from It. Willing, indescribably willing, as the prompting of love is, he will do everything, and fear only one thing, that he might thus do everything so that he would get out of debt. Rightly understood, this is fear; the wish is to remain in debt, but it is also a duty, a task. If the love in us is not so perfect that we truly wish this, then duty will help us to remain in debt.

When it is a duty to remain in the debt of love to each other, then must there he eternal vigilance, early and late, so that love never comes to dwell upon itself, or to compare itself with the love in other men, or to compare itself with its own deeds which it has performed.

In the world we often hear enthusiastic and exciting speeches about love and faith and hope, and about the heart's goodness, in short, about all spiritual categories, speeches which describe and fascinate through their use of the most burning expressions, the most glowing colors. And yet such a discourse is really only a painted wall; it is to a closer and more serious inspection a deception, since it must either flatter the listener or make fun of him. Sometimes we hear a Christian discourse whose whole secret, like the narration and instruction noted, consists of this deceitful enthusiasm. If, for example, such a speech is heard, and a man now quite simply and honestly (for honesty precisely consists in wishing to act in accordance with what is said, in wishing to shape one's life accordingly) asks, "What shall I do, how shall I get love thus to inflame me?" then the speaker might answer literally, "That is a strange question; he who has love and faith and hope and goodness of heart, has these in the manner described, but he who does not have them cannot be helped by talking about them." Strange! One would, nevertheless, suppose that it would be of special importance to talk to those who are not this way — in order that they might become so. But here lies just the deception in the delusion: to speak as if one would guide men, and then to be obliged to confess that one can only speak about those who need no guidance, because those whom the speech addresses are already so perfect. But who is it then to whom one speaks, who will be benefited by this speech, which at most has some individual about whom it speaks — if it is otherwise true that such an individual exists?

But could such poetic nonsense also be Christianity? If so, it is a mistake on the part of primitive Christianity, that in the sermon about righteousness and purity, it constantly refers to publicans and sinners, who certainly are not righteous! Then should not Christianity, instead of speaking sarcastically about the righteous, who need no conversion, more correctly have embellished the speech into a eulogy upon — the righteous! But if this is done, then not only does Christianity have no one to speak to, but neither does it have anyone to speak about, that is, Christianity is silenced. No, Christianity has least of all announced itself as a eulogy, and it has never concerned itself with describing or dwelling upon the fact of how a man is now; it has never made distinctions between men so it might only speak about those who are now so fortunate as to be lovable. Christianity begins at once with what every man must become. Therefore Christianity calls itself a guide, and rightly so; for no one will ask Christ, who is the Way, or the Scriptures, which are the guidance, in vain about what he ought to do: the questioner will get to know immediately — if he himself wills to know.

This in order to prevent misunderstanding. Anyone who does not wish to understand the discourse about what one must do in relation to love, in that there is truly much, or rather everything, to do both in acquiring and preserving it: he has placed himself outside of Christianity, he is a pagan who admires the lucky, hence the accidental, but just because of this he gropes in darkness — does it really become lighter, however many will-o'-the-wisps play around him?

Hence, there is something to do, and which must be done, in order to continue in the debt of love to each other. When a fisherman has caught a fish and wishes to keep it alive, what must he do? He must at once place it in water, otherwise it weakens and dies after a longer or shorter time. And why must he put it in water? Because water is the natural element of fish, and everything which is to be kept alive must be kept in its own element But the natural element of love is infinity, inexhaustible, immeasurable. If, therefore, you wish to preserve your love, then you must take care that by the aid of infinite indebtedness, ensnared by liberty and life, it constantly remains in its element, otherwise it sickens and dies — not after a longer or shorter time, for it dies at once, which is exactly the sign of its perfection, that it can only live in infinity.

That love's natural element is infinity, inexhaustible, immeasurable, certainly no one will deny, and it is indeed easy to see. Assume, we can only' assume it, that a serving-man or a man whose labor and trouble you can pay for, does exactly the same work for you as do your friends, so that there is consequently not the slightest discoverable difference between the result of their work and that of the servant: and yet, yet there is an infinite difference, an immeasurable difference. There is, namely, always in the one case something extra, which, strangely enough, is worth infinitely more than that to which it is added as an extra. This is exactly the concept, "immeasurable"! In everything which the friend does for you, in the least trifle as in the greatest sacrifice, he is constantly giving his love with it, and thereby the smallest service,' which in connection with your servant you would hardly consider worth reckoning, becomes immeasurable.

Or imagine that a man conceived the idea of wishing to see whether he, without loving the other man yet because he wished to do it (hence, for the sake of the experiment — not because it was his duty), could not be, as we say, equally indefatigable in sacrifices, in services, in expressions of devotion as the one who really loved the same man: you readily see that he does not approach this; there is, on the contrary, an incommensurable difference between the two. He who actually loves always has a head start, and an infinite head start; for by the time the other has unearthed, computed and discovered a new expression of devotion, the friend has already carried it out, because the friend does not need to calculate, and hence wastes no time in doing so.

But the fact of being and continuing in an infinite indebtedness, is exactly an expression for the infinity of love, so that by remaining in debt, love remains in its element. It is here a reciprocal relation, but infinite from both sides. In the one case it is the beloved who in each one of the lover's affectionate expressions of love grasps the incommensurability of the love; in the other case it is the lover who feels the incommensurability, because he knows the debt to be infinite: it is one and the same thing which is infinitely great and infinitely small. The object of love confesses in love that the lover in the smallest things does infinitely more than all others through all the greatest sacrifices; and the lover confesses that even with all possible sacrifices he does infinitely less than he feels the debt to be. What a wonderful like for like in this infinity! Oh, the scholars are proud of their calculation of the infinite, but here is the philosopher's stone: the least expression of love is infinitely greater than all sacrifices, and all sacrifices are infinitely less than the least expression of love in reducing the debt!

But what, then, can take love out of its element? As soon as love becomes self-centered, it is out of its natural element. What does it mean to be self-centered? It means to become itself the object. But an object is always a dangerous matter if one wishes to move forward; an object is like a finitely fixed point, a boundary and a hindrance, a dangerous matter for the infinite. Infinitely it cannot be that love itself becomes the object, nor is there danger therein. For infinitely to be itself its own object is to remain in the infinite, and insofar only to exist or to continue to exist, since love is a reduplication in itself, as different as the particularity of the natural life is from the spiritual reduplication. Hence, when love becomes self-centered, it must be in its own individual expression that it becomes itself the object, or that another distinct love becomes the object, the love in the one man, and the love in the other man. When the object is thus finite, love becomes self-centered; for infinitely to become self-centered is exactly to be in movement. But when love is finitely self-centered, everything is lost. Imagine an arrow that flies, as we say, with the speed of an arrow; imagine that for a moment it gets the idea of halting its flight, perhaps in order to see how far it has come or how high it has soared above the earth, or how its speed compared with that of another arrow, which also flew with the speed of an arrow: at that very moment, it falls to the ground.

So too with love when it becomes finitely self-centered, or becomes itself the object, which more exactly defined, is comparison. Love cannot infinitely compare itself with itself, for infinitely it so resembles itself that this would be merely saying that it is itself. There is in the infinite comparison no third party, that is a reduplication, hence there is no comparison. The third party belongs to all comparison, together with likeness and unlikeness. If there is no dwelling on itself, there is no comparison; if there is no comparison, there is no dwelling on itself.

But what then can the third party of the comparison be? The love in the individual man can compare itself with the love in others. Then he discovers, or thinks that he discovers, that his love is greater than that in the others, or that in certain others it is greater, but in others less. Perhaps at first he believed that the comparison was but a fleeting side-glance in passing, something which required neither time nor effort. Alas! the side-glance of comparison discovers only too easily a whole world of relationships and calculations. This causes a stoppage; at that very moment he is prepared to get out of debt, or is perhaps already out of debt — that is, out of love. Or the third party of the comparison may be those hitherto unaccomplished works of love. At the very moment when reckoning and weighing he is prepared to get out of debt, or perhaps with great self-satisfaction, he sees himself already more than out of debt — he is more than out of love.

In the comparison everything is lost, love is made finite, the debt is to be paid — quite like every other debt; in contradistinction to the debt of honor which is peculiar in that it must be paid at once, the sooner the better, the debt of love is peculiar in being infinite. What does comparison always lose? It loses the moment, the moment which should be filled with an expression of the life of love. But to lose the moment is to become immediate. A moment lost, then is the chain of eternity broken; a moment lost, then is the continuity of eternity disturbed; a moment lost, then is the eternal lost; but to lose the eternal is precisely to become immediate. A moment wasted on comparison, then is everything forfeited. The moment of comparison is, namely, a selfish moment, a moment which wishes to be for itself; just this is the breach, the fall — as the fall of the arrow is due to dwelling on itself.

In comparison, everything is lost, love made finite, the debt to pay position of no consequence, even if it were the highest; love thinks to participate comparatively in proportion to the love of others or in proportion to its own special impulses. Let us understand each other.

If it were really true, we may for a moment assume this, that it were considered unbecoming and unseemly for the kings son to associate with common men — if he nevertheless did this, and now in his own defense said, “I am by no means surrendering my dignity, I shall certainly know how to assert myself as the first among all these men": I wonder if the subtle courtier would not say: "Your Highness, you do not understand; the unseemliness lies in the fact of your associating with such men. Your Highness will himself realize that it would sound like mockery for it to be said about you, the Prince, that you are the highest among those common men. In that comparison there is nothing for you to gain, practically nothing, by being first among them; for the relation itself, the possibility of comparison is a faux pas, and to remain outside of the possibility of comparison is the only thing worthy of the royal dignity." Still this is nothing but a jest. But when that which is and ought to be infinite seeks the evil companionship of intercourse and comparison with the finite, then this is unseemly, undignified; then is the debasement deserved, even if within the comparison one thinks to be the first. For even if it looked and were true, comparatively to love better than all other men, is not to love. To love is to remain in infinite indebtedness, the infinity of the debt is the bond of perfection.

Let me elucidate this by speaking about another infinite relationship. Imagine an enthusiast who enthusiastically desires only one thing, and who will enthusiastically sacrifice everything for that one good. Imagine that it now happens (that which does not happen accidentally, but which will absolutely happen as long as the world is the world) that to the degree he labors more and more disinterestedly, more and more sacrificingly, more and more strenuously, to that same degree the world works more and more against him; imagine him to have reached the point — where if for a single moment he makes a mistake and compares his effort with the reward which the world gives; or makes a mistake and compares his effort with his hitherto unrealized ambition; or makes a mistake and compares his lot with that of those distinguished ones who do not seem to be fired by enthusiasm: alas! then is he lost. Now the Tempter enters and says to him: "Halt your striving, lessen your exertions, have a good time, enjoy life in comfort and accept the flattering condition which is offered you of being known as one of the greatest enthusiasts" — for the Tempter does not speak ill of enthusiasm, he is too clever for that; nor does he fool men so easily into dropping the matter. However, if the enthusiast will not yield to the Tempter, he renews his efforts. Then again the Tempter comes to him and says: "Halt your labors, lessen your exertions, have a good time, enjoy life in comfort by accepting the most unconditionally flattering terms that can certainly ever be offered you, the being recognized as the world's greatest enthusiast, a recognition which will make your life easier and secure for you, the enthusiast, the admiration of the world, whereas you are now only making your life strenuous and arousing the opposition of the world." Alas, to be comparatively enthusiastic is not to be enthusiastic at all.

Woe to the man who has corrupted his soul by the defilement of comparison, for he cannot understand his neighbor except as tremendous pride and vanity. For the enthusiast says to the Tempter: "Be off, and take your comparisons with you." And this is exactly the right procedure. Therefore we urge upon an enthusiast: "Shut your eyes, close your ears, stick to the demand of the infinite; then no comparison will slink in to assassinate your enthusiasm, and to tempt you to become the greatest enthusiast — comparatively! In the sight of the infinite demand your greatest efforts are but a childish performance, and this fact should prevent your becoming self-important, since you will just begin to understand how infinitely much more is required of you."

We warn the one on a ship which is sailing ahead before the wind, not to look at the waves lest he should become giddy; in the same way the comparison between the finite and the infinite makes a man giddy. Guard yourself, therefore, against the comparison which the world wishes to force upon you; for the world understands no more about enthusiasm than a capitalist does about love, and you will always find that dullness and stupidity are first of all intent on making comparisons, and in catching everything in the muddy “actuality” of comparison. Therefore do not look about you, “salute no man on the way,” listen to no cry or shout which wishes to dupe you out of your enthusiasm and trick it into spending its strength laboring in the treadmill of comparison. Let it not disturb you if the world calls your enthusiasm madness, calls it selfishness — in eternity everyone will be forced to understand what enthusiasm and love are. Do not accept the terms offered you: the admiration of the whole world in exchange for half the labor. Continue in the debt of the infinite, happy in its terms: the opposition of the whole world because you will not bargain. Do not listen, for then it is already too late — to disbelieve it. On the other hand, do not listen to what is lyingly said about enthusiasm, lest you be injured in another way, by believing it, as if every man who wills it is not equally near to the infinite, and hence equally near to becoming enthusiastic. For what is enthusiasm? Is it not merely being willing to do and suffer everything? Is it not also wishing always to remain in the debt of the infinite? For every time the arrow will speed forth, the bowstring must be tensed, but for every time the enthusiasm renews or in the renewal maintains its impetus, the infinitude of the debt must be kept in mind.

So too with love. If you wish to preserve love, then you must preserve it in the infinite debt. Guard yourself, therefore, against comparisons! One who watches over the most precious treasure in the world does not need to exercise so much caution to prevent anyone from learning to know about it; for you must also be on guard so that you yourself do not learn to know something about love through comparisons. Guard against comparison! Comparison affords the most fatal connection into which love can enter. Comparison is the most dangerous acquaintance love can establish. Comparison is the worst of all seducers. And no seducer is so swiftly at hand, and no seducer is so everywhere present as is the comparison as soon as your side-glance beckons — however, let no one seduced say in his own defense, “The comparison seduced me,” for he was the one who discovered the comparison. We all know how timidly, how ineffectively, and with how much difficulty a man walks when he knows he is walking on smooth ice; but we know, too, that if because of darkness or for some other reason he does not know that he is walking on it, then he steps forth quite firmly and confidently. Be on guard therefore against the comparison! Comparison is the adventitious sucker on the root which takes the strength from the tree: as if cursed the tree becomes a withered shadow, but the adventitious sucker flourishes in its unwholesome growth. Comparison may be likened to your neighbor’s marshy ground; even if your house is not built on it, all the surrounding ground also sinks. Comparison is like the hidden worm of secret consumption which does not die, at least not until it has taken the life of love. Comparison is a loathsome skin-eruption which strikes inward and consumes the marrow. Be vigilant, therefore, in your love against the comparison.

But if the comparison is the only thing which could get love out of debt, or which is ready to get it out of debt, and the comparison is avoided, then the love remains, sound and vital — in the infinite debt. Remaining in debt is an infinitely artful and yet infinitely satisfying expression for the infinitude of love. When one says about a force of nature, for instance, that it is blowing a gale, or that it bursts forth with an infinite power and force, there is always the possibility that it may cease or become exhausted. But that which infinitely in itself has also an infinite debt behind it, is a second time made infinite; it has in itself the vigilance which always takes care that it does not cease — the debt is the second time the accelerating force.

When it is a duty to remain in the indebtedness of love to one another, then the remaining in debt is not merely an enthusiastic expression, not a mere concept of love, but it is action; then the love remains, by the aid of duty, Christian love in action, in the haste of action, and just thereby in the infinite debt.

To love is to assume an infinite debt. The wish to remain in debt might seem to be only an interpretation of a concept of love, a last and most extreme expression which is incident to it — like the garlands at a festival. For even the most precious goblet filled with the choicest wine still lacks something: that the goblet be garlanded! And even the most lovable soul in the form of the most lovely woman — still lacks something: the bridal garland which perfects her! So it must also be said, when one talks merely humanly about love: this wish to remain in debt is the highest festal expression, it is the garland at the festival, something which in a certain sense makes no difference (for one certainly does not drink the enwreathed goblet, nor do the garlands become a part of the bride), and just for that reason it is the expression of the beautiful enthusiasm. Only in the human sense is a beautiful enthusiasm the highest.

But Christianity does not speak enthusiastically about love; it says it is a duty to remain in the debt of love, and it says this not as a giddy thought now for the last time and as the result of intoxication — for the wish to continue in debt would be an exaggerated expression, and yet it might possibly seem to become more exaggerated through being regarded as a duty. Even the exaggeration has, against its will, an appearance of paying off on the debt, but if it is a duty to remain in debt, then the impossibility soars even higher. It might seem like a case of intoxication, where a sudden moment of sobriety means an increase of intoxication; for enthusiasm becomes even more enthusiastic when it is expressed quietly and coolly; the marvellous becomes even more marvellous when it is described quite simply, as an ordinary event. But Christianity does not speak in this way. It speaks about remaining in debt in quite the same fervent way that a noble human love speaks about it, but it says it quite differently. Christianity simply makes no fuss over it; it is not, like the purely human interpretation of love, overwhelmed by the sight; no, it speaks equally as earnestly about it as about that which seems to a merely human enthusiasm entirely unlike it. It says it is a duty, and thereby it takes away from love everything inflaming, everything immediate, everything giddy.

Christianity says it is a duty to remain in debt, and means thereby that it involves action, not a mere expression about love, not a reflective interpretation of love. In the Christian sense no human being has ever accomplished the highest in love; and even if it were possible, this impossibility, there would at that very moment, from the Christian standpoint, be a new task. But if there is immediately a new task, then it is impossible to have time to know whether one has achieved the highest or not; for at the moment when one would get to know it, he is engaged in accomplishing the new task, and hence is prevented from knowing anything about the preceding moment, for which he has no time; he is occupied with the haste of action, whereas even in the moment of the greatest enthusiasm there is a certain lingering.

Christianity understands what action means, and how incessantly action is able to occupy love. The merely human interpretation of love admires love, and that is why it so easily comes to a standstill, a moment where there is nothing to do, an idle moment, that is the moment of enthusiasm. Love is to the merely human understanding as the extraordinarily gifted child is to the simple parents: the child finishes his task so quickly that the parents are at a loss to know what they can find to keep him busy. Love is to the merely human understanding of the conception, like the fiery snorting steed which quickly rides the horseman tired, instead of the horseman being able, if necessary, to ride his steed tired. And Christianity can do this. Its purpose is not to work love tired, far from it; but Christianity knows, by virtue of its eternal nature and by the earnestness of eternity, that it can master love, and therefore it speaks so simply, so earnestly, about the matter — just as the skilled horseman who knows that he can manage his horse, is not surprised at its mettle, for he says it ought to be mettlesome; and he does not destroy its spirit, but by training it he improves the horse. So Christianity knows how to constrain love, and to teach it that at every moment there is a task; it knows how to bear with love so that love may humbly learn that wishing to remain in debt is not a mere form of words, not merely enthusiasm, but that it is earnestness and truth.

The danger would be, as certainly happened, that love would come to dwell comparatively upon itself. This must be prevented, but when it is prevented by the aid of duty, something else also happens — love comes into a relation with the Christian concept, or in the Christian sense with the God-idea. This debt-relation is carried over into the relation between man and God. It is God who, so to speak, kindly takes charge of the demand of love; by loving a man the lover comes into an infinite debt — but also a debt to God as guardian of the beloved. Now comparison becomes impossible, and now love has found its master.

There is no more talk about festal moods and showy achievements; love will no longer, if I may speak thus, play on the childish stage of men, which leaves it doubtful whether it is jest or earnest. While love in all its own expressions turns outward toward men, where it has its object and its tasks, it still knows that this is not the place where it shall be judged, but that in its innermost being, where love lays hold on God, there is the judgment. It is as when a child is out among strangers, it behaves as it has been taught. But whether strangers think well of the child or not, whether it occurs to the child that it behaves better than the other children or not: the seriously trained child never loses sight of the fact that the decision will be made at home, where the parents do the judging. And yet the training is not planned for fitting the child to remain at home with its parents; on the contrary, it is planned to fit the child to go out into the world. So too with love when it is understood in the Christian way. It is, so to speak, God who trains the love in a man; but God does not do this just for His own pleasure, just to delight Himself with the sight. On the contrary. He does it in order then to send love out into the world, perpetually busy with its task. Nevertheless, the earnestly trained, the Christian love never for a moment forgets where it shall be judged; at evening, or morning, or whenever it may be, in short every time it temporarily leaves all its tasks in order to come home, it is catechized — in order to be immediately sent out again. For even with the greatest enthusiasm love may still tarry a little before it goes out again, but with God there is no tarrying.

Thus understood, earnestness and truth consist in remaining in the debt of love to each other. Even the most sincerely intended and, humanly speaking, the noblest enthusiasm, even the most fervent and disinterested enthusiasm, is still not earnestness, even though it accomplishes astonishing things, and even if it also wishes to remain in debt. The deficiency in even the noblest human enthusiasm is that it, as merely human, in the final analysis is not itself powerful, because it has no higher power over it. Only the God-relationship is earnest; the earnestness consists in forcing the task to its highest achievement because there is One who compels by the power of the eternal; the earnestness consists in the enthusiasm having power over itself and compulsion in itself. The individual is bound by his debt of love to other men; but it is neither the individual himself nor the other men who shall judge his love. If this is true, then must the individual remain in the infinite indebtedness. God has the infinite conception of truth and of the infallibility of love. God is love, hence the individual must remain in debt — as God judges him, or as he abides in God, for only in the infinitude of debt can God abide in him.

He is in debt, and he also recognizes that it is his duty to remain in debt, his duty to admit this, which from the Christian standpoint is not the admission of a fanatic, but of a humble, loving soul. The humility consists in making the confession; the loving, as it were, consists in being infinitely willing to make it because it belongs to love, because there is the meaning and coherence of eternal happiness in this confession, the Christian meaning consists in simply not ceasing to do this, because it is his duty.

"Therefore owe no man anything except to love one another"; no, "pay everyone everything which you owe them; tribute to whom tribute is due; duty to whom duty, fear to whom fear, honor to whom honor." In this way owe no man anything, not what you have borrowed from him, not what you have promised him, not what he might rightly demand of you in repayment. If possible, owe no man anything, no favors, no service, no sympathy in joy or sorrow, no forbearance of judgment, no assistance in life, no advice in danger, no sacrifice, not even the hardest — no, in all these, owe no man anything; but still remain in debt, which with all this you have by no means desired, and which before God you have by no means been able to pay, the debt of loving one another!

Oh, do this! And then only one thing more: "Remember in time that if you do this, or if you try to comply with this, then will things go ill, for you in the world." This is especially important to keep in mind with a particular reference to the conclusion of this discourse, and with a general reference to the conclusion of this little book, so that the discourse may not fascinate you with untruth. Therefore the world will simply find the conclusion entirely wrong, which fact again has significance in proving that the conclusion is — right.

We read and sometimes hear with sadness a Christian discourse which really leaves out the final danger. What is said about faith and love and humility is entirely right and wholly Christian; but nevertheless such a discourse may mislead a youth, instead of guiding him, because it neglects to tell him what happens to the Christian in the world. The discourse demands that a man shall work self-sacrificingly to develop his Christian nature — but then, yes then, there is no more said, or the supremely serious, more definite categories are suppressed, while such assertions are made that the good has its reward, that the good is loved both by God and man. If this Christian nature is rightly recommended as the highest, then the youth must surely believe that if he accomplishes the required task, or at least works honestly to accomplish it, then things will go well for him in the world. Oh, but this silence about the final difficulty (that, humanly speaking, it will go badly with him in the world, and so much more so as he develops his Christian character) Is a deception, which may either lead the youth to self-despair (as if the fault lay squarely in himself, because he was not a true Christian) or to his despondently giving up his struggle, as if something quite unusual had happened to him, while nevertheless he had only experienced the ordinary consequence which the apostle John refers to when he says: “Marvel not at this.” Consequently, the speaker has deceived the youth by keeping silent about the true sequence of events, as if, from the Christian standpoint, there were a conflict only in one place, instead of the true Christian struggle always being a twofold danger because there is a conflict in two places: first, in the inner man, where he must fight with himself, and then, when he has made progress in this conflict, outside of himself, where he must fight with the world. Alas, perhaps such a speaker is afraid to recommend the Christian and the good in this certainly strange but veracious way, by saying that it has no reward in the world, and that, moreover, the world always works against it. Perhaps it may seem to the speaker like smiting himself on his own — eloquent lips, if, after having recommended the good in the most laudatory and particularly fortunately chosen turns and expressions, and after having almost brought the listener to go out even this very day and act in accordance with his teaching, it may perhaps seem to him like smiting himself upon the lips, moreover, it would really be a sin, considering the impression produced by his inspired eloquence, if among his recommendations he should now interject this statement: that the good is rewarded with hate, contempt, and persecution. For, if this is true, would it not be more natural to warn against the good? To put it even more exactly, one does just this by recommending it in this way. The speaker is certainly in a difficult position. Well-intentioned perhaps, he really wishes to attract men: so he omits the final difficulty, the one which makes the recommendation so difficult — and then the discourse flows on, elevating and tear-compelling in its polished delivery. Ah, but this, as everyone knows, is deception. If, on the contrary, the speaker makes use of — the difficult recommendation, then he "frightens his audience away," perhaps the speech almost frightens himself. He, who is so highly popular, honoured and appreciated, certainly proves that the good Christian has his reward in the world. He has, namely, his reward, even if eternity believes ten times over that he has lost it. It cannot be denied that he has a reward, but a somewhat worldly one, and it is not the compensation which Christianity at the time had promised its adherents, and by which it had directly recommended itself.

We should truly hate to make a youth conceited, and early teach him to form the habit of judging the world; God forbid that any word of ours should be able to contribute to the development of such unsoundness in a man. We believe in making his inner life so strenuous that from the very beginning he learns to think otherwise; for it is certainly a perverted hatred of the world which, possibly without even having once considered the tremendous responsibility involved, wishes to be persecuted. But, on the other hand, we should truly hate to deceive a youth by keeping silent about the difficulty and keeping silent at the very moment when we are trying to recommend the Christian way of life, for then and just then is the time to speak. Confidently and fearlessly we dare to recommend the Christian way of life, and to add that its reward, to put it mildly, will be the ingratitude of the world. We regard it as our duty to say this in time, so that we may not sometimes recommend Christianity by omitting any of its essential difficulties, and at other times, perhaps because of some particular text, find some ground of comfort for it in the life attempted. No, just at the time when the Christian way is being most strongly recommended, the difficulty must be simultaneously emphasized. It is unchristian sophistry if anyone reasons in this way: "Let us use every means to win men to the Christian way of life, and then when sometime adversities come upon them, then we shall have the remedy, then will be the time to speak about it." But this is the deception: that it might be possible for a Christian to escape these adversities, just as some people are fortunate in not being tried by poverty or sickness. That is, it places the opposition of the world in an accidental relation to the Christian way, not in an essential relation: opposition may perhaps come, but then again it may not. However, such a consideration is absolutely unchristian. If a pagan may rightly deem himself fortunate at his death because he was through with life and past all adversities, well, that is possible; but a Christian ought to be a little doubtful in this joy at the moment of death — for from the Christian standpoint, the opposition of the world has an essential relation to Christian inwardness. Besides, in the very moment of choosing Christianity, one should have an impression of its difficulties, so that he may know what it is he is choosing. Nothing should be promised the youth except what Christianity can hold to, but Christianity cannot hold to anything other than what it has promised from the beginning: the world's ingratitude, opposition, insults, and always increasingly so, the more earnestly Christian one becomes. This is the final difficulty in the Christian way of life, and least of all must there be silence about it when one is recommending Christianity.

No, if there is to be silence regarding the final difficulty, then there is really nothing to be said about the Christian way of life. If the world is not as Christianity originally assumed it to be, then is Christianity essentially abolished. That which Christianity calls self-denial simply and essentially implies a double danger, otherwise the self-denial is not Christian self-denial. Therefore, if anyone can show that the world or Christendom have now become essentially good, as if they were the eternal, then I can also show that the Christian self-denial is made impossible and Christianity abolished, just as it will be abolished in eternity, where it will cease to be a striving.

A merely human self-denial thinks as follows: give up your selfish wishes, desires and plans — then you will be honoured and respected and loved as just and wise. It is easy to see that this sort of self-denial does not lay hold of God or the God-relationship, but remains on the worldly plane of a relationship between men. The Christian self-denial thinks: give up your selfish wishes and desires, give up your selfish plans and purposes in order to work for the good in true disinterestedness — and then prepare to find yourself, just on that account, hated, scorned and mocked, and even executed as a criminal; or rather, do not prepare to find yourself in this situation, for that may become necessary, but choose it of your own free will. For Christian self-denial knows beforehand that these things will happen, and chooses them freely. Christianity has the eternal understanding of what it costs to give up its own selfish purposes; therefore it does not let the Christian go for half-price. One can readily see that the Christian self-denial lays hold on God, and in God has its only stronghold. But only thus is Christian self-denial to be relied upon — in the double danger. The other danger, or the danger in another place, is precisely the guarantee that the self-denial has the right God-relationship, that it is purely a God-relationship. And if there were no other double danger except that of wishing thus to be relied upon, the world regards as stupidity or folly that which it is very far from honoring and admiring. The world understands self-denial only as shrewdness, and therefore honors only the self-denial which shrewdly remains within the compass of the worldly. Therefore the worldly always sees to it that there shall be an adequate number of the counterfeit notes of the false self-denial in circulation; alas! and sometimes the crossing of the ratios and thoughts becomes so complicated that it needs an expert eye immediately to detect the counterfeit notes. For one can also take God along secularly into worldliness, and hence get a self-denial which bears the God-mark and yet is a forgery. Secularly it may sometimes look as if it is called to deny itself for the sake of God, yet not in that reliable confidence in God of the double danger, but in such a way that worldliness understands that man and honors him accordingly. Yet it is easy to recognize the forgery, for as soon as the double mark is lacking, then the self-denial is not the Christian self-denial.

It is human self-denial when a child denies himself while the arms of the parents encouragingly and promptly open to it. It is human self-denial if a man denies himself, and the world now opens its arms to him. But it is Christian self-denial if a man denies himself, and then, just because the world for that reason closes its arms to him, repulsed by the world he now must seek confidence in God. The twofold danger lies in the fact that he met opposition just where he had expected to find help, and consequently he must turn twice, instead of, as in human self-denial turning but once. No self-denial, therefore, which is encouraged by the world, is Christian self-denial. This was the meaning of the early Church Fathers when they said that all the virtues of the heathen were shining vices. It is merely human self-denial: without fear for one’s self or for the consequences, to rush into danger — into a danger where honor awaits the victor, where the admiration of the environment, of the spectators, allures the one who only dares. It is easy to see that this self-denial does not lay hold on God, but is delayed by human relativities. Christian self-denial rushes into danger without fear of the consequences to itself, into a danger which the environment cannot understand will bring any honor to the victor, because the environment is itself blinded, entangled and guilty. Consequently, it is not only perilous to rush into the danger, but there is here a double danger because the contempt of the spectators awaits the hero, whether he wins or loses.

In the one instance the idea of danger is conceded; the environment is agreed that there is danger, danger in venturing, and hence honor to gain by victory, since the conception of the danger has made his contemporaries ready to applaud the one who dares. In the second case the hero must himself discover the danger and strive to get the right to call it danger, which his contemporaries are not willing to do, who, although they admit that it is possible to lose one's life in this danger, yet deny that it is really danger, since from their point of view it is ridiculous, and hence it is doubly ridiculous to lose one's life for the sake of something ridiculous. Thus Christianity discovered a danger which is called everlasting perdition. The world found this danger ridiculous. Let us now imagine a Christian witness. For the sake of this doctrine he rushes into a struggle with the powerful who hold his life in their hands, and who must look upon him as an agitator — a fact which will cost him his life. At the same time his contemporaries, with whom he has no immediate quarrel, but who are spectators, find it ridiculous that anyone should risk death for such foolishness. Here is life to lose and truly no honor or admiration to gain! Still, thus to be forsaken, only thus to be forsaken, is Christian self-denial. If now the world, or Christendom, had been essentially good, then this self-denial would have been impossible; for under such conditions the world, as essentially good, would honor and praise the one who denied himself and who always had the true conception of where the danger was and what it truly was.

Therefore we wish to end this discourse like all our discourses which, according to the ability vouchsafed us, recommend the godly life, with this little ingratiating word of exhortation: watch yourself at the beginning of your task — lest you find that you are not truly in earnest in truly wishing to deny yourself. Our understanding of what Christianity is, is too serious to wish to entice anyone; we would almost rather warn against it. He who in truth will appropriate the Christian teaching, he will yet come to experience inward terrors quite different from the bit of terror dramatically set forth in a discourse; he must make an outward resolution quite different from one he could make by the aid of the painted falsity of a bit of eloquence. We leave it to anyone to decide whether this, our earnest understanding of what Christianity means, could seem cold, cheerless and lacking in enthusiasm.

So far as one might speak of his own personal relation to the world, since this would be a different matter, it would be one's duty to speak as mildly, as apologetically as possible, and even if one does speak, it is his duty to remain in the debt of love. But when we speak instructively we dare not keep silent, a fact that is little calculated to win favor for the discourse in the longing understanding of an enthusiastic youth. Nor dare we recommend, smilingly to wish to elevate himself above the world's opposition and folly; if this could be done as it is done in heathendom, it can only be done in heathendom, because the heathen does not have the true Christian's earnest, eternally concerned conception of the truth: yet to the truth it is by no means ridiculous that others do not have it. From the Christian point of view the world's essential foolishness is not at all ridiculous, however ridiculous it is; for when there is an eternal happiness to win or lose, then it is neither a jest if I win it, nor laughable if someone loses it.

On the other hand, it would be an absurdity we should guard against, to speak complacently about the Christian truth. If a man were handing another man a terribly sharp, polished two-edged tool, would he hand it to him with the manner, bearing and gestures with which he would hand him a bouquet of flowers? Would not this be a crazy thing to do? How does one do it? If he is certain of the dangerous nature of the tool, while he may recommend it unhesitatingly, he also adds a word of caution. And so with the Christian truth. If necessary we should not hesitate, conscious of the greatest responsibility, in our Christian preaching, precisely in our Christian preaching, to preach against Christianity. For we know perfectly well in these times how anything unpleasant stings, so that the preacher by foolish and flattering sermons has tricked Christianity into becoming an illusion and us men into imagining that as such we are Christians. Still, if a man had thought that he was holding a flower in his hand, a flower which he half foolishly, half thoughtlessly has enjoyed looking at, and then someone, with truth, remember, cried to him, "You fool, do you not see that you are holding a terribly sharp, polished, two-edged tool!" — would he not for a moment be horrified? But, but — did the one who truthfully said that, deceive him or the truth? If someone were to call that man's attention to the fact that the flower he held in his hand was no common, ordinary flower, but a very rare one, this would again be to confirm him more strongly in his misunderstanding. No, Christianity is not from the human point of view the extremely rare blossom, nor is it the rarest of all — so the sermon becomes pagan and worldly within the limitations of the merely human understanding. Divinely understood, Christianity is the highest good, and therefore also, humanly understood, a tremendously dangerous good, because when only humanly understood, it is so far from being the rare flower that it is offense and foolishness, now as once in the beginning, and as long as the world stands.

Wherever the Christian religion is, there is the possibility of offense, but offense is the supreme danger. Everyone who has in truth appropriated the Christian teaching, or something of it, has been obliged thus to pass by the possibility of offense so that he has seen it, and with it before his eyes — has chosen the Christian way. If Christianity is to be discussed, the discourse must constantly hold the possibility of offense open, but hence it can never bring itself to recommend Christianity immediately, so the difference between the speakers would merely be that one used a stronger, a second a weaker, a third the strongest possible expression of praise. Christianity can only be recommended if at every point the possibility of the danger is constantly made manifest: that to the merely human understanding the Christian way is foolishness and offense. But by making this clear and explicit, the warning is given. So earnest is Christianity. Whatever stands in need of men's applause immediately tries to curry favor with them; but Christianity is so certain of itself, and recognizes with such earnestness and severity that it is men who need it, that just for that reason it does not recommend itself directly, but first startles them — just as Christ early commended Himself to His disciples by predicting to them that they would be hated for His sake; that the one who smote them would think that he was doing God service.

When Christianity came into the world it was not necessary for it to call attention to the fact (although it did so) that it would be a source of offense, for the world which was offended, discovered this soon enough. But now, now since the world has become Christian, now must Christianity first of all look out for offense. If it is therefore true that so many "Christians" in these times are disappointed in Christianity, how does this happen except because the possibility of offense escapes them, this frightfulness, please notice!

What wonder, then, that Christianity and its eternal happiness and its duties are no longer able to satisfy the "Christians" — they cannot even be offended by them!

When Christianity came into the world it was not necessary even for it to call attention to the fact that it was contrary to human reason (although it did so), for the world discovered this readily enough. But now, now, since Christianity has lived through hundreds of years in the complex intercourse with the human reason; now, since a fallen Christianity, like those fallen angels who married earthly women — has entered into a marriage with the human reason; now, since Christianity and reason have become on "du" terms: now Christianity must ever be on the watch for offense. If Christianity (alas! this sounds like the fairy story about the palace under enchantment for a hundred years) is to be preached out of the enchantment and the deformed metamorphosis of delusion, then must first the possibility of offense again be revived as the basis of preaching. Only the possibility of offense (the antidote against the sleeping potion of apologetics) is able to wake the slumberer, able to overcome the enchantment, so that Christianity may again be itself.

If then the Holy Scriptures say, "Woe to the one by whom the offense cometh," then we can confidently say, "Woe to the one who first hit upon the idea of preaching Christianity without the possibility of offense." Woe to the one who in ingratiating, amorous, attractive, convincing words foisted off something unworthy of men as Christianity! Woe to the one who would make a miracle comprehensible, or at least suggest that there were clear probabilities of soon being able to do so! Woe to the one who betrayed and broke the secret of faith, corrupted it into a popular wisdom by taking the possibility of offense away! Woe to the one who would lay hold on the secret of the atonement without perceiving the possibility of offense, and again, woe to him because he thought thereby to make God and Christianity into an esthetic coterie! Woe to all those faithless stewards who sat down and falsified their records, and thereby gained friends for Christianity and themselves by writing off the possibility of offense in Christianity, and imputed to it a hundred kinds of foolishness! Oh, what a sorry waste of ability and shrewdness! Oh, what an appalling waste of time spent on the tremendous task of defending Christianity! Truly, when Christianity again arises in its power through the possibility of offense, then will this horror again scare men up: then will Christianity need no defense.

And, on the other hand, the more scholarly, the more excellent the defense is, the more is Christianity corrupted, done away with, shrunken like a half-man. For the defense wishes out of the goodness of its heart, to take the possibility of offense away. But Christianity will not be defended; rather it is men who should look to it to learn whether they are able to defend themselves and defend for themselves that which they choose, when Christianity sometime terribly offers them the choice, and terribly forces them to choose: either to be offended or to accept Christianity. Therefore, take away from Christianity the possibility of offense, or else take away from the forgiveness of sins the anxious debate of conscience (to which still, according to Luther's excellent explanation, this whole matter must be referred), and then lock the churches, the sooner the better, or make them into recreation centers which stand open all day.

But while the whole world has been made Christian through the taking away the possibility of offense: the strange circumstance constantly manifests itself: that the world is offended at the real Christian. Here the offense enters, if the possibility of offense is still inseparable from the Christian belief. Only the confusion becomes worse than ever; for if once the world was offended at Christianity — there was meaning in that; but now the world has the illusion that it is Christian, that it has appropriated Christianity, without paying any attention to the possibility of offense — and so it is offended at the real Christian. Truly, escape from such a delusion is difficult. Woe to the swift pens and busy tongues, woe to all the busyness which because it neither knows the one nor the other, therefore finds it so infinitely easy to reconcile both the one and the other!

The Christian world is always offended by the true Christian. Only now the passion of offense is not ordinarily so strong that it wishes to eradicate him; no, it will only continue to mock and insult him. This is easy to explain. At the time when the world was itself conscious of not being Christian, then there was something to fight about, then it was a fight to the death. But now, when the world is proudly and calmly certain that it is Christian, the true Christian insistence is merely something to laugh at. The confusion is even more distressing than in the first period of Christianity. That was distressing, but there was meaning in it, since the world was fighting to the death against Christianity. But the world's present lofty calmness in its consciousness of being Christian, its cheap bit of mockery, if one wishes to call it that — of the real Christian: this almost borders on madness. For never in its first period was Christianity thus made the object of ridicule.

If then in this Christian world a man's only desire is to fight to perfect his duty in remaining in the debt of love to everyone: then he will be swept out into the last difficulty, and will have the opposition of the world to fight against. Alas, the world seldom or never thinks of God; that is the reason why it completely misunderstands every life whose most essential and steadfast thought is precisely the thought of God, the thought about where, divinely understood, the danger is, and what is required of a man! Therefore the Christian world is apt to say about the true Christian in this respect: "See how he gives himself up; even there where he is manifestly the injured party, it is almost as if he were the one who begs for forgiveness." The world will in him — Christianly (for the world is indeed Christian) feel the lack of the requisite — Christian hard-heartedness, which busies itself with asserting its right to assert itself, to repay evil with evil, or at least busies itself with the proud consciousness of doing good.

The world simply does not notice that such a man has a totally different standard for his life, and that this explains the whole procedure quite simply, while, explained according to the world's standard, it becomes quite meaningless. But since the world does not realize and does not wish to realize that this standard, the God-relationship, exists, hence it cannot explain such a man's conduct as anything except a peculiarity — for the fact that it is Christian conduct naturally cannot occur to the world, which as Christian certainly best knows what Christianity is. It is odd for a man not to be self-seeking; it is odd that he does not quarrel; it is odd and foolish in him to forgive his enemy, and to be almost afraid that he does not do enough for his enemy; it is odd that he always sticks at the wrong place, never where it appears to his advantage to be courageous, high-minded and disinterested: this is odd, far-fetched and stupid, in short, rather laughable, since one just by virtue of being in the world, is certain, as a Christian, to possess the true and eternal happiness both here and hereafter.

The world has no conception, except at most a very remote conception of a great solemn festival, that the God-relationship exists, to say nothing of its daily determining a man's life — therefore it can judge in no other way. The invisible law determining such a man's life, its suffering and its happiness, simply does not exist for the world: ergo its most lenient explanation of such a life is that it is an oddity, just as we call it madness if a man is incessantly looking about for a bird which none of the rest of us can see; or if a man dances — to music which no other man except himself, even by straining his ears, can possibly hear; or if a man in walking turns aside from his path because of some — invisible barrier. And this, too, is madness. For a bird which is really present, cannot be invisibly present, any more than actual music can be inaudible, or an obstruction on one's path which makes it necessary to go out of the way, can be invisible. But God can only be invisibly and inaudibly present, so the fact that the world does not see Him still does not prove very much.

Let me illustrate this relationship by means of a simple metaphor which I have frequently used, even though for a different purpose, because it is so fertile, so suggestive, so significant. If a strictly disciplined child is in the company of rude or less well-trained children, and it will not share with them in their rude behavior, which to them does not seem in general to be rudeness: the naughty children do not know any way of explaining his behavior except to say that the child must be odd or foolish. They do not realize that his behavior may be explained in another way, in that, wherever he is, the strictly trained child always has its parents' standard in mind to help it decide what it dares and what it dares not do. If the parents were visibly present, so that the rude children saw them, then they would be better able to understand the child, especially so, if it also seemed to resent having to obey the admonition of its parents; for that would show them that the child would be only too glad to act as the rude children did; and it would be easy enough to see what held the child back. But when the parents are not present, the rude children cannot understand the strictly trained child. They think as follows; either that child does not enjoy the things the rest of us do, which makes it stupid or odd; or it perhaps enjoys them well enough, but does not dare to — yet, why not? The parents are not present, so it really must be stupid and peculiar. One can, therefore, by no means call it mischievousness or badness in the less polite children that they judge the more strictly trained child in this way. Oh, no, perhaps in their way their intentions are good, they mean well by it. They do not understand the strictly trained child, they enjoy themselves as they are, and therefore they want him to play with them and be a real boy — like the others.

The application of this metaphor is easy to make. The world simply cannot get it into its head (and this is no accident) that a Christian should not have the same pleasures and passions as the world has. But if he does have them, then the world can still less get it into its head why he, from fear of an invisible Being, will foolishly, according to worldly ideas, restrain the innocent and permissible pleasures which it is even “a duty to enjoy”; why he will restrain the selfishness which the world not only calls innocent but praiseworthy; why he will restrain the resentment which the world not only regards as natural but as a sign of his manliness and honor; why he will make himself doubly unhappy, first by failing to satisfy his desires, and next by being ridiculed by the world as a reward of his self-denial.

One easily sees that self-denial is here rightly marked; it has the double sign. Just because this is so, because quite rightly the one who earnestly seeks to obey will fall into double danger: that is why we say that it is the duty of Christians to remain in the debt of love to each other.

VOLUME TWO

I. LOVE EDIFIETH

BUT LOVE EDIFIETH. — I Corinthians 8:1

ALL HUMAN SPEECH, even the divine speech of the Holy Scriptures about spiritual matters, is essentially metaphorical. And this is quite proper as regards existence in general, since, although from the moment of his birth man is spirit, he does not become conscious of himself as spirit until later, and so sensuo-psychically he has already lived through a certain period of his life before the spiritual awakening. But this first period will not then be discarded when the soul awakens, just as little as the soul's awakening will proclaim itself in a sensuous or sensuo-psychical manner as against the sensuous and sensuo-psychical. That first period is simply taken over by the spirit, and thus employed, thus made the foundation, it becomes the metaphorical. The spiritual man and the sensuo-psychical man therefore in a certain sense say the same thing. Yet there is an infinite difference, since the latter does not suspect the secret of the figurative expression, although he nevertheless uses the same word, but not figuratively. There is a world of difference between the two; the one has made the transition, or has allowed himself to be carried over to that side, while the second remains on this side; yet there is a bond between them because they both use the same expression. The one in whom the soul has awakened, has not, therefore, abandoned the visible world; he is always, although conscious of being spirit, in the visible world, and even sensuously visible: so he also continues to use the same language except that it has become metaphorical. But the metaphorical expression is not a brand-new word; on the contrary, it is an ordinary word. As the spirit is invisible, so too is its language secret, and the secret lies precisely in the fact that it uses the same word as the child and the common man, but it uses it figuratively, whereby the spirit denies that it is the sensuous or the sensuo-psychical, but does not deny it in a sensuous or sensuo-psychical manner. The difference is by no means a conspicuous difference. We rightly regard it, therefore, as a sign of false spirituality to make a parade of the conspicuous distinction — which is the sign of the purely sensuous, whereas the essence of the spirit is the quiet, whispering secrecy of the metaphorical — to the one who has ears to hear with.

One of the figurative expressions which the Holy Scripture frequently makes use of, or one of the words which the Holy Scripture most frequently uses figuratively, is: to build, to edify. And it is really — yes, it is very edifying to see how the Holy Scripture does not tire of this word, how it does not spiritually desire changes and new turns of expression, but that, on the contrary, how that which is the true essence of the spirit refashions the thought in the same word! And it is — yes, it is very edifying to see how the Scripture by the use of this simple word is able to indicate the highest and that in the most inward manner; it is like that miracle of feeding the multitude with a limited supply, which nevertheless through the blessing became so richly abundant that there was left a superfluity! And it is — aye, it is edifying, if someone succeeds, instead of busying himself in making new discoveries which will busily supplant the old, in being humbly satisfied with the Scriptural words, in thankfully and inwardly appropriating to himself the traditions of the early Fathers, in establishing a new acquaintance — with the old acquaintances. As children we have all frequently played “Stranger”: truly, this is exactly earnestness, spiritually understood, to be able to continue this edifying jest in earnest, to play “Stranger” with old acquaintances.

To edify is a figurative expression; however, we shall now, with that secrecy of the spirit in mind, see what this word signifies in ordinary use.

To edify is formed from the verb “to build” [at bygge] and the adverb “up” [op] on which latter the emphasis must consequently be placed. Everyone who upbuilds builds, but not everyone who builds up. For instance, if a man builds a wing to his house we do not say that he builds up a wing, but that he builds an addition. This “up” seems consequently to indicate direction in height, direction upward. Yet this does not quite express it. Thus if a man carries a building which is sixty feet high twenty feet higher, we do not say that he builds up his house twenty feet higher; we say that he builds an addition. Now we begin to see the application of the word, for it seems that it does not depend on the height. On the contrary, if a man built a house, even if it was only a little, low house, but he built it from scratch, then we say he built [up] a house. To build [up] is consequently to build something from scratch. This “up” indicates a certain direction as height; but only when height is also depth reversed do we say “build up. So that if a man builds up in height and from scratch, but the depth below ground does not quite correspond to the height, then we certainly say that he builds up, or simply that he builds, although by “simply building” we understand something different. Thus the emphasis is in relation to the fact of building, in building from scratch. We do not call building in the ground building up, we do not speak of building a well. But if we speak about building up, then no matter how high or how low the building is, it must he from scratch. We may therefore say that a man began to build a house, but he did not finish. On the contrary, we can never say that a man, however much he may have added to the height of the building, if it was not built from scratch, built it.

How strange! This “up” in the word “upbuilding” means height, but height as contrary to depth; for to build up is to start from the beginning. Therefore the Scriptures say of the man of little understanding, that he “built without a foundation”; but of the man who hears the word in true edification, or, as the Scriptures have it, the one who hears the word and acts accordingly, that he is like a man who built his house and “digged deep.” When, therefore, the waters came and the winds blew and beat upon this dependably built house, then we all rejoiced at the edifying sight that the storms could not shake it. Alas, for, as was said with reference to building up, it particularly depends on building on a foundation.

It is commendable that a man, before he starts to build, should reflect on “how high he will be able to build his tower,” but if he decides to build, then let him take care to dig deep; for even if the tower, if that were possible, reached to the clouds, if it were without a foundation it was not really built. To build absolutely without a foundation is impossible, it is building in the air. Therefore we are grammatically correct when we talk about building air castles; we do not say “building up air castles,” which would be a careless and absurd use of language. For even in expressing the insignificant, there must be harmony between the individual words, such as is not present between “in the air,” and “to build up,” since the first takes the foundation away, and the latter dispenses with “foundation”; the combination then would be a false overstatement.

This explains the expression “to build up” in simple unfigurative language. Let us now consider it as a figurative expression, and pass over to the subject of this reflection:

LOVE EDIFIETH.

But is that word “edifying,” when spiritually understood, such a characteristic adjective for love, that it exclusively belongs to it? It is always quite possible, as regards an adjective, that there are many objects which equally, or even if in varying degrees, still have a claim to this same adjective. If this were the case with “edifying,” it would be particularly wrong to emphasize its use, as this reflection does, in its relation to love; it would be an attempt of misunderstanding to impute to love a presumption, as if it wished exclusively to usurp to its own use that which it shared with others — and which love is precisely willing to share with others, since "it never seeks its own." Nevertheless, it is truly so that "edifying" is exclusively characteristic of love; but, on the other hand, this quality of edifying has also the characteristic, that it is able to sacrifice itself in everything, be present in everything — exactly like love. Thus one sees that love in this, its own characteristic quality, does not isolate itself, or boast of independence and caution in comparison with others, but absolutely surrenders itself; its characteristic is exactly that it has the exclusive quality of absolutely sacrificing itself. There is nothing, simply nothing, which cannot be said or done so that it becomes edifying; but whatever it is, if it is edifying, then is love present. Therefore we hear the admonition just at the point where a man himself admits the difficulty of formulating definite rules, "Do everything for edification." It might equally well say, "Do everything in love," and have expressed exactly the same meaning. One man may do exactly the opposite of what another man does, but if they each do the opposite — in love, the opposite is edifying. There is no word in the language which is edifying in itself, and there is no word in the language which cannot be spoken edifyingly and become edifying when love is present. It is therefore, then, very far (alas, it is simply an unkind and divisive error) from being the case that edifying is a privilege of the individually gifted, like art and poetry and beauty and other such things; on the contrary, every man by his life and his behavior, by the conduct of his daily life, by his association with his equals, by his words and utterances, ought to and might be equally edifying, and would be so, if he really had love.

We ourselves are also aware of this, for we use the word "edifying" with the widest possible latitude; but what we do not ourselves perhaps realize is that we nevertheless only use it in connection with the idea of love. Still this constitutes the right usage: to be meticulous not to use this word except in connection with love, and within this limitation to make its range illimitable; then everything can be edifying in the same sense that love can be present everywhere.

Thus when we see a single man with praiseworthy frugality carefully making a little suffice, then we honor and commend him; we rejoice; it confirms our sense of the good. But we do not really call it an edifying sight. On the contrary, when we see how a mother, who has many to care for, by frugality and wise economy affectionately knows how to bless the little so that there is enough for all: then we say it is an edifying sight. The edification lies in the fact that at the same time that we see the frugality and economy which we honor, we also see the mother’s loving care. On the contrary, we say that it is but little edifying, that it is a distressing sight, to see one who in a way starves in the midst of plenty, and who yet has nothing at all left for others. We say it is a shocking thing to see, we are disgusted with his luxury, we tremble at the idea of the horrible revenge of self-indulgence — the starving in the midst of plenty; but the fact that we look in vain for the least expression of love, confirms our belief that it is little edifying.

When we see a large family crowded into a small apartment, and we nevertheless see it living in a comfortable, friendly — roomy apartment, then we say that it is an edifying sight, because we see the love which must be in the individuals and in each one of them, since one unfriendly one would be enough to make the whole place seem crowded; we say it because we see that there is always house-room where there is heart-room. And, on the other hand, it is very little edifying to find an uneasy spirit dwelling in a palace, unable to find rest in a single one of the many rooms, and yet not able to spare or dispense with the smallest closet.

Moreover, what is there which may not be thus edifying! We do not think of the sight of a man asleep as edifying. And yet, if you see a child sleeping on its mother's breast — and you see the mother-love, see that she seems to have waited for and now is using the moment while the child is sleeping, truly to rejoice over it, because she hardly dares let the child see how unspeakably she loves it: then this becomes an edifying sight. If the mother's love is not in evidence, if you look in vain in her face and expression to discover the least expression of the joy of mother-love or solicitude for the child; if you see only stolid indifference, as if she would be glad to be rid of the child: then the sight is not edifying. To see the child sleeping by itself is a friendly, a pleasant, a gratifying sight, but it is not edifying. If you wish to call everything edifying, then it is because you see love present everywhere; it is because you see the love of God hovering over the child. — To see a great artist perfecting his work is a glorious, an elevating experience, but it is not edifying. Suppose this masterpiece was marvellous — if now the artist, out of his love for a man, smashed it to pieces: then the sight would be edifying.

Wherever the edifying is, there is love; and everywhere love is, there is the edifying. Therefore Paul says that a man without love, though he speak with the tongues of men and of angels, is like sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal. What, too, can be less edifying than a tinkling cymbal? The worldly, however glorious and however vociferous it is, is nevertheless without love, and therefore it is not edifying; the most insignificant word, the slightest act with love or in love, is edifying. Therefore knowledge puffeth up. And yet knowledge and the communication of knowledge may also be edifying; but if it is, it is because there is love. To commend one's self seems little edifying, and yet even this too may be edifying. Does not Paul sometimes do it? But he does it in love, and, as he himself says, "for edification." It would therefore be the emptiest of all speeches to talk about what can be edifying, since everything can be so; it would be the emptiest of all, just as it is the most distressing accusation which can be brought against the world, that one sees and hears so little that is edifying. Whether it is rare to see wealth is neither here nor there; we should rather see a general well-being. If it is rare to see a masterpiece, oh, well, in a certain sense that makes no difference, and, as far as that goes, men for the most part care little about it. It is otherwise with edifying. At any given moment there are countless numbers of men living; it is possible that everything which any man says, everything which any man undertakes, may be edifying: alas, and yet it is so rare to see or hear anything edifying!

Love edifies. Let us now consider that which we developed in the introduction to this discourse, whereby we at once assured ourselves against the danger of the discourse falling into error through choosing an insuperable task, since everything can be edifying. To edify is to build on some foundation. In the simple story about a house, a building, everyone knows what is understood by the ground and the foundation. But what is, spiritually understood, the ground and the foundation of the spiritual life which shall support the building? It is simply love; love is the origin of everything, and, spiritually understood, love is the deepest foundation of the spiritual life. Spiritually understood, the foundation is laid in every man in whom there is love. And the building which, spiritually understood, will be erected is again love; and it is love who does the building. Love edifies, and this means that love builds it up. In this way the task is limited; the discourse does not spread out on the individual and the manifold; it does not in confusion begin on something which it must quite arbitrarily break off somewhere in order to finish; no, it centers itself and its attention on the essential, on one and the same thing in all the manifold. The talk is first and last about love, just because the fact of edifying is love’s most characteristic purpose. Love is the foundation, love is the building, love edifies. The act of edifying is the building up of love, and it is love which edifies. It is true we sometimes speak in a general sense about edifying; we use the word in contrast to the corruption which would only tear down, or in contrast to the confusion which can merely tear down and divide; about the fact that it is the clever man who edifies, the one who knows how to direct and lead, the one who knows so well how to instruct in his line, the one who is master of his art Every such person builds up in contrast to tearing down. But all of this building up of knowledge, of insight, of ingenuity, of righteousness and so on, is still, insofar as it does not build up love, not edification in the deepest sense. For, spiritually, love is the foundation, and to edify is to build on this foundation.

Consequently when the speech is about the work of love in edifying, this must then either indicate that the lover implants love in another man's heart; or it must indicate that the lover presupposes that love already exists in the other man's heart, and just through this presupposition, he builds up the love in him — radically, insofar as he affectionately presupposes love at bottom. One or the other of these conditions is necessary for edifying. But I wonder if one man can implant love in another man's heart? No, this is a superhuman relation, an unthinkable relation between man and man; in this sense human love cannot edify. It is God, the Creator, who must implant love in every man. He who is Himself love. It is therefore unkind and by no means edifying, for someone presumptuously to imagine himself as wishing and being able to create love in the other man; all busy and self-important zeal in this respect neither builds up love, nor is itself edifying. The first relationship would be unthinkable for edifying; hence, we must consider the second relationship — between man and God. Thus we have gained the explanation of what it means, that love edifies, on which explanation we shall now reflect: the lover presupposes that there is love in the other man's heart, and just through this presupposition he builds up the love in him — on that foundation, insofar as he affectionately presupposes that it exists at bottom.

The speech can then not be about what the lover, who wishes to edify, will now do to transform the other man, or to force the love forth in him, but it is about how the lover edifyingly constrains himself. Certainly this is already edifying, to see how the lover edifies by constraining himself! Only the non-lover imagines that he is able to edify by constraining the other; the lover constantly presupposes that love is present, and just by this he is edifying. A builder thinks little about the stone and gravel he will use in building; a teacher presupposes that the pupil is ignorant; a disciplinarian presupposes that the other man is perverted: but the lover who edifies has but one course — to presuppose love; what further he constantly has to do is only constantly to constrain himself to presuppose love. Thus he lures the good forth, he encourages love, he edifies. For love can be and will only be treated in one way, by being loved forth; to love it forth is to edify. But to love it forth consists exactly in presupposing that it is basically present. Men can therefore be tempted to become master-builders, to become teachers, to become disciplinarians, because those things seem to imply having control over others; but to edify, as love does, cannot tempt one, for that means exactly to be the servant; therefore only love has the desire to edify because it is willing to serve. — The master-builder can point to his work and say, "That is my work"; the teacher can point to his pupil; but the love which edifies has nothing to point at, for its work consists only in presupposing it.

Again, this is very edifying to consider. Suppose the lover succeeded in building up love in another man; when the building stands there, the lover stands aside by himself, abashed he says, "I have always presupposed this." Alas, the lover has no merit at all. The building up of love is not like a monument to the master-builder's art, or, like the pupil who is a reminder of the teacher's instruction; the lover has done nothing, he has only presupposed that there was love at bottom. The lover works so quietly and so soberly, and yet the forces of eternity are in motion. Love humbly makes itself inconspicuous just when it is working hardest; aye, its labor is as if it did nothing at all. Alas, to busyness and worldliness this is the greatest folly conceivable, the idea that, in a way, doing nothing at all should be the hardest work. And yet it is true. For it is more difficult to rule one's own spirit than to take a city, and more difficult to edify as love edifies, than to carry out the most marvellous undertaking. If it is difficult for one to rule one's own spirit, then how difficult to annihilate one's self completely in one's relation to another man, and still do everything and suffer everything! If it would ordinarily be difficult to begin without the presupposition, truly the most difficult of all is to begin to edify with the presupposition that love is present, and to end with the same presupposition, so that one's entire labor is discounted in advance, since the presupposition from first to last involves self-denial, or that the master-builder be hidden and as nothing. The only thing with which we are able to compare this edification of love is the secret working of nature. Man sleeps, but the forces of nature rest not either night or day: no one considers how they go on — while all take delight in the beauty of the fields and the fruit of the pastures. So is love manifest in the same way; it presupposes that love is present like the germ in the corn, and if it succeeds in bringing that to growth, then has the love concealed itself, as if it were hidden, whereas it was working early and late. Nevertheless, this is the edifying wonder in nature: you see all this glory and then it impresses you edifyingly if you happen to consider how strange it was that you did not see at all the one who produced it. If you could see God with the sensual eye, if He, if I dare say this, stood by your side and said: "I produced all this!" then would the edification have disappeared.

Love edifies by presupposing that love is present. Thus one lover edifies the other, and here it is easy enough to presuppose it, since love is generally known to be present. Alas, but love is never perfectly present in any man, insofar as it is possible for him to do something else than presuppose it; possible to discover one or another fault or frailty in it. And then when he has unkindly discovered this, he wishes perhaps, as they say, to take it away, to take the mote away in order really to build love up. But love edifies. The one who loves much, to him is much forgiven; but the more perfect the lover presupposes the love to be, the more perfect a love he loves forth. In no worldly relations is there found any relation where there is thus like for like, where that which results corresponds so exactly to what was presupposed. Let no one raise an objection, let no one appeal to experience, for this would be unkindly arbitrarily to fix a day when it must appear how it turned out. Love itself does not understand such things, it is eternally certain about the fulfillment of the presupposition; if this is not true, then the love is already at the point of exhaustion.

Love edifies by presupposing that love is fundamentally present, therefore love also edifies there where, humanly speaking, love seems to be lacking, and where, humanly understood, it seems first and foremost necessary to tear down, not indeed for the sake of pleasure but for the sake of salvation. Tearing down is the opposite of building up. This contrast never shows more clearly than when the discourse is about the fact that love edifies; for in whatever other connection there may be talk about edifying, it still has a resemblance to tearing down, that is, doing something through another. But when the lover edifies, then it is exactly the opposite of tearing down, because the lover does something through himself: he presupposes that love is present in the other man — which is certainly exactly the opposite of doing something through the other man. Tearing down satisfies only too readily the sensual man; edifying in the sense that one does something through the other man, can also satisfy the sensual man; but to edify by overcoming oneself satisfies only love. And yet this is absolutely the only way to edify. But in the well-meant zeal for tearing down and building up, one forgets that in the last analysis no man is able to plant the ground of love in another man.

Just here it appears how difficult the art of building is, as practiced by love, and as it is described in that celebrated passage by the apostle Paul; for what he says about love is just a closer definition of how love manages to edify. “Love is long-suffering”, and thereby it edifies; for long-suffering is just continuing to presuppose that there is love at bottom. He who judges, even if this came about slowly, that the other man is wanting in love, takes away the foundation — he cannot edify. But love edifies through long-suffering. Therefore it harbors neither envy nor spite, for envy and spite negate the love in the other man, and consume, if that were possible, the foundation of love. The love which edifies endures the other man’s misunderstanding, his ingratitude, his anger — that is certainly enough to bear; how then should love also be able to bear envy and spite! That is the way things are divided in this world: he who bears envy and malice does not bear the other man’s burdens, but the lover who loves does not bear malice and envy, he bears the burdens. Each one bears his own burden, the envious and the lover, both in a certain sense are martyrs, for as a devout man has said: the envious man is also a martyr — but the devil’s.

“Love seeketh not its own” therefore it edifies. For he who seeks his own must push the other aside; he must tear down in order to get a place for his own house which he wishes to build. But love presupposes that love is basically present, therefore it edifies. “It rejoiceth not in iniquity”; but he who wishes to tear down, or at least wishes to seem important by pretending that it is necessary to tear down, he may be said to rejoice in iniquity — otherwise there would be nothing to tear down. Love, on the contrary, rejoices in presupposing that love is fundamentally present, therefore it edifies. “Love heareth all things”; for what does it mean to bear all things? In the final analysis it means being able to find love in everything, as it is fundamentally presupposed. When we say of a man who has a very strong constitution, that as regards food and drink he can stand anything, we mean by that, that his system is healthy enough to get nourishment from even unhealthful food (just as the sick may be injured by even healthful food); we mean that his system derives nourishment even from that which would seem least nourishing. In this way love bears all things, always presupposing that it is fundamentally present — and thereby it edifies.

“Love believeth all things”; for to believe all things is exactly, although it does not seem so, although it seems just the opposite, to presuppose that love is fundamentally present, even in the misguided, even in the perverted, even in the most malicious. Mistrust precisely takes the foundation away by presupposing that love is not present; therefore mistrust cannot edify.

“Love hopeth all things”; but to hope all things is truly, although it does not seem so, and even seems to be the opposite, to presuppose that love is, nevertheless, fundamentally present, and that it will manifest Itself in the erring, in the misguided, even in the lost. Was not the father of the prodigal son perhaps the only one who did not know that he had a prodigal son, for the father’s love hoped all things? The brother knew at once that he was hopelessly lost. But love edifies; and the father regained the prodigal son just because he who hoped for everything, presupposed that love was fundamentally present in his son. On the father’s side, in spite of the son’s dissipation, there was no rupture (and a rupture is exactly the opposite of edifying), he hoped all things; therefore by his fatherly forgiveness he edified in truth, because the son vividly felt that his father’s love had borne with him, so that there had been no breach.

“Love endureth all things”; for to endure all things is exactly to presuppose that love IS fundamentally present. When we say that a mother endures all her child’s naughtiness, do we mean thereby that as woman she patiently suffers evil? No, we mean something else; we mean that as mother she always continues to remember that it is a child, and consequently to presuppose that the child still really loves her, and that this will soon be evident. Ordinarily we talk about how patience endures all things, not about how love does. For patience endures all things and is silent; and if the mother thus endured the child's naughtiness, then we should really mean by that that the mother and the child were estranged from each other. On the other hand, love endureth all things, patiently silent — but presupposes in all stillness that love is still present in the other man.

Thus love edifies. "It is not puffed up, does not behave itself unseemly, is not easily provoked": it is not puffed up at the thought that it might create love in the other man; it is not provoked and precipitate, impatiently, almost hopelessly concerned with what it must first tear down in order to build up again; no, it always presupposes that love is fundamentally present. Therefore it is unconditionally the most edifying sight to see love edifying, a sight by which even the angels are edified. And therefore that is unconditionally the most edifying talk, if a man really succeeds in telling how love edifies. There is many a friendly, many a salutary, many an enchanting, many an impressive, many an elevating, many a captivating, many a persuasive sight, and so on; but there is but one edifying sight, that of seeing love edifying. Whatever you may have seen of horror or abominations in the world, which you could wish to forget, because they tend to break down your courage and your confidence, to make life distasteful to you, and the idea of living abhorrent: consider only how love edifies, and you are edified in living! There are very many different things to speak about, but there is only one which is edifying: how love edifies. Therefore, whatever may befall you, so embittering that you might almost wish that you had never been born, and wish that you were dead, the sooner the better: only consider how love edifies, and you are again edified in speaking. There is but one edifying sight and one edifying subject: yet everything can be said and done edifyingly, for everywhere where there is edifying there is love, and wherever there is love, there is edifying, and as soon as love is present, it edifies.

Love edifies by presupposing that love is present. Have you not experienced this, my hearer? If any man has ever spoken in this way to you or acted in this way toward you, so that you really felt edified by him, then it was because you were vividly conscious of his presupposition that there was love in you. Or what kind of a man do you think the other man ought to be who might truly edify you? Is it not true that you would wish him to have insight and knowledge and ability and experience? But still you would not believe that it decisively depended on these; on the contrary, it would depend on his being a reliable, kindly man, that is, a truly loving man. Hence you believe that to be able to edify decisively and essentially depends on being loving, or in having love to such a degree that one can depend upon it.

But what, then, is love? Love is presupposing love; to have love is to presuppose love in others; to be loving is to presuppose that others are loving. Let us understand each other. The characteristics a man may have may either be characteristics he has for himself, even if he makes use of them for others; or attributes for others. Wisdom is one quality inherent in himself; power and talent and knowledge and so on may also be attributes peculiar to himself. To be wise is not to say, not to assume, that others are wise; on the contrary, it may very certainly be true, if the truly wise man assumes that all men are far from wise. Moreover, because "wise" is an exclusively personal attribute, there is nothing in the thought to prevent one from assuming that there might live, or has lived, a wise man who dared say that he assumed that all other men were unwise. In the thought (of being wise — and assuming that all others are unwise), there is no contradiction. In the realities of life, such an expression would be arrogant, but merely in the thought as such, there is no contradiction. On the other hand, if one were to believe that he himself was loving, but also that all other men were not loving, then we should have to say: "No, stop; there is a contradiction here in the thought itself; for to be loving is just to assume, to presuppose, that other men are loving." Love is not an exclusively personal attribute, but an attribute by virtue of which or in which you exist for others. In ordinary conversation we of course say, when we sum up a man's qualities, that he is wise, understanding, loving — and we do not notice what a difference there is between the last attribute and the first. His wisdom, his experience, his understanding are his own, even if others benefit by them; but if he is truly loving, then he does not have love in the same sense as he has wisdom, but it is exactly his love which presupposes that the rest of us have love. You praise him as the lover; you believe love is an attribute he has, as it really is; you feel edified by him just because he is loving, but you do not notice that this is because his love indicates that he presupposes love in you, and that just for this reason you are edified, just for this reason the love in yourself is built up. If it were actually true that a man could be loving without this indicating a presupposed love in others, then you would not in the deepest sense feel yourself edified; however certain it was that he was loving, you would not in the deepest sense feel yourself edified, any more than you would in the deepest sense be edified, no matter how certain it was that he was wise, understanding, learned and experienced. If it were possible that he might in truth be loving without this signifying that it presupposed love in others, then you could not fully rely upon him, for the test of reliability in the lover is exactly that, even when you are distrustful of yourself, of your own love, he is loving enough to presuppose, or rather he is the lover who presupposes it. — But you demanded that a man in order truly to be able to edify should be truly loving. And to be loving has shown itself as signifying: presupposing love in others. So you say absolutely the same thing that has been developed in the discourse.

So the reflection returns to its beginning. To edify is to presuppose love; to be loving is to presuppose love; only love edifies. For to edify is to build up something on a foundation, but spiritually love is the foundation of everything. No man can lay the foundation of love in another man’s heart; nevertheless, love is the foundation, and one can only build on that foundation; hence one can only edify by presupposing love. Take love away, then there is nothing which edifies, and no one who is edified.

II. LOVE BELIEVETH ALL THINGS — AND YET IS NEVER DECEIVED

LOVE BELIEVETH ALL things. — I Corinthians 13:7

"NOW Abideth Faith, hope and love, these three; but the greatest of these is love," which is therefore the foundation of everything, is before everything, and abides when all else is done away with. Love is consequently the "greatest" of "these"; and what is there more perfect to compare love with than faith and hope! But he who is greatest from the standpoint of perfection must also, if I may venture to say so, take upon himself the duty of bringing himself into subjection, and become even more perfect. In a worldly sense a man may sometimes be the most distinguished without being the most perfect, and this exactly constitutes the worldly imperfection. It is true that the greatest man may be able to do what the lesser man can do; and this holds true about love, that it can take upon itself the tasks of faith and hope, and do them even more perfectly.

We shall now consider this thought as we reflect on the theme:

LOVE BELIEVETH ALL THINGS — AND YET IS NEVER DECEIVED.

We shall first consider what it means when we say that love believes all things, and next, how the one who loves, simply by believing all things, can be assured against every deception. For truly, not everyone who believes everything is therefore a lover, and not everyone who believes everything is thereby assured against every deception — not even faith, if it will believe everything. And even if it might seem that the fact of being assured against every deception is a good for love, an advantage it has, then this meditation would not really be suitable as a subject for consideration in an essay about the works of love: since it is not that. The fact of being assured against every deception is a work, a task, entirely synonymous with that of believing all things so that one can just as unconditionally say that love believeth all things, as it can say that it is never deceived, since they are one and the same thing t is not as if the action were one thing, and the prudence which guards against a man being deceived were another. It is not from the standpoint of earthly wisdom that love is never deceived; for to love so that one is never deceived is, according to what earthly wisdom says and thinks, the most stupid and foolish thing one can do; moreover, it is an offense to prudence therefore it may readily be recognized as belonging essentially to Christianity.

Love believeth all things. Thoughtlessness, inexperience, credulity believe everything that is said; vanity, conceit, self-satisfaction believe all the flattering things that are said; envy, spite, depravity believe all the evil things that are said; mistrust believes nothing at all; experience will teach that not to believe everything one hears is the wisest course; but love believes everything.

Consequently mistrust believes nothing at all; it is the exact opposite of love. Generally speaking, men do not, I suppose, think very highly of mistrust, but still it by no means follows that they have absolutely and unanimously decided to renounce all mistrust unconditionally, or that they have absolutely and unanimously decided to recommend the love which believes everything, unconditionally. Perhaps, strange to say, men prefer to make a compromise, hence a dissident compromise between the mistrust which — a little loving, still believes something, and the love which — a little mistrustful, still has a suspicion or two. Moreover, if someone wished to describe the shrewd secret of mistrust, to array it in the supernatural greatness of shrewdness, of cunning, in the dazzling appearance of sagacity, then it might well tempt many. There might be someone who would cleverly give us to understand that that was just what he had discovered — proud of his discovery. And in contrast to this, as so often happens to the good, the love, which believes all things, would appear to a great disadvantage, so that many would not even dare to confess that they could wish to be so simple-minded.

What really is the shrewd secret of mistrust? It consists in an abuse of knowledge, an abuse which without further ceremony, in a single breath wishes to attach itself ergo to what as knowledge is absolutely true, and only becomes something else when it is preposterously believed by virtue of this knowledge, something which is just as impossible as it is preposterous, for one does not become a believer by virtue of knowledge. That which mistrust says or talks about is really only knowledge; the secret and the falsity lie in the fact that, without further ceremony, it transposes this knowledge into faith, pretending it to be nothing, pretending that it was something that need not even be noticed, "since everyone who has this knowledge must necessarily decide in the same way"; as if, consequently, it were eternally certain and absolutely decided that if a man has knowledge, then it is also known what conclusion he will reach. The deception lies in the fact that mistrust, by virtue of the disbelief inherent in it, infers, assumes, believes what it does infer, assume and believe, from its knowledge (for the appearance and fallacy is that knowledge causes the mistrust), whereas from the same knowledge, by virtue of belief, a man can infer, assume and believe exactly the opposite. Mistrust says: "Deception stretches unconditionally as far as truth, duplicity unconditionally as far as honesty; there is no absolute criterion of truth or of honesty or of sincerity. So, too, in relation to love; hypocrisy and craftiness and cunning and seduction deceptively extend absolutely as far as love extends; they are able to resemble true love so deceptively that there is no absolute criterion, because with every expression of the truth or with every expression of true love there exists the possibility of a delusion which exactly corresponds to this." And so it is and ever shall be. Just because existence will test "you," test "your" love or whether you have love, just for that reason it places truth and deception before you in the balance of possibilities opposed to each other, by the aid of reason, so that now when "you" judge, that is, when in judging you choose, it becomes manifest what you yourself are. Alas, many believe that the judgment is something that takes place the other side of the grave, and this is also true; but one forgets that the judgment lies much closer, that it is going on every moment, because existence is judging you in every moment you live, since to live is to judge one's self, to reveal one's self. Just for this reason existence must be so arranged that you may not by the aid of an authenticity of knowledge, evade revealing yourself in your judging or in how you judge. When then deception and truth are placed in the balance of possibilities opposed to each other, then it is decided whether you are suspicious or loving. For perhaps someone says, "Even that which seems to be the purest of feelings might still be a deception" — oh, well, that is possible and will always be possible: "Ergo I choose mistrust, or to believe nothing," that is, he reveals his mistrust.

Let us reverse the conclusion we drew about "truth and falsehood unconditionally stretching equally far; consequently it may be possible that what even appears to be the basest conduct might be pure love." Oh, well, that is possible, and it will be possible: ergo the lover chooses to believe everything, that is, he manifests his love. A man whose thinking is confused certainly thinks that existence is a fairly muddy element: oh, not even the sea is so transparent! If someone, therefore, can prove that one ought to believe nothing at all because of the possibility of deception, then I can prove that one ought to believe everything — because of the possibility of deception. If anyone thinks that one ought not to believe even the best of men because of the possibility that he might prove a deceiver, then this is also true of the converse, that you can expect good in even the worst of men, for it would be possible that his baseness was only an appearance of evil.

Love is the exact opposite of mistrust and yet it is based on the same knowledge; as far as knowledge goes, we may say that they are indistinguishable from one another (in the infinite sense knowledge is objective); only in the conclusion and in the decision, in the faith (which believes everything, and believes nothing) are they exactly opposed to each other. When love, for instance, believes everything, it is by no means in the same sense as thoughtlessness, inexperience and credulity believe everything, which believe everything through ignorance and naivete. No, love is just as well aware as anyone of everything which mistrust knows, yet without being mistrustful; aware of what experience knows, but also aware that what we call experience is really that mixture of mistrust and love.

"How much secrecy may not dwell in a man, or how much can still not be hidden! How ingenious is not that hidden inwardness in concealing itself, and in deceiving or avoiding others; that inwardness which preferably wished that one should not even suspect its existence, shame-facedly fearing to be seen, and fearing like death to be completely manifest! Is it not true that one man never completely understands another? But if he does not completely understand him, then it is always possible that the most uncertain might still have a quite different explanation, and, as it is well to note, if this is true, such an assumption might very well explain a great many cases, and thereby confirm its own truth, and yet later appear to be untrue as soon as something happens it cannot explain. And it would be possible that this case or this little further definition might even come at the last moment.

"It is because of this that all calm and intellectually dispassionate observers, who prefer to understand the inner man by a searching and illuminating study, that just these are so infinitely cautious in their judgment, or would rather abandon it altogether, because enriched by their observations they have developed an understanding of that mysterious world of the hidden things of the spirit, and because as observers they have learned to rule over their own passions. Only superficial, hasty, passionate men who have not learned to know themselves, and naturally for that reason do not know others, are given to such offhand judgments. The well-informed, the intelligent, never do this. A young, inexperienced man, who perhaps has never been on a horse before, casually springs up on the first one offered; but the very strong and experienced rider — notice how carefully he scrutinizes a strange horse before he will mount it, how doubtfully and cautiously he goes about it, how he scarcely ventures to mount it until he has let it run on a line in order to learn its disposition. And then, on the other hand, he continues to test it, long, long after the inexperienced rider has given up. For the inexperienced rider, who knows nothing about horses, believes that 'one horse is just like all the others — ergo I know them all.' Only an experienced rider thoroughly understands how great a difference there is, how one may be mistaken about a horse in very different and contradictory ways, and how unreliable every criterion is because each horse has its own peculiarities. And, now, the differences between man and man! How infinite! If this were not true, then would mankind be debased; for man's superiority over the brutes is not only the one which is most often mentioned, the universally human, but also that which one most often forgets, that every individual within the species has essential diversities and characteristics. And this superiority is really the proper human superiority; the first superiority is the racial superiority over the animal species. Moreover, if it were not a fact that one man, honest, sincere, respectable and God-fearing, can under the same circumstances do exactly the opposite of what another man does, who is also honest, sincere, respectable and God-fearing: then the God-relationship would not essentially exist, not in its most profound significance. If one man were able with absolute truth to judge every man according to a common pattern, then would the God-relationship be essentially abolished; then would everything face outward, heathenishly finding its complete expression in the state and community life; then living would become far too easy, but also very empty; then would neither personal exertion nor deepening of the self be possible or necessary, which, in the most difficult collision of the infinite misunderstanding, is exactly that which develops the God-relationship in a man."

Can you tell me who has said this? No, that is impossible; it is entirely uncertain; the most suspicious and the most kindly man could, as far as knowledge is concerned, equally well have said it. No man has said it; it is superhumanly uttered; it is a sound which first becomes articulate through the inspiration of diversified personalities, who pronounce it by adding voice to it. It is knowledge, and knowledge as such is impersonal, and must be communicated impersonally. Knowledge posits everything in possibility, and is to that extent outside the reality of existence in the possibility. The individual first begins his life with ergo, with faith. But most people simply do not notice that, in one way or another, every moment they live they live by virtue of an ergo, of a faith — so heedless are their lives. There is no decision in knowledge; decision, the determination of the personality, and determination are first in ergo, in faith.

Knowledge is the infinite art of ambiguity, or the infinite ambiguity; at its highest it consists in bringing opposing possibilities into equilibrium. To be able to do this is to have knowledge, and only the one who knows how to describe the balancing of these opposing possibilities, only he communicates knowledge. To expect to impart a decision by means of knowledge or knowledge by means of a decision is preposterous, as it has certainly become in these times — aye, preposterous it is and remains, but in these times it has become the truly profound, the true profundity of profound thought. Knowledge is not suspicion, for knowledge is infinitely objective; it is the infinite indifference in equilibrium. Nor is knowledge love, for knowledge is infinitely objective, it is the infinite indifference in equilibrium. Nor is knowledge defilement, since it is the infinite indifference. The suspicious man and the lover have knowledge in common, and the suspicious man does not become suspicious because of his knowledge, nor does the lover become the lover through that knowledge. But when a man's knowledge has balanced the opposing possibilities, and he is about to or wishes to pronounce a judgment, then it appears in what he then thinks next, who he is, whether he is suspicious or loving. Only extremely confused and ordinary men believe that they are able to judge another man by virtue of knowledge. From this it is evident that they do not even know what knowledge is; that they have never taken the time and pains to develop the infinite, objective sense for possibilities; or by means of the art of infinite ambiguity to understand the possibilities and bring them into equilibrium; or to understand them clearly. In a kind of nebulous condition, they have a stolid or a passionate preference for a certain kind of possibility; they judge that a little of it is enough, and they call that judging by virtue of knowledge; and they think, self-satisfied in thus — believing — by virtue of knowledge (a sheer contradiction), that they are assured against mistakes — which would be restricted faith (a new contradiction).

It is quite common to hear men express a great fear of making a mistake in judging. When you listen more closely to what is said, then, alas, there is so often a distressing misunderstanding in this — serious fear. Behold that noble, simple, wise man of old; he became what he was — moreover it was not something great — he did not become a great capitalist, nor an ambitious statesman in this best of all possible worlds. Impoverished, laughed at, ridiculed, accused, condemned, he remained the noble, simple, wise man, still so rarely seen; almost the only one who really made a distinction between what he understood and what he did not understand; and he remained so, because he "feared most of all to be in error."

I wonder if this elevation of thought, this sublime equipoise, is what men are really thinking about when they are afraid of making a mistake in judging. Possibly. But then it would also be possible that the fear is sometimes somewhat one-sided. All men have a natural fear of making a mistake — through believing too well of a man. The mistake, on the other hand, of believing too badly of another man, is perhaps less feared, at least not in comparison with the first. But then if we did not fear most of all being in error, then we are, on the contrary, in error through our one-sided fear of a certain kind of error. It mortifies our vanity and our pride to have thought too well of a swindler, to have been foolish enough to believe him — for it is a contest between brain and brain. One is vexed at oneself, or one finds that it is (yes, we speak in this way, and it does not help much, or rather it is a deception, to use more ceremonious and unusual expressions in an edifying discourse) "so stupid" to have been a fool. But ought it not to seem equally stupid to us, to say the least, to have believed evil, or suspiciously to have believed nothing, where there was good! I wonder if sometime in eternity it will not prove to have been more — than "stupid"; for let us use the word that is constantly used in the world; it does just as well applied to the eternal! But here in the world it is not "stupid" to believe evil of a good man; it is a superciliousness by which one adroitly gets rid of the good; but it is "stupid" to think well of an evil man, that is why one protects himself — since one fears so much being in error. The lover, on the other hand, truly fears being in error, therefore he believes everything.

The world tempts in many ways, among others also by making it appear that it would be so restricting, so foolish: lovingly to believe everything. But this is a misunderstanding. One draws a line through "lovingly" (alas, instead of underscoring it!), and so lays the emphasis on "foolish: to believe everything"; instead, the entire emphasis lies on the fact that it is "love" which believes everything. Truly it is not knowledge that defiles a man, far from it; knowledge is like sheer transparency, precisely then the most perfect and clearest; just as the most perfect water is tasteless. The servant of justice is not defiled because he has better information than the criminal about all intrigues. No, knowledge does not defile a man; it is suspicion which defiles a man's knowledge, just as love purifies it.

In relation to the fact of judging another man, knowledge leads at most to the balancing of opposing possibilities — on that fact the difference becomes apparent by what is now decided. For the Scriptures warn against judging, and they add "that you be not judged"; so that it looks as if one might sometimes judge without being judged in turn. But this is not the case. At the very moment you judge another man, or condemn another man, you judge yourself; for the act of judging another man is, in the last analysis, merely to judge yourself, or to reveal what you are. You perhaps do not notice it, it escapes your attention, how earnest existence is, how by showing you all these many men, it, as it were, gives you occasion to judge, so that you even deem yourself lucky that you are among those — undeservedly happily favored who are nothing, and therefore in all heedlessness have the comfortable task of judging others: and then it is existence who is courteous or strict enough not to regard you as nothing; then it is existence which judges you. How eager a man is to judge — if he knew what it means to judge: how hesitant he would be! How easily he seizes upon the least crumb in order to get the opportunity to judge — it is an opportunity to ensnare himself! Through knowledge you merely arrive at equilibrium, just when the art is perfectly practiced; but the conclusion returns in the person of the judge, and makes it manifest — that he is the lover, for he decides: ergo I believe everything.

Suspicion, on the other hand, has (naturally not through its knowledge which is infinitely indifferent, but through itself, through its disbelief) a preference for evil. The fact of believing nothing at all is exactly the boundary which begins by believing evil. The good is of course the object of faith, and therefore the one who believes nothing at all started by believing evil. The fact of believing nothing at all is the beginning of being evil, for it shows that one has nothing good in one's self, since faith is precisely the good in a man, which does not come with much knowledge, nor need he lack it because his knowledge is insignificant. Suspicion cannot hold knowledge in equilibrium; it defiles its knowledge, and therefore is nearer to envy, spite, corruption, which believe everything evil.

But now what about the one who was so zealous to judge, to pour out his indignation, his powerful or impotent indignation upon another, yet without really knowing whereof he judged? What if in eternity he discovers and is forced to confess that the one he judged was not only innocent, but that he was the noblest, the most disinterested and the most high-minded of men! Someone has said that sometime in eternity (assuming that we are not ourselves excluded) we shall note with wonder one or another missing whom we had so definitely expected to find there. But I wonder if we shall not also see with wonder one or another there whom we would have excluded without ceremony, and see that he was far better than one's self, not as if he had later become so, but just in connection with the very thing which determined the one judging to exclude him. Nevertheless, the lover believes all things. With the blessed joy of wonder he will sometime see that he was right; and if he made a mistake in believing the good — the fact of believing the good is in itself a blessing. Charitably to believe the good is certainly not a mistake, but one makes a mistake by not doing so.

The fact of suspiciously believing nothing at all (which is quite a different thing from knowledge about the equilibrium of opposing possibilities) and the fact of lovingly believing everything, is thus not an understanding, or the inference of an understanding, but a choice which must be made just when knowledge has balanced the opposing possibilities; and in this choice, which certainly takes the form of a judgment upon others, the one who judges is revealed. The fact that thoughtlessness, inexperience, simplicity, believe everything, is an understanding, a foolish understanding; the fact of lovingly believing everything is a choice by virtue of love. Instead of doing as suspicion does, which uses its shrewdness to secure itself by believing nothing, love uses its acuteness to discover the same thing, that deception and truth unconditionally stretch equally far, and it then decides by virtue of the faith it has in itself: ergo I believe everything.

Love believes everything — and is never deceived. Wonderful! To believe nothing at all for fear of being deceived seems reasonable; for how could anyone deceive someone who believes nothing! But to believe everything, and in that way throw himself away, a prey to all deception and to all deceivers, and nevertheless just by so doing assure himself everlastingly against every deception: that is strange. And yet I wonder if the one, even if he is not deceived by others, is still not deceived, most terribly deceived, certainly by himself, through believing nothing at all; defrauded of the highest, of the resignation, of the blessedness of love! No, there is but one way to assure one’s self against ever being deceived, that is charitably to believe everything.

Let us speak about it in this way: Can a man deceive God? No, in his relation to God a man can only deceive himself; for the God-relationship is the supreme good, so that whoever defrauds God defrauds himself most terribly. Or, for purposes of comparison, let us consider the relation between man and man. Can a child deceive its parents? No, the child deceives itself; it is merely an appearance (hence, an illusion), a short-sighted deception, that makes it hook to the child, and to anyone who has no more understanding than the child, as if it were the child who deceived its parents, while, alas! the poor child really deceives itself. One may reasonably assume that as far as the child is concerned, the parents are superior to it in wisdom and insight, and therefore are superior in their true love for the child, who only foolishly understands loving himself, so that to deceive the parents would be the greatest misfortune which could befall the child, the greatest misfortune, if it were not his own fault. But then it is — truly — not the parents who are deceived; on the contrary, it is the child, and it only looks (an illusion) as if the child deceived its parents; in a childish and foolish sense it is true that the child deceived its parents, but consequently it is not true, since it is true only in a "childish and foolish sense." On the other hand, would it not be a pitiful and disgusting sight to see a father or mother who, in relation to the child, did not have the true earnest, concerned idea of their own superiority, based on the eternal responsibility of being truly desirous of the child's best interest? Would it not be pitiful and disgusting to see a father or mother, who might therefore degrade themselves by indecent quarrels with the child, become irritated and indignant on their own account, because they childishly had the foolish idea that it was the child who deceived them? Such a relationship between parents and a child is indeed indecent, moreover, almost crazy, as if to slap the child were to indicate being slapped by the child, and thus, by setting aside all dignity, superiority and legitimate authority, were to prove merely that the father or the mother was physically stronger.

Consequently the true superiority can never be deceived if it remains true to itself. But true love, in comparison with everything which is not love, hence compared with every illusion, is unconditionally superior: as a result it can never be deceived if, through believing all things, it remains true itself, or continues to be true love.

This is certainly very easy to understand; the difficulty must therefore lie elsewhere, in that there must be a lower range of ideas which does not even suspect what true love is, what love is in itself, and what this blessedness is in itself. The trouble is that there is a great multitude of illusions which tend to hold a man down in the lower range of ideas where the deception and the fact of being deceived signify exactly the opposite of what they signify in the infinite conception of love. This conception signifies that the only possibility of deception lies in refraining from loving, in submitting to giving up love itself and thereby losing its blessedness. For in the infinite sense the only deception possible is self-deception; infinitely speaking, one need not fear him who merely kills the body; to be killed is, from the infinite standpoint, not a danger, nor is the kind of deception the world talks about, any danger. And again this is not difficult to understand. The difficulty consists in carrying the task to completion, in acquiring the true conception of love, or, more correctly, in becoming the true lover; for just through believing all things, he guards against illusion, and fights to preserve himself in the true love. But the illusion will constantly obtrude itself, about like that illusion which believes that the sun moves around the earth, although we know that it is the earth that moves.

There is a lower conception of love, hence a lower love, which has no conception about love itself. This conception regards loving as a claim (the requital of love is what is demanded), and the fact of being loved (the requital) as an earthly good, as temporal — alas! and yet as the highest happiness. Moreover, if it is true, the deception may certainly play the master, just as in the capitalistic world. One pays out his money to buy one or another convenience; if one has paid his money but has not received the convenience, then one is defrauded. A man makes love a transaction; he sacrifices his love in bartering, but if he does not get requited love in exchange, then he feels defrauded. The deception may also consist in the deceiver's having gained the love of the deceived in such a way that perhaps the one deceived could not keep from loving him, because he loved in such a way — that he could only love one single man, and this man was the deceiver. It is not the intention of this reflection to deny that the lover was deceived, nor that the deceiver was, yes, that he was a wretched deceiver; but it does deny that this lover was the true lover. For the one who is — loving, in such an extraordinary way that he can love but one single man, he is not the true lover, but he is in love with love, and he who is in love with love is a self-lover, as was earlier demonstrated. But that one may deceive a self-lover, the discourse has never wished to deny.

There is here as everywhere, something very profound in existence. We sometimes hear the most vociferous complaints about being deceived in love. The accuser wishes to prove exactly what a rare lover he himself is, and in turn how unusually paltry the deceiver is, and he proves this by protesting that he can and could love only one man. He does not notice that the more violent this complaint becomes, the more it becomes a self-accusation, which indicates that he himself has been and is a self-lover, of whom it is certainly true that he can love but one (for the true lover loves everyone, and that without demanding requital), and therefore he might really be deceived, which the true lover cannot be. That is to say: everyone who essentially and decisively admits that he has been thus deceived in love, so that he has lost the best, to say nothing of everything, he thereby denounces himself as a self-lover; for the best is love in itself, and one can always retain that if one wills to be the true lover. Everyone, therefore, who only wills to have the lower, the illusory idea of what love is, he certainly takes pains not to be deceived; he learns from the capitalists or from those who carry on trade, what precautions they use against swindlers. Alas! and in spite of all these precautions, moreover even if he succeeds by means of these precautions in insuring himself against every deception: he and all like-minded are still essentially deceived through leading their lives in that world of illusion, in that world where all are essentially victims, whether the one now groans about the other's having deceived him, or the other brags of not having been deceived. The difference between them is no greater than it would be in an insane asylum if one of the patients were to imagine himself something through not being insane in the same way as another, while all of them were essentially insane.

The lower conception and illusion of love to which men resort in this interest and service, is temptation; the difficulty consists precisely in acting to defend one's self against it; for it is easy enough in a quiet moment to perceive that the true lover who believes everything, cannot be deceived. "But still it is so stupid to be deceived." If you yourself were the true lover, who believes everything, then you would indeed see that it is an impossibility, would see that you were not deceived. But is there anything stupid in knowing within yourself that you are not deceived? No. "But it is, nevertheless, so stupid that it should seem so to others," See, here is the deception. To know in yourself and in truth that you are not deceived, and still find it stupid that you should seem to be deceived. What do you call that? We call it vanity, or, what here amounts to the same thing, we call it; not being absolutely the true lover. Alas, and if vanity could get power over the true lover, then he would certainly be deceived, for it drags him out of love down into the low, the world of pettiness and wrangling, where one fools and is fooled, vain of being able to dupe others, stupid in being duped, and therefore vain of being able to avoid it.

When we see the true lover deceived by the cunning, the artful and the hypocrite, we are revolted, and yet why? Sometimes because we do not see punishment and retribution follow in the external world; hence because we ask to see the meaning of the imperfection and the externality presented as a satisfying drama where there is external retribution; then again because we sink down to the lower level of ideas; again because we sluggishly and thoughtlessly forget that the true lover cannot be deceived. We have a right to cry woe to the one who leads a blind man astray; here it is quite proper to demand external punishment, for one can deceive a blind man; the fact of being blind does not assure against every deception. But the true lover who believes everything cannot be deceived. In a certain sense the lover knows very well if someone deceives him, but by not wishing to believe it, or by believing everything, he preserves himself in love, and thus is not deceived — consequently, here, too, one has an illustration of how foolish it is, how injudicious the business, which thinks that knowing is higher than believing; for that which precisely assures the lover, who in a certain sense knows that he has been deceived, is to believe everything.

One cannot deceive the true lover who believes everything, for to deceive him is to deceive one’s self. What really does constitute the highest good and the greatest happiness? In truth it is certainly loving; next to this is being truly loved. But then it is impossible to deceive the lover, who just by believing everything abides in love. If it were possible to defraud anyone of money in this way, so that the so-called victim retained his money: then would he have been defrauded? But that is exactly the case here. The deceiver becomes contemptible through his attempt, and the lover preserves himself in his love, abides in love and hence is in possession of the highest good and the greatest happiness; consequently, he certainly is not deceived! The deceiver, on the contrary, deceives himself. He does not love, and thereby he has already defrauded himself of the supreme good and the greatest happiness. Next to this comes the being loved by one who loves in truth — otherwise being loved might become a source of great unhappiness to one. Again it is this which the deceiver is about to swindle himself out of, insofar as he prevents himself from having the true benefit of this love, and insofar as he might succeed, if his deception were presumably discovered, in forfeiting the other man's love, in making the lover unhappy through truly having ceased to love — instead of through believing all things abiding in love, assured against all deception.

Let it sometime take place before our eyes, so that it can really become clear how pitiful the deceiver looks in comparison with the true lover — for there is much said about seducing and seducers, about deception and deceivers, but one rarely talks about or describes the true lover. Hence, I imagine a cunning man, an artful one, a hypocrite; I take pleasure in equipping him who is initiated into all the secrets of deception, with all seductive gifts. Now what will he do? He wishes to deceive the lover; he wishes (for he has that much sense in spite of his depravity, so that he perceives how great a good it is to be loved) by means of his cunning, to see himself beloved. But why all this fuss, this wholly superfluous expenditure of cunning and artfulness? It is the true lover he wishes to deceive, but the true lover loves everyone, so the deceiver can attain love in a far simpler way. Moreover, if we were speaking about earthly love (self-love) then there would at least be some meaning in the deception; for if the beloved can only love one single person, then, if it were possible, it would be suitable by means of the deceptive art of cunning and artifice, to become that one. But as regards the true lover, the deception is from its very inception exactly meaningless, the deceiver from the very beginning is shown in the most pitiful light. Now furthermore. The deceiver naturally succeeds in being loved, naturally — moreover, the deceiver thinks and must naturally think that this result is due to his cunning and artfulness and skill; poor, deceived deceiver! He does not notice that he is dealing with the true lover, who loves him because the true lover loves everyone. In what an absurdity is not the wretched deceiver now involved! Not as if the deception had failed; no, that punishment is far too insignificant; no, the deception is successful, and the deceiver is proud of his deception! But wherein lies the deception, what kind of a deception is it he talks about? Naturally the deception must lie in the fact that although the lover loves him, in addition to enjoying this good of being loved, he coldly and proudly and mockingly also enjoys the self-satisfaction of not loving in return. It quite naturally escapes him (for how could a deceiver realize that true love exists!) that he was dealing with the true lover, who loves without asking for any requital, who justly estimates the love and its eternal happiness by not asking any requital. Consequently, by the use of cunning the deceiver has led the lover to love him — but that is what the lover is so infinitely willing to do. The deceiver has presumably fooled him by not loving in return — but the true lover regards asking for a requital as a pollution, a debasement of love, and considers that loving without the reward of requited love, is the highest happiness. Who then is the victim of deception? What is there to say about the deception? The deceiver talks at random and does not even understand what he is saying, like that man at whom we all laugh, that man who lay in the ditch and still believed he was riding. To deceive in this way, is it not as if one were to call it stealing to put money into a man's pocket! The true lover has become richer; for each more that he gives in loving, and for each new time that he gives his love, relinquishing all thought of requital, the richer he becomes. Or is the true lover deceived if it is not revealed what an unworthy object of love the deceiver is? The act of loving is the supreme good, but then only the love which asks requital, hence the false love, can be deceived through remaining ignorant of the fact that its object was unworthy.

Or is the true lover deceived if it becomes evident how unworthy an object of love the deceiver is and was? The fact of loving is the supreme good and the greatest happiness. You know that one who is in need of money, in order to get money approaches a man he had depended on, and who he believes has money: he is fooled then if the man is insolvent and has no money. But the one who wishes to give his money away, and does not in the most remote way wish or demand repayment, he is certainly not deceived — because the recipient has no money. But the cunning deceiver, who is prompted by the smoothest and most insinuating motives of cunning, does not notice how clumsily he behaves. He believes himself to be superior, he smiles in self-satisfaction (alas, as if you saw the self-satisfied smile of the insane, which is something both to laugh at and to weep over!); he does not suspect that the lover is infinitely superior. The deceiver is blinded, he does not even notice his terrible impotence: his deception is successful — and he confers a benefaction; his deception is successful — and he makes the true lover still richer; his deception is successful, he succeeds — and yet it is just himself who is deceived. Poor victim! Even this way to salvation is cut off from him, so that his deception fails! If an insane man wished to convince a rational man of the correctness of his insane thoughts, and to a certain degree succeeded, would this not be the most terrible of all, would it not be almost like the act of an unmerciful existence, for if he had failed, then the deranged man might resize from this that he was insane; but now it is hidden from him, and his madness is indeed incurable. So with the deceiver; but it is not an unmerciful but a just punishment upon him, that his deception succeeded — and just therein is his perdition.

What, then, in truth is the quarrel between the deceiver and the lover? The deceiver wishes to trick his love from the lover. This cannot be done; the true lover has, simply by not requiring the least requital, assumed an impregnable position. To cheat him out of his love is no more possible than to cheat a man out of the money which he as donor stands ready to give and does give to one. The quarrel is therefore really about something else — whether it might be possible for the deceiver (something he by no means intends or considers) to become the occasion of the lover's fall, so that the lover fell away from love and sank down in the world of illusion, in a childish wrangling with the deceiver, because the lover gave up the love which loves without asking requital. However, the true lover guards against the possibility of this just by believing all things, hence by loving the deceiver. If the deceiver could understand this, he would lose his reason. An earthly lover (the self-lover) believes that he is deceived when the deceiver has fooled him into loving him, without the deceiver's loving in return — and the true lover believes that he himself is saved when by believing all things, he succeeds in loving the deceiver. The earthly lover regards it as a misfortune to continue to love the deceiver; the true lover regards it as a victory if he is successful in continuing to love the deceiver. Wonderful! The deceiver must become more and more conceited about his own wisdom because his deception succeeds so extraordinarily; at last it even ends by his regarding the lover as a poor, incompetent, stupid devil. And yet it is just by means of this very same fact that the true lover is everlastingly and infinitely assured against deception! Do you, my hearer, know any stronger expression for superiority than the fact that the superior one looks as if he were the weaker? For the stronger, who looks as if he were stronger, establishes a standard of superiority; but the one who, although superior, looks as if he were the weaker, negates the standard and the comparison, that is, he is infinitely superior. Have you never in life seen this relation of infinite superiority, which certainly is not plainly seen, for the infinite is never seen directly? Take it in the matter of the infinite superiority of another, and you will see that he looks like a plain, ordinary man; only a man who thinks that he has more sense than others, but is not quite certain about it, or is weak and foolish enough to boast of a comparative relation of superiority, strives to give an appearance of superiority of understanding.

So, too, with the lover who believes everything. This credulity can so easily be confused with incapacity, and yet there is the profundity of wisdom in this simplicity. It can so easily be confused with weakness, and yet the strength of eternity is in this impotence. The lover can so easily look like a poor, friendless man whom anyone can deceive, and yet he is the only one who is eternally and infinitely assured against deception. But we simply do not see it; humanly speaking the confusion lies near enough, especially in these clever times which have become too clever to believe in wisdom. The confusion lies near enough. For the lover who believes everything is not immediately manifest; he is like those plants whose propagation is in secret: he breathes in God, he draws the nourishment for his love from God, he is strengthened through God. That humanly speaking he is deceived, he sees in a certain sense himself; but he knows that deception and truth stretch equally far, and for that reason it might still be possible that the deceiver was not a deceiver, and therefore he believes everything. For this end the lover has courage, courage to believe everything (in truth the highest courage!); courage to endure the world's contempt and insults (truly the greatest victory, greater than anything which is gained in the world, for it overcomes the world!); courage to endure the world's finding it so indescribably foolish, while it still excellently understands that from which he draws his conclusion, but not his conclusion, any more than a suspicious world can understand the everlasting happiness which the true lover has in himself.

Still, suppose that sometime in eternity it appeared that the lover really had been deceived! How — if it actually is necessary to repeat it once more? When loving is the highest good and the greatest happiness; when the lover just by believing everything, abides in the happiness of love: how then could he, in time or eternity, be deceived! No, no, there is in time and eternity only one deception possible with respect to true love, the self-deception, or the renouncing of love. The true lover therefore will not even understand the objection. Alas, but the rest of us unfortunately understand it only too easily; for the lower range of ideas and the covenant of worldly passions with illusions are so difficult to free one's self from. At the very moment when one has best understood the truth, the old ideas suddenly come upon one again. The infinite, the eternal, consequently the true, are so alien to the natural man that it is with him as it is with a dog, which can indeed learn to walk upright for a moment, but still is constantly wanting to walk on all fours. One can almost force a man's thought to have to admit that since deception unconditionally stretches equally as far as truth, one man cannot really judge the other, but the judge reveals only himself — about as when someone with all his might strikes down on a dynamometer, and does not know that it is a dynamometer, hence he believes that he really is striking something, while it is really only his strength which is being tested. And when one has understood this in this way, then one may still seek one more evasion; one can lay hold on eternity in a curious way, counting on eternity to reveal whether he really was a deceiver. But what does this prove? It proves that one is not the true lover who has the eternal happiness of love in himself, or who has the true conception of earnestness about eternity. If a man yields to this impulse, it immediately drags him down to its low level of pettiness, where the last and the highest aim is not the happiness of love itself, but the wrangling of sophistry, — But the true lover believes everything — and yet is never deceived.

III. LOVE HOPETH ALL THINGS — AND YET IS NEVER PUT TO SHAME

LOVE HOPETH ALL things. — I Corinthians 13.7

BY THE USE OF MANY parables and the employment of many figures of speech, the Holy Scriptures seek in various ways to add dignity and solemnity to our earthly existence; to secure air and vision through laying hold on the eternal. And this is in truth needed. For when the worldliness of the God-forsaken earthly life immures itself in proud self-satisfaction, this enclosed air generates a poison in itself. And when time apparently creeps on so slowly in our temporal existence, and yet with such a subtle haste that we are never consciously aware of its passing; or when the moment sticks fast and remains stationary; when everything, everything conspires to turn our thoughts and our energies into the service of the moment; then is the vision lost, and this isolated, God-forsaken moment of the temporal existence, be it longer or shorter, signifies a falling away from the eternal. This is why the need has so frequently been felt at various times for a refreshing, inspiring breeze, a mighty gust of wind, which would purify the air and drive out the poisonous vapors; a need for the saving impulse of great events, which save by stirring up the stagnation; a need for a great revivifying vision of expectation — so that mankind may not be stifled in worldliness or perish in that suffocating moment!

However, Christianity knows only one way and one way out, while none the less it always does know one way and one way out. By the aid of the eternal Christianity is able at every moment to secure air and vision. When the pressure of business increases, just because the moment is extended, when it rushes impetuously about in the moment which, eternally understood, makes no progress; when the industrious sow and reap and sow again and reap again (for industry harvests many times); when the industrious fill, their barns full of what they harvested and rest on their merits — whereas, alas! the man who in truth wished the good, during that same time does not see the least reward of his labor, and becomes a joke as one who does not know how to sow, as one whose labor is in vain and who only beats the air: then Christianity furnishes the vision by means of its parable about this earthly life being the time of sowing, eternity the time of harvest. When the moment, just because it is standing still, is like a whirlpool (for a whirlpool does not move forward); when there is striving, winning and losing and winning again, now at one point, now at another — but the one who wishes the good in truth, is the only one who alone is losing, and losing everything as it seems: then Christianity affords a vision by means of the parable about this earthly life being the time of tribulation, of striving, eternity the time of victory. When the moment is halted in the miserable intricacies of pettiness, which sneeringly parodies the most sacred things, the good, the true, in a wretched belittlement, sneeringly plays the game of distributing honor and shame; when everything is made more vainglorious by being dragged down into this seething wretched commotion: then Christianity affords air and vision, secures for life dignity and solemnity by the aid of the parable showing that scene in eternity where it will be eternally decided who has won the garland of honor, and who was put to shame.

What a solemnly earnest festival! Truly, what are honor and shame if the surroundings are not such as give the honor or the shame their infinite significance! Even if a man deservedly won honor here in the world, what solemnity does the world have to give it significance? Suppose a pupil is deservedly rebuked or deservedly honoured: if the solemn ceremony were to take place on the stairway; if the teacher who awards the honor and the demerits were a wretched fellow; if none, or as good as none, of those dignitaries were invited whose presence would be an honor to the occasion, but only an even greater number of ordinary men whose reputation was, to say the least, ambiguous: what then are honor and shame? But eternity! Do you know any banquet hall whose arches are as lofty as those of eternity? Do you know any place, even any cathedral, where there is this sacred stillness, like that of eternity? Do you know any group, even the most select circle of venerable men, which is so certain that no one is present against whom honor might have the least, the very least, objection, so certain that no one is present except those whom honor honors, as eternity is? Do you know any festal hall, even if its walls are of mirrors, which so infinitely and solely reflects the demands of honor; so infinitely refuses even the least, the most inconspicuous crevice for dishonor to conceal itself in, as eternity? — If you should there be put to shame!

By the help of the eternal Christianity affords a vision for every moment, as touching honor and shame, if you will assist by hoping. Christianity does not bear you up to some loftier place from which you can look out over a somewhat wider range: that is still only an earthly hope and a worldly vision. No, Christianity's hope is eternity; and therefore there are lights and shadows, beauty and truth, and above all the transparency of distance in its plan of existence. Christianity's hope is eternity; and Christ is the Way; His abasement is the Way, but also when He ascends into heaven He would also be the Way.

But love which is greater than faith and hope, assumes also the work of hope, or assumes hope, the hoping for others, as a task. It is even edified and nourished by this hope of eternity, and then again it acts affectionately toward others in this hope, which we shall now consider:

LOVE HOPETH ALL THINGS — AND YET IS NEVER PUT TO SHAME.

For truly not everyone who hopes all things is therefore the lover; nor is everyone who hopes all things thereby assured against ever being put to shame; but affectionately to hope for all things is the opposite of despairingly hoping nothing at all, either for one's self or for others.

To hope all things or what amounts to the same thing, always to hope. It certainly seems at first glance as if hoping all things were something which might be done once for all, since "all things" gathers all the many into one, and insofar into what one might call an eternal moment, as if hope were at rest, in tranquility. However, this is not so. For hoping means the synthesis of the eternal and the temporal; the consequence is that the expression for the task of hope in the form of eternity is to hope all things: for the task of hope in the form of the temporal existence always to hope. One expression is no truer than the other; on the contrary, each of the expressions becomes untrue if it is set in opposition to the other, instead of being united in expressing the same thing: at every moment always to hope all things.

Hoping lays hold upon the future, on the possibility, which again, as distinguished from reality, is always a duality — the possibility of progress or retrogression, of building up or tearing down, of good or of evil. The eternal but when the eternal touches on the temporal, or is in the temporal, they do not meet each other in the "present," for then the present would itself be the eternal. The present, the moment, is so swiftly past that it does not really exist except as a dividing line, and it is consequently past while the past is what had been the present. Hence when the eternal is in the temporal, then it is in the future (for the present cannot lay hold on it, and the past is past) or in the possibility. The past is the actual, the future the possible; the eternal is everlastingly the eternal; in time the eternal is the possible, the future. We therefore call the day tomorrow the future, but we also call the eternal life the future. The possible, as such, is always a duality, and the eternal is equally proportional in the possibility to its duality. On the other hand, if a man who is concerned with the possible, lays hold equally on the duality of the possible, then we say: he is expectant. Expecting contains in itself the same duality as does the possible, and to expect is to relate oneself to the possible clearly and only as such. On that the relationship divides, inasmuch as the expectant man makes a choice. To lay hold expectantly on the possibility of the good is to hope, which just for this reason cannot be any temporal expectation, but is an eternal hope. To lay hold expectantly on the possibility of evil is to fear. But the one who hopes as well as the one who fears is expectant. Yet as soon as the choice is made, the possible is changed, for the possibility of the good is the eternal. It is only in the moment of contact that the doubleness of the possible is equal. By the decision to choose hope one decides, therefore, infinitely more than it seems, for it is an eternal decision. Only in the mere possibility, hence for the merely or indifferently expectant, are the possibilities of good and of evil equal; in the making of a distinction (and choice is the making of a distinction) is the possibility of the good more than possibility, for it is the eternal. Hence it happens that he who hopes can never be deceived; for to hope is to expect the possibility of the good, but the possibility of good is the eternal.

So we must define more exactly what it means to hope; in ordinary speech we often call that hope which is by no means hope, but is a wish, a longing, a yearning expectation, now for one thing, now another, in short, it is the laying hold by the expectant on the infinitude of possibilities. Thus understood (when hope really merely indicates expectation) the youth and the child find it easy enough to hope, because the youth and the child are themselves still a possibility. And, on the other hand, it is again quite proper, when one sees how with the years the possible, or the sense for the possible, and the hope very frequently diminish in men. This may explain why experienced people speak in such a disparaging way about hope, as if it belonged only to youth (as the hope of the youth and of the child certainly do), as if hoping, like dancing, were something youthful, something which older people neither enjoyed nor had the facility for. Oh, well, it is easy to hope and also to do by the aid of the eternal, that is, by the aid of the possibility of good. And even if the eternal is far from being youthfulness, it still has far more in common with youthfulness than with the sullenness which is frequently honoured by the name of earnestness; than with the slowing down of the years which under fairly fortunate conditions are as such fairly satisfied and calm, but after all have nothing to hope for, and which under unfortunate conditions are more disposed to grumble peevishly than to hope. In youth a man has expectation and possibility enough; it develops of itself in the young, like the precious myrrh which drips from the trees in Arabia. But then when a man has become older, then his life becomes more often than not an indolent repetition and paraphrase of the same thing. No possibility frightens it awake, no possibility animates it rejuvenatingly; hope becomes something which is neither here nor there, and possibility something as rare as greens in winter.

One gets along without the eternal by the aid of habit, shrewdness, imitation, experience, custom and use. And truly, take all this, bring it together prepared by the smoldering or merely earthly-blazing fire of passion, and you will see you can get all kinds of things out of it, a variously prepared tough slime, which one calls judicious living. But no one ever gets any possibility from it, the possibility, that wonderful possibility, which is so infinitely fine (not the most delicate spring shoot is so delicate!), so infinitely fragile (not the finest of woven linen is so fragile!), and yet precisely brought about, created, by the help of the eternal, and so stronger than everything, if it is the possibility of the good.

One thinks to speak empirically by dividing a man’s life into certain periods and years, and then calling the first period that of hope or of possibility. What nonsense! In that way one absolutely leaves out the eternal in speaking about hope, and yet one talks about hope. But how is that possible, since hope lays hold on the possibility of the good, and thereby on the eternal! On the other hand, how is it possible to speak about hope in such a way that one must assume that it belongs exclusively to a certain age? The eternal certainly extends over the whole life, so there is and consequently must be hope until the last, so there is consequently no exclusive age which is hope's, but the whole of one's life must be the time of hope! One also thinks to speak empirically about hope — by discarding the eternal. As in the theater by shortening the time and by condensing the incidents one gets to see the events of many years in the course of a few hours: so one wishes theatrically to arrange matters in the temporal existence. One rejects God's plan of existence: the temporal existence is safe and sound development, the complication — the dissolution of eternity. One arranges everything within the temporal existence, expends a score of years on the development, then ten years on the complications of existence; then some year one draws the knot too tight, and then dissolution follows. Undeniably, death is also a dissolution, and then it is past; one is buried — yet not before the dissolution of corruption has set in. But truly everyone who does not wish to understand that one's whole life must be a time of hope, he is in despair, regardless of, completely regardless of whether he knows it or not; whether he deems himself lucky in his supposed well-being, or he spends a toilsome life in boredom and trouble. Everyone who dismisses the possibility of his existence being forfeited the next moment — if he does not dismiss this possibility because he hopes for the possibility of the good, hence everyone who lives without possibility, he is in despair; he breaks with the eternal, he arbitrarily ends the possibility, he makes an end, where there is no end, without the assent of eternity; instead of being like the one who writes according to another's dictation, who constantly has the pen ready for the next word, so that he does not presume irrelevantly to place a period before the meaning is complete, or rebelliously to throw the pen aside.

If someone wishes to help a child with a very hard task, what does he do? Certainly he does not set the whole task all at once before the child, so that the child becomes discouraged and gives up all hope of accomplishing it. He assigns a small portion at a time, but always enough so the child does not stop as if it were finished, and yet not so much that the child cannot manage it. This is the gentle deception of education; it really holds something back. If the child is deceived, does it happen because the teacher is a man who cannot answer for the next step? But now eternity; that is still the greatest task that is set for a man, and, on the other hand, it can still vouch for what comes next; and the child of the temporal existence (the man) still acts like a little child regarding the infinite task! If eternity were sometime and in its own language to set man the task without regard for his apprehension and his limited ability: the man would be in despair. But then it is truly wonderful that this, the greatest power, eternity, can make itself so small, that it is so divisible, that that which is everlastingly one, by putting on the form of the future, of the possible, by the help of hope, educates the child of the temporal existence (the man), teaches him to hope (for hoping is itself an education, is the laying hold on the eternal), if he does not then voluntarily austerely choose to be dispirited through fear, or if he does not impudently choose to despair, that is, to evade the education of the possibility. Rightly understood, the eternal assigns only a little portion at a time in the possibility. Eternity is through the possible always near enough at hand, and yet far enough away to keep a man moving forward, progressing, toward the eternal. Thus eternity draws and lures man by the possibility from the cradle to the grave, if he will but choose to hope. For the possibility is, as was said, twofold, and just because of this it is the true education. The possibility is equally as severe, or can be equally as severe, as it can be gentle. Hope does not lie as a matter of course in the possibility, for fear may also lie in it. But the one who chooses hope, him the possibility, by the aid of hope, teaches to hope. Still the possibility of fear, the severity, remains, secretly present as a possibility, if it should be needed for the sake of the education, for the purpose of arousing; but it remains hidden, while the eternal allures by the aid of hope. For the alluring always consists in being equally as near as far away, whereby the hopeful one is always kept hoping, hoping everything, preserved in hope for the eternal, which in the temporal existence is the possible.

So it is with hoping all things. But lovingly to hope everything indicates the relation of the lover to other men, so that in his relation to them, in hoping for them, he always keeps the door of possibility open with infinite preference for the possibility of the good. Hence, he lovingly hopes that at every moment there is the possibility, the possibility of the good for the other man; this, the possibility of the good, indicates the increasingly glorious progress in the good from perfection unto perfection, or the rising again after the fall, or salvation from perdition, and so on.

That the lover is right, that at every moment the possibility exists, is easily perceived. Alas, but perhaps many would far more easily understand it, were we to allow despair to say the same thing — for in a certain sense despair does say the same thing. The despairing one knows, too, what lies in the possibility, and yet he gives up the possibility (for renouncing the possibility is just what despair means), or, even more correctly, he ventures impudently to assume the impossibility of the good. Again it appears here that the possibility of the good is more than possibility; for when one ventures to assume the impossibility of the good, then all possibility has ceased for him. The apprehensive one does not assume the impossibility of the good; he fears the possibility of evil, but he does not infer he does not venture to assume the impossibility of the good.

"It is possible," says despair, "it is possible that even the most honest enthusiast might sometime become weary, renounce his striving, and sink down in the service of wretchedness. It is possible that even the most fervent believer might sometime let go of faith and choose disbelief. It is possible that even the most ardent love might become chilled, become cold. It is possible that even the most upright man might still go astray and be lost. It is possible that even one's best friend might be changed into an enemy, even the most loyal wife be changed to a wanton: all this is possible, therefore despair, relinquish hope, above all, do not hope in any man or for any man!"

Yes, all these things are certainly possible, but then, too, the converse is also possible. "Therefore never unlovingly give up any man or your hope for him, for it might be possible that even the most prodigal son might still be saved; that the most bitter enemy, alas, he who was your friend, it is possible that he might again become your friend; it is possible that he who sank lowest, just because he had stood so high, it is still possible that he might again be lifted up; it is still possible that the love which grew cold, might again be fanned into flame: therefore never give up any man, not even at the last moment; do not despair, rather hope all things!"

Hence, "it is possible," insofar as the despairing and the lover agree on the same thing; but then they are eternally separated, for despair hopes nothing at all for others, love hopes everything. Despair loses courage, and now sometimes makes use of the possibility as a delightful means of stimulation, if one can sometimes be amused by the unstable, vainglorious, weird blazing of the possibility. It is noticeable enough, and it shows how deeply hope is entrenched in mankind, that one finds among men who were chilled in despair, a dominant inclination to toy and trifle with the possibility, a sensuous misuse of the imagination. Coldly and defiantly the despairing man will not hope for the other man, even less work for the possibility of the good in him; but the despairing one delights in letting the other man's fate play the buffoon in the possibility; indifferent to hope or fear, he delights to play with the other man's fate, to consider now one, now another possibility, to seesaw in the air, while he himself proudly and unkindly despises it all.

Still, by what right do we call a man despairing who gives up another man? It is one thing to despair yourself; it is something else to despair about another man. Oh, well, but if that is still true which the lover understands, and if it is true that one, if one is the lover, understands what the lover understands, that at every moment there is the possibility of the good for the other man: then the giving up of another man as hopelessly lost, as if there were no hope for him, is a proof that one is not one's self the lover; and hence the one who gives up the possibility is the despairing man. No one can hope unless he also is loving; he cannot hope for himself without also being loving, for the good qualities hang infinitely together; but if he is loving, he also has hope for others. And to the same degree as he hopes for himself, absolutely to the same degree he hopes for others; and to the same degree as he hopes for himself, absolutely to that same degree he is the lover. And to the same degree as he hopes for others, absolutely to that same degree, he hopes for himself; for this is the infinitely precise, eternal like for like, which is in everything eternal.

Oh, everywhere where love is, there is something so infinitely profound! The true lover says: "Hope everything, give up no man, for to give him up is to give up your love for him — for if you do not give that up, then you have hope. But if you give up your love for him, then you cease to be the lover." But we generally talk in another way, in an imperious and unkind fashion of our relation to the love in us, as if one were himself the master and autocrat of his love in the same way that a man is of his money. If someone says, “I have stopped loving that man,” then he thinks that it is “that man” who loses, the man who had been the object of his love. The speaker even believes that he controls his own love in the same way as when one who has assisted another man with money says, “I have stopped giving him this assistance,” so that the giver now keeps the money himself which the other had formerly received, the one who is now the loser. For when it is a matter of money, the giver is far from losing it through this change of policy with regard to giving. But it is not so with love; perhaps the one who had been the object of love loses, but the one who “has given up his love for this man,” he is the loser. Perhaps he does not notice it, perhaps he does not notice that his very words mock him when he says, “I have given up my love.” But if he has given up his love, then he has ceased to be loving. To be sure he adds “my love for this man,” but this does not help in the same way that it does about money, for it cannot be that way with love. The adjective “loving” does not apply to me when I have given up “this man,” although, alas! I may even have imagined that he was the one who lost.

And so, too, with regard to the fact of despairing of another man — that is one’s self to be in despair. Moreover, it loses little time, this reflection! One grows worse so easily and so readily by despairing over another man — and presumably being certain of one’s self, full of hope for one’s self; and the very men who self-complacent feel safest personally, are the quickest of all to despair over others. But however easy it is, it still cannot really be done — except in thoughtlessness, which certainly is the easiest for many men. No, here again is the eternal like for like, to despair over another man is to be one’s self in despair.

For the lover hopes all things. And that is true which the lover says, that, according to his understanding, even at the last moment there is the possibility of the good, even for the most disheartened, hence, there is also hope. It is true, and it will be true for everyone in his relations to other men, if he will hold his imagination in check, undisturbed and unobscured by unkind passions, with the eternal view of the reflection of the eternal in the possibility. If therefore a man cannot understand what the lover understands, then it must be because he is not the lover; it must be because there is something which prevents him from keeping the possibility clear (for if the possibility is kept clear, everything is possible), while he lovingly chooses the possibility of the good, or hopes for the other man. It must be because there is something which oppresses a man and gives him a tendency to expect faintheartedness, destruction and perdition for the other man. This sense of oppressiveness is the worldliness and thus the earthly passions of the unloving mind. For worldliness is in itself heavy, hard, supine, slow, out of harmony, and cannot admit the possibility, least of all the possibility of good, either for its own sake or for the sake of another.

There is a shrewdness which, almost proud of this shrewdness, believes that it has a particularly profound knowledge of the shabby side of existence, the knowledge that everything ends in wretchedness: how could one with this viewpoint even at the last moment be able in love to hope for another man, who already early in the day begins to expect and to be prepared for his destruction! — There is wrath and indignation; even if one does not have murder on his conscience, he still hopelessly gives up the hated, hence he takes the possibility away from him; but is not this to slay him spiritually, spiritually to thrust him down into the abyss — insofar as that depends on wrath and indignation!

There is an evil eye. How could an evil eye be able lovingly to catch sight of the possibility of the good? There is envy. It is swift to give a man up, and yet it does not really so much give him up as it lets him go; not only that, it is early ready to help along his destruction. And when this has been made certain, then envy hastens to its spiteful retreat and calls together its even more abominable kinsfolk, who are called spitefulness, so that they may rejoice together — to their own detriment.

There is a cowardly, timorous pettiness, which does not have the courage to hope anything for itself! How then could it hope the possibility of the good for others? For that it is too petty, and has too much kinship with envy! There is a worldly, vainglorious mind which would die of shame and disgrace if it should happen to make a mistake, to be made a fool of, to become a laughingstock (the most terrible of all horrors!) through having hoped for another man something which did not come to pass. So this vainglorious and worldly mind insures itself by hoping nothing, and it finds the idea of lovingly hoping all things so infinitely foolish and so infinitely laughable. But in that the vanity of the world is wrong, for what is foolish is never infinite; that would be exactly the consolation of one who while he lived must endure much of the world's foolishness, so that he might always be able to say: "It does not last forever, no, God be praised! it has an end." Nor is experience right in saying that the wisest thing is not to hope everything for another man — yet, of course, experience is right, otherwise it must learn and teach how foolish it is for a man to love others for the sake of his own advantage; and only insofar as a man does that is he unwise in hoping everything.

When then all this, this shrewdness, this wrath and indignation, this envy, this spitefulness, this cowardly, timorous pettiness, this worldly, vainglorious mind, when all this, or at least some of it, is in a man, and in the same degree as it is present in him: then there is no love, and in the same degree as all this is present in him, the love is correspondingly less. But if there is less of love in him, there is also less of the eternal; but if there is less of the eternal in him there is also less possibility, less sense of the possibility (for the possibility arises from the fact that the eternal touches in time the eternal in man; if there is nothing eternal in this man, the contact with the eternal is in vain, and there is no possibility); but if there is less possibility there is also less hope, just because and as there is less love, which might lovingly hope the possibility of the good. The lover, on the other hand, hopes everything; no indolence of habit, no pettiness of understanding, no sophistry of prudence, no amount of experience, no slackness of the years, no bitterness of evil passions corrupt his hope for him or falsify the possibility. Every morning, aye, every moment, he renews his hope and recreates the possibility, while love abides and he in it.

Even if the lover is not able to do anything else for others, even if he is not able to bring any other gift: he still brings the best gift, he brings hope. There, where everything seems so hopeful and is so rich in expectation for the promising youth, there love still brings the best gift, hope; but also there where men already for a long time have believed they had held out to the uttermost, there too love hopes to the last, moreover to the "last day," for not until then is hope past. If you have ever seen a physician going about among the sick, then you have certainly noticed that the best gift he brings, better than all medicine, and better even than his care, is the hope he brings, when it is said, "The doctor hopes." Still a doctor has only to do with temporal conditions, therefore it must happen again and again that the moment comes when it would be false for him to deny that he had given up the sick, that the sickness was unto death. But the lover — what joy for the lover that he always dares to hope; what joy to him that eternity always vouches to him that there is always hope. For the lover, the true lover does not hope because eternity vouches to him for it, but he hopes because he is the lover and he thanks eternity that he dares hope. And so he always brings the best gift, better than congratulations on the greatest happiness, better than all human sympathy for the greatest unhappiness; for hope, the possibility of good, is the support of eternity. When all the calamities befell the race, hope still remained behind. On that paganism and Christianity are agreed; the difference is, and it is an infinite one, that Christianity has an infinitely lower conception of all these calamities, and an infinitely more blessed conception of hope. But the hope which remained, remained only with the lover. If there were no love, then neither would there be hope; it would be like a letter which lies uncalled for. If there were no love, it would be with hope as with a letter whose contents would be so very welcome, but where there was no one to deliver the letter. Then love, although greater than hope, would assume it as its duty and its task, to bring hope.

However, is there not something dark, something obscure in all this reflection, so that one cannot' rightly decide what it is all about? For "Love hopeth all things" may indicate that the lover hopes everything for himself, and it may indicate that the lover lovingly has everything for others. But this is after all one and the same; and this obscurity is simply the clarity of the eternal, if one understands that it is absolutely one and the same. If it is love alone which hopes everything (and Paul does not say that hope hopes everything, but that love hopes everything, just because, as he says, love is greater than hope), then it follows as a matter of course (because it is love and because of what love is) that the lover hopes everything for others, since his love is the condition of his hope for himself. Only earthly understanding (and its clarity is not to be recommended), only earthly understanding, which understands neither love nor hope, believes that hoping for one's self and hoping for others are two entirely different things, as well as that love is a third thing in itself. Earthly understanding thinks that a man can just as well hope for himself without hoping for others; and that he does not need love in order to hope for himself, whereas he certainly needs love in order to hope for others, for the beloved; and why should one hope for any others than these? Earthly understanding does not notice that love is by no means a third thing in itself, but it is the middle term: without love no hope for one's self, with love hope for all others; to the same degree as one has hope for one's self, to the same degree one hopes for others, for to that same degree one is loving.

Blessed be the lover, he hopes all things; even in the last moment he hopes the possibility of good for the most perverted. He learned it from eternity; but only because he was the lover could he learn from eternity, and only because he was the lover could he learn this from eternity. Woe to him who with respect to another man gave up hope and possibility, woe to him, for thereby he himself lost love!

Love hopes all things and — is never put to shame. We speak in relation to hope and expectation, about being put to shame; we believe that one is put to shame when his hope or expectation is not fulfilled. In what does the disgrace consist? Certainly it must lie in the fact that one's calculating cleverness has not reckoned correctly, that (to one's shame) it becomes apparent that one has irrationally miscalculated himself. But, good heavens! the disgrace would not be so dangerous; it is after all really so only in the eyes of the world, whose ideas of honor and shame one would still not take pride in appropriating for one's self. For that which the world most admires and alone honors, is shrewdness, or acting cleverly. But to act cleverly is certainly the most contemptible thing of all. If a man is clever, he is in a certain sense not responsible for that; that he develops his cleverness is nothing to be ashamed of; it is rather the more clever. And it is certain (something which particularly needs to be said in these clever times, where cleverness has really become that which must be overcome by the help of Christianity, as were once ferocity and savagery), if men do not learn to despise acting cleverly as profoundly as they despise stealing or bearing false witness: then one completely does away with the eternal, and along with it everything which is sacred and worthy of honor — for acting cleverly simply consists in employing one's whole life in bearing false witness against the eternal, in stealing existence from God. Acting cleverly is, namely, incompleteness, whereby one undeniably gets farthest in the world, gains worldly goods and advantages, and the world’s honor, because the world and worldly advantages are, everlastingly understood, incompleteness. But neither eternity nor the Holy Scriptures have ever taught any man to strive to come far or farthest in the world; on the contrary they warn him not to come too far in the world, in order, if possible, to keep himself pure from the world’s pollution. Still, if this is the condition, then it does not seem to be something to recommend to anyone who aspires to getting farthest or far in the world.

If anything can be truly said about being put to shame as regards hope and expectation, the source of the disgrace must lie deeper, must lie in what one hopes, so that one is essentially put to shame equally whether one’s hope is fulfilled or not; the difference will only be that when the hope is not fulfilled, perhaps in one’s resentment and despair it then becomes evident how firmly one had adhered to that for which it was shameful for him to hope. If hope were fulfilled, this would not perhaps have become apparent, but the disgrace would essentially have been the same.

Still, if one hopes for something for which it is a disgrace to hope, regardless of whether the hope is fulfilled or not, one does not really hope. It is a misuse of the noble word “hope” to juxtapose it with anything like that; for the fact of hoping lays hold essentially and eternally on the good — so one can never be disgraced by hoping.

One may (in order for a moment to use the wrong word) be put to shame through hoping for one or another earthly advantage — if it does not materialize. But the disgrace does not really lie in the fact that it does not happen, that one’s hope was unfulfilled, the disgrace consists in its now becoming evident, through one’s being disappointed, how important such a worldly advantage would be to one. This is, therefore, not hoping, it is wishing, desiring, expecting; and so one can be made to feel ashamed. — One can be put to shame through giving up hope for another man — if it now appears that he is, nevertheless, saved, or perhaps even that his destruction lay in our imagination. In this case one is really put to shame because it is a disgrace to one to give up another whatever the outcome is. — One can be put to shame through hoping evil for a man — if it appears that everything turns out for the good for him. The vindictive man says sometimes that he hopes to God that vengeance will overtake the one he hates. But truly this is not hoping, but hating; and it is shameless to call it hoping; blasphemous to wish to make God a partner in hating! The vindictive man is not put to shame because things do not turn out as he expected, but he is and would be put to shame regardless of what happens.

The lover, on the contrary, hopes everything, and is never put to shame. The Scriptures speak about a hope which will not be ashamed. Thereby one thinks immediately of the hope which concerns the one who hopes, his hope for the forgiveness of sins, and sometime of becoming eternally happy; his hope for a blessed reunion with those from whom death or life had separated him. And only in relation to this hope, which is hope, could there be any question of being put to shame; for truly it would not be a disgrace to one to have had this hope, but on the contrary, an honor, and hence it might seem that the shame would be in the nonfulfillment of the hope. So consistent is the Scripture usage, it does not call all kinds of expectation, the expectation of the manifold, hope; it knows only one hope, the hope, the possibility of the good and of this hope, the only one which might be put to shame, because the fact of having it, say the Scriptures, is an honor which shall not be put to shame.

Yet, if the lover's hope is for another man, might it not be possible that the lover would be put to shame — if his hope were not fulfilled? Is it not possible that a man might be eternally lost? But now if the lover had hoped everything, had hoped the possibility of the good for this man, then would he be put to shame through having had this hope?

How! If the prodigal son had died in his sins, and had consequently been laid in his grave with shame — and the father who even in this last moment had hoped all things, stood near: did he stand there disgraced? I thought it was the son who was disgraced, the son who brought shame to the father — but then the father must have honor, for it is impossible to put to shame one who is shamed. Alas, this troubled father was least concerned about the honor; but truly he stood there in honor! If there were on that side of the grave no salvation for the prodigal son, if he were eternally lost — and the father who, as long as he lived, had persisted in hoping all things, even still at the hour of death had hoped all things: would he in eternity be put to shame? In eternity! No, eternity has the conception of eternity about honor and shame; eternity does not even understand, it separates from itself as the dishonoured, the clever who will only talk about how far now one's expectation had achieved fulfillment, but who do not consider at all what that expectation was. In eternity everyone will be forced to understand that it is not the outcome which conditions the honor or the shame, but the expectation itself. In eternity, therefore, it will precisely be the unloving one, who still perhaps was right in what he pettily, enviously, hatefully expected for another man, he will be put to shame although his expectation was fulfilled. But the honor belongs to the lover. And in eternity there will be no busy gossip heard about his having made a mistake — perhaps it would also be a mistake to become eternally happy; no, in eternity there is but one mistake: to be, together with his fulfilled, petty, envious, hateful expectations, excluded from eternal happiness! And in eternity no mockery will wound the lover because he was foolish enough to make himself a laughing-stock through hoping everything; for in eternity the cry of the mocker is not heard, even less than in the grave, because in eternity naught is heard but the voices of the blessed! And in eternity no envy will touch the wreath of honor which the lover bears with honor; no, envy does not reach so far. However far it reaches, it does not reach from hell to Paradise!

IV. LOVE SEEKETH NOT ITS OWN

LOVE SEEKETH NOT its own. — I Corinthians 13:5

NO, LOVE DOES not seek its own; for seeking its own is precisely selfishness, egotism, self-seeking, or whatever names the uncharitable mind may use to describe it. And yet, is not God love? But He who created man in His image, so that he might resemble Him, might become perfect even as He is perfect, hence, might approach the perfection which is God Himself, might resemble the image which is the image of God: does He not seek His own? Yes, He seeks His own, which is love. He seeks it by giving everything, for God is good, and there is only One who is good, God who gives everything. Or was not Christ love? But He came into the world in order to become a pattern, in order to draw men unto Himself so that they might resemble Him, might in truth become His own: did He then not seek His own? Yes, He sought His own by sacrificing Himself for everyone, so that they might resemble Him in His very likeness, in sacrificial devotion. Still, in that sense the seeking His own is something quite different, and by no means what we think of when we speak about seeking one's own or about not seeking one's own. Love is precisely sacrifice; that it seeks love is again the supreme love. That is to say, it is so in the relation between God and man. For when a man seeks another man's love and seeks himself to be loved, then that is not sacrifice, for sacrifice would precisely consist in helping the other man to seek God. Only God is unreservedly able to seek love, and to be Himself the object of that love, yet without seeking His own. But no man is love. Therefore if a man seeks to become the object of another man's love, he is seeking his own deliberately and fraudulently; for the only true object of a man's love is "the love" which is God, which therefore in a still more profound sense is not any object, since He Himself is the love.

So let us then, with the act of sacrificial devotion in our thoughts (and it is then really not an act, not doing this or that), speak about:

LOVE SEEKETH NOT ITS OWN.

Love seeketh not its own; for in love there is no mine and thine. But “mine” and “thine” are only a determination of the relationship of “own”; if, consequently, there is no “mine” and “thine,” then there is no “own”; but if there is no “own” at all, it is impossible to seek one’s own.

Justice is recognizable by the fact that it gives to everyone his own, just as in turn it demands its own; that is to say, justice goes to law about the “own,” weighs and divides; decides what each one has a right to call his own, judges and punishes, if anyone refuses to make the distinction between “mine” and “thine.” In this self-willed yet legally justified “mine,” the individual has the right to do what he will; and if he does not seek his own in some way other than as justice prescribes, then justice has nothing to reproach him about, and no right to reproach him for anything. So each one is entitled to his own. As soon as he is deprived of his own, or as soon as he deprives another of what belongs to him, then justice steps in, for its duty is to secure the common safety in which everyone is protected in his own rights.

But sometimes something happens, a revolution, a war, an earthquake, or some such terrible catastrophe, and everything is thrown into confusion. Justice tries in vain to secure everyone his own, to maintain the difference between “mine” and “thine”; it cannot do it; in the confusion it cannot hold the balance even, it throws the balance away: it despairs!

Terrible spectacle! And yet, does not love in a certain sense, although in the most blessed way, occasion the same confusion? But love, it too is an event, the greatest of all, the most joyful of all; love is a change, the most remarkable of all, but the most desirable — we are not now speaking in a preferential sense about the fact that one who is affected by love is changed or becomes changed; love is a revolution, the most profound of all, but the most blessed! So then in love there is confusion; in this blessed confusion there is for the lovers no difference between “mine” and “thine.” Wonderful! There is a “you” and an “I,” and there is no “mine” and “thine”! For without “you” and “I” there is no love, and with “mine” and “thine” there is no love; but “mine” and “thine” (these pronouns of possession) come from “thou” and “I,” and hence it seems as if they must be wherever there is “thou” and “I.” This is also the case everywhere except in the love which is a fundamental revolution. The more profound the revolution is, the more completely the difference of “mine” and “thine” disappears, the more perfect is the love. Its perfection depends essentially upon its not appearing that concealed at bottom there has lain and lies a difference between “mine” and “thine”; hence it depends essentially upon the completeness of the revolution. The more profound the revolution is, the more justice trembles; the more profound the revolution is, the more perfect is the love.

Does the difference between “mine” and “thine” then absolutely cease in earthly love and friendship? There does take place in love and friendship an overturning of the selfishness which is moved by self-love and by this stubborn “mine” and “thine.” The one in love feels beside himself, outside of the ego, carried forward into that blessed confusion, so that for himself and the beloved, for him and the friend, there is no difference of “mine” and “thine”; “for,” says the lover, “everything which is mine is his... and what is his is... is mine!” How? Has then the difference between “mine” and “thine” ceased? When “mine” has become “thine,” and “thine” “mine,” then there is everywhere a “mine” and “thine,” only that the change which took place indicates and vouches for the fact that it is no longer the first, the immediate “mine” of self-love which stands stubbornly against the “thine.” With the exchange the headstrong “mine” and “thine” has become the common “thine” and “mine.” There is, consequently, fellowship, perfect fellowship in “mine” and “thine.” When “mine” and “thine” exchanged become the “our” in which the determination love and friendship has its strength, they are at least strong in that. But “our” is for fellowship exactly what “mine” is for the individual, and the “our” is formed — not of the obstinate “mine” and “thine,” for there can be no union between these, but of the united, the interchanged “thine” and “mine.” Therefore we see that love and friendship as stick are only improved and augmented self-love; while undeniably earthly love is life’s most beautiful happiness, and friendship the greatest temporal good! In earthly love and friendship the revolution in self-love is by no means radically deep enough; therefore the obstinate difference between “mine” and “thine” of the primitive selfishness still slumbers within it as a possibility. It is therefore regarded as an entirely significant symbol of love that the lovers exchange rings with each other; truly it is also entirely significant, but a mediocre symbol of love — that they must exchange rings. And an exchange by no means ends the difference of “mine” and “thine,” for that for which I exchange mine becomes in turn mine. When friends blend their blood with each other, it is certainly a fundamental exchange, for when the blood is blended a confusion arises: is it my blood which courses through my veins? No, it is my friend’s; but then, too, it is also my blood which flows in my friend’s veins. That is to say, an “I” is no longer itself the first, but a “you,” yet conversely, the case is the same.

How then is the difference “mine” and “thine” completely removed? The difference of “mine” and “thine” is an antithetical relation, they exist only in and with each other; therefore take one difference completely away and the other also completely disappears. Let us first attempt in the difference “mine” and “thine,” to take the distinction “thine” completely away. What do we then have? Then we have crimes and offenses against the law; for the thief, the robber, the swindler, the man of violence, in the distinction "mine" and "thine," recognizes nothing, he will not recognize "thine" at all. But just for that reason he also absolutely loses the distinction of the "mine." Even if he does not himself understand it, even if he hardens himself against understanding it, justice essentially understands that a criminal has really no sense of "mine"; as a criminal he is without this discriminating sense; and in another way: the richer the criminal becomes through the stolen "thine," the less "mine" he has. Now in the difference "mine" and "thine," take away the difference of the "mine" completely, what do we then have? Then we have the self-abnegating, the self-denying, the true love. But again if the category "thine" completely disappears, what is there then for reflection to understand, even if for a moment this seems a bewildering thought? The curse that rests on the criminal is that his "mine" disappears because he has abolished the "thine." The blessing that rests upon true love is that the qualification "thine" is dropped, so that everything becomes the true lover's; as Paul says: "All things are yours," and as the true lover in a certain divine sense says: "All things are mine." And yet, yet this happened only once in that he simply had no "mine"; hence, "All things are mine, I, who have no 'mine' at all." But that all things are his is a divine mystery; for, humanly speaking, the true lover is the sacrificing lover, the self-sacrificing, the absolutely self-denying lover; he is, humanly speaking, the one wronged, wronged most deeply of all, even if he is himself responsible because of his own perpetual sacrifice. He is thus quite exactly the opposite of the criminal who is the offending one.

An earthly lover is not exactly the opposite of the offender, however different he is from him; for an earthly lover still seeks in a certain, frequently unconscious sense his own, and thus he has a "mine." Only in the self-denying love does the category of "mine" completely disappear, and the distinction of “mine” and “thine” become completely abolished. When, namely, I know nothing which is “mine,” when nothing at all is “mine,” then is everything “thine,” which it also is in a certain sense, and thus the sacrificing love thinks of it. Still, everything, unconditionally everything, cannot be “thine,” since “thine” is a contrast-relationship, and in “everything” there is no possibility of contrast. Then the miraculous takes place, which is the blessing of heaven upon the self-denying love, that in the mysterious sense of the eternal happiness, everything becomes His, His who had no “mine” at all; His who in self-denial made all “His” into “thine.” Since God is, in other words, everything, and just through having no “mine” at all, self-denying love gained God, and gained everything. For he who loses his soul shall gain it; but the discrimination “mine” and “thine,” or the “thine” and “mine” of love and of friendship is the preservation of the soul. Only spiritual love has the courage to be willing to have no “mine” at all, courage absolutely to end the difference “mine” and “thine,” therefore it gains God — through losing its soul. Here again is seen what the early Fathers understood, that the virtues of the pagans were glittering vices.

The true lover does not seek his own. He does not understand the strict demands of justice and of equity, not even of fairness, regarding the “own”; nor does he understand an exchange, as earthly love does, which also understands how to guard against being fooled (hence, understands how to guard its “own”); nor does he understand fellowship, as friendship does, which also understands how to see that like is given for like, so that the friendship may be preserved (hence, understands how to guard its own). No, the true lover understands only one thing: to be fooled, to be deceived, to give everything without receiving the least reward — that is what it means not to seek his own. Oh, the poor fool, how ridiculous he is — in the eyes of the world! The true lover is absolutely the injured one — for which in a certain sense he was himself responsible because of his self-denial. Yet it was in this way that the overturning of the “mine” and “thine” reached its highest point, and thereby love also attained its highest happiness in itself. No ingratitude, no envy, no unappreciated sacrifice, no ridicule instead of thanks, nothing either present or future, can earlier or later make him understand that he has any “mine,” or make it evident that he nevertheless had forgotten the difference “mine” and “thine” for only a moment; for he has eternally forgotten this difference, and has eternally understood himself in sacrificial love, has understood himself in being sacrificed.

Love seeketh not its own. For the true lover does not love his own characteristics; on the contrary, he loves every man according to his own characteristics; but the phrase “his own characteristics” is exactly the expression for his “own”; hence the lover does not seek his own; just the opposite, he seeks the other’s “own.”

Let us for a moment look at nature. With what infinite love nature, or God in nature, embraces all the differences there are in life and existence. Recall sometime what you have so often delighted in observing, recall the beauty of your field! There is no, oh, no difference in the love — but in the flowers, what a difference! Even the least, most insignificant, unattractive, poor little flower, overlooked even in its most immediate environment, which you hardly discover unless you are looking particularly for it, it is as if it had also said to the creating love: “Let me be something in myself, something characteristic.” And then love had helped it to become its own individuality, but far more beautiful than anything the poor little flower had ever red to hope. What love! First, it makes no distinctions, none at all; next, which is like the first, it makes infinite differences itself in loving the difference. Wonderful love! For what is so difficult as in loving not to make any distinctions; and if one simply makes no distinction, what then is so difficult as to make distinctions! Imagine then that nature was as men are, severe, domineering, cold, partial, petty, capricious — and imagine, aye, just imagine, what might then happen to the beauty of the fields!

So, too, with respect to the love between men, only the true love loves every man according to his own characteristics. The strict, the domineering man lacks flexibility, and he lacks adaptability in understanding others; he demands his "own" from everyone, wishes that everyone might be remodelled to resemble himself, might be pruned according to his knack for training men. Or he does what he regards as manifesting a rare degree of love; for once he makes a single exception, he tries, so he says, to understand a single man, that is, he considers, in a quite definite and particular — and arbitrary manner, something definite for this man, and now demands that this other man shall carry out this idea. Whether it is consistent with the other man's individuality or not, has nothing to do with the case, for it is what the domineering man has planned for him. If the strong, imperious man is not allowed to create, then he at least wishes to remodel, that is, he seeks his "own," so that everywhere he points he will be able to say: "See that, that is my own idea; I thought of that, that is the way I wanted it." Whether the arrogant and imperious man is referring to some big thing or a small one, whether he tyrannically rules over an empire, or is a domestic tyrant in an attic, makes no essential difference; his nature is the same: imperiously not to be able to forget himself, imperiously to wish to crush the other man's individuality, or make his life miserable for him. The nature is the same — the greatest tyrant who has ever lived, and who had a world to tyrannize over, finally became weary of it, and ended by torturing flies, but truly his nature remained the same!

And as the strict imperious arrogance only seeks its own, so, too, does petty-mindedness, the enviously-imperious, the cowardly-timorous pettiness. What is pettiness? Is pettiness a natural characteristic, that is, is any man originating from the hand of God, born petty? No! Pettiness is creation's own wretched invention, when, neither truly proud nor truly humble (for humility before God is the true pride), it creates itself, and also distorts God, as if He too were petty, as if He could not bear individuality — He, who lovingly gives everything, and yet, yet, gives everything individuality. Pettiness must therefore not be confused with humble gifts or with what we narrow-mindedly enough call the insignificant. Imagine such an insignificant man — if he has the courage to be himself before God, then he has individuality; but truly such an insignificant man, yet what am I saying, no, such a noble man, is never petty-minded. One should guard against this mistake; and so one should not confuse a simple, noble simplicity, which does not understand much, with a narrow-minded stupidity which cowardly and stubbornly only wishes to understand its "own." The narrow-minded man never has had the courage for this divinely pleasing venture of humility and pride; being one's self before God — for the emphasis rests on "before God," since He is the origin and well-spring of all individuality.

He who dares to do this, has individuality; he has learned to know what God had already given him; and he believes in entirely the same sense in the individuality of every man. To have individuality is to believe in the individuality of everyone else; for the individuality is not "mine," it is the gift of God through which He permits me to be, and through which He permits everyone to be. This is just the unfathomable wealth of goodness in God's goodness that He, the Almighty, still gives in such a way that the receiver is given individuality; that He who creates from nothing yet creates individuality, so that the creature, as over against Him, the Creator, does not become nothing, although he is taken from nothing and is nothing, but becomes an individuality. Pettiness, on the contrary, which is an assumed nature, has no individuality, that is, it has not believed in its "own" individuality, therefore it cannot believe in that of anyone else.

Pettiness has dung firmly to a definitely fixed shape and form which it calls its own; it seeks only that, can love only that. If the petty-minded man can find this, then he loves it. So petty-mindedness sticks with petty-mindedness, they grow into each other, which spiritually understood is just as pernicious as an ingrowing nail. This petty union is regarded then as the highest type of love, as the true friendship, as the truly loyal, sincere unanimity. The petty-minded man does not wish to understand that the more he lays hold on this pettiness, the farther away he is from true love, the greater becomes the falsity of the petty-mindedness — and it is worse, moreover, if he takes advantage of God's name, and uses it to his own profit, presumably so that petty-mindedness will be the only object of God's love, the only one in which He has pleasure. This petty connection is then equally petty in both directions: equally petty in idolizing some particular man who is of its "own" kind, perhaps its inventor, or yet one who from the least trial up to the least pettiness proves to have absolutely the countenance, demeanour, voice, thought-processes, manner of speech and cordiality of pettiness; and equally petty in wishing to supplant everything else. Just because pettiness is an assumed nature, and hence untruth; just because it has never fundamentally and frankly laid hold on God, but has petty-mindedly bungled its own affairs and falsified God; just because of these it has a bad conscience.

To the one who has individuality no strange individuality is a refutation, it is rather a confirmation, or a further proof; for it cannot disturb him that it appears, as he believes, that everyone has individuality. But to pettiness every individuality is a refutation; that is why the petty-minded man feels a clammy, uncomfortable uneasiness on seeing a strange individuality, and nothing else is so important as to get rid of it. Petty-mindedness demands, as it were, of God that every such individuality be destroyed, so that it may appear that petty-mindedness is right, and that God is a jealous God — petty-mindedly jealous. It may sometimes serve as an excuse that petty-mindedness really imagines that its wretched invention is true, consequently it is a proof of sincere friendship and true sympathy to wish to bungle everything and make everyone into a resemblance of itself. When this is so, petty-mindedness is generally free in the use of hearty words and assurances. But it really is, what is not usually mentioned, a self-defense, an instinct for self-preservation, which makes petty-mindedness eager to do away with everything except its own. One hears it in its asthmatic breathing, which gasps for air, how it will perish if it does not get rid of this discomfort, this apprehensiveness; one sees it in its glance, how uncertain of itself it is deep within itself, and therefore how craftily and also how rapaciously it lies in wait for its prey: so that it may prove that petty-mindedness is right and is the victor. As one who in peril of life permits everything because it is a matter of life and death, so does petty-mindedness act in the same way; it is only natural that all the means it uses to defend its life and to deprive the individuality of life, should naturally be extremely petty; for although it permits everything, you may be sure that the everything it permits is everything petty.

"But do not earthly love and friendship love the beloved or the friend for his personal characteristics?" Yes, that is true, and yet it is not always absolutely true; for earthly love and friendship have their limitations, they can surrender everything to the other's personality but not love and friendship itself to the other's personality. Suppose now that the other's personality demanded just this sacrifice! Suppose the lover saw, to his delight, that he was loved, but also saw that it would be very detrimental to the beloved's individuality, would mean his ruin, however much he desired it: aye, then the earthly love, as such, is not able to make this sacrifice. Or suppose that the beloved saw that such a relationship would be the ruin of the lover, would completely upset his personality: aye, then earthly love, as such, has not the strength to make this sacrifice.

But the true love, the sacrificing love, which loves every man for his own characteristics, is willing to make every sacrifice: for it does not seek its own.

Love seeketh not its own; for it chooses rather to give so that the gift looks as if the gift were the recipient's own possession.

When in our civic relationships we speak about men's circumstances, we make a distinction between those who are their own masters and those who are dependent, and we wish for everyone that he might sometime be able to become his own, as we say. But in the world of the spirit, too, the being one's own is highest — and affectionately to help someone to become himself free, independent, his own, to help him to stand alone: that is the greatest benefit one man can confer upon another. What consequently is the greatest benefaction? It is in truth the one we have mentioned, that is, please notice, if the lover also knows how to make himself inconspicuous, so that the one he helped does not become dependent on him — through being indebted to him for the greatest of all benefits. That is to say, the test of the greatest benefit is simply: the manner in which the only true benefit is conferred. Essentially it can be conferred in but one way, even if in another sense, there are many ways; when the benefaction is not conferred in this way, it is very far from being a benefaction. So one cannot say directly what the greatest benefaction is, since the greatest benefaction, that of helping another man to be independent, cannot be done in a direct manner.

Let us try to understand this. When I say, "This man stands only through my help," and what I say is true: have I then done the highest possible for him? Let us see! What do I mean by that? I say, "He stands only and alone by my help" — but then he does not stand alone, then he has not become his own, then it is to my help that he owes all this — and he is conscious of that fact. To help a man in this manner is really to deceive him. And yet this is the way in which the greatest benefactions in the world are, as often as not, conferred, that is, in a way in which they cannot be conferred; and yet it is the way which the world particularly appreciates — which is natural, for the true way of conferring a benefit makes itself invisible, hence is not seen, and thus, the world, as it were, exempts those concerned from all dependence. But the one who is aided in the wrong way, the meaningless way, he is inexhaustible in his praise and gratitude to me as his greatest benefactor (because he now stands alone by the aid of a dependent relation to me); he and his family and all his connections honor and praise me as his greatest benefactor, because I have affectionately made him dependent on me, or — yes, it is strange, he expresses his gratitude in an absolutely meaningless way, for instead of saying that I have made him dependent on me, he says that I have helped him to stand alone.

Hence the greatest benefit cannot be bestowed in such a way that the recipient comes to realize that he owes it to me; for if he learns to know that, then it simply is not the greatest of benefactions. If, on the other hand, someone says, “This man stands alone — through my assistance,” and what he says is true: aye, then he has done for this man the most that one man can do for another, he has made him free, independent, a self, an ego, and just through concealing his aid, has helped him to stand alone. Consequently, to stand alone — by another’s aid! You know there are many authors who use dashes on every occasion to conceal their lack of thought; and there are also others who use dashes with insight and propriety: but truly a dash is never used more significantly than in this little sentence — where it is used by one who, it is well to note, has perfected its use, if such a thing is possible; for in this little sentence the thought of the infinite is contained in the most ingenious manner, the greatest contrast is overcome. He stands alone — that is the most important thing; he stands alone — you see nothing more; you do not see the assistance or support, no awkward bungler's hand holding him up, any more than it occurs to him that anyone has helped him; no, he stands alone — by another's help. But this other's help is hidden, concealed from him — from the one helped? No, from him, from the eyes of the independent man (for if he knows that he has been helped, then he is not in the most profound sense the independent one who helps and has helped himself), that other's help is hidden behind the dash.

There is a noble wisdom which yet in a good sense is also infinitely cunning and subtle. It is well known; were I to mention the strange word by which it is called, there would hardly be anyone in these times who was not acquainted with it — by name: still, perhaps there are not so many who would recognize it if one were to describe it without mentioning its name. It and its name are often blamed in the world; and yet even this is not so strange, for the world is a very confused thinker who because of mere thoughts has neither time nor patience to think one thought. That noble, simple, wise man of old, he was the master of this wisdom, and truly this noble man was still not just a bad or evil man; he was also, if I may express myself a little whimsically, he was, and that one cannot deny him, he was a kind of thinker, even if not as profound as modem thinkers in their modes of thought and expression, even if not so worthy of admiration as being able to explain — for he was never able to explain more than what he understood

This noble wag had profoundly understood that the most one man can do for another is to set him free, to help him to stand alone — and he had also understood himself in understanding that, that is, he had understood that if this is to be done, then the one who helps must be able to conceal himself, must magnanimously be willing to annihilate himself. He was, as he also called himself, in the spiritual sense a midwife, and he labored disinterestedly in this service, making every sacrifice — for this disinterestedness lay in the fact that it was concealed from the one helped, both the how and the fact that he was helped; the disinterestedness lay in the fact that the world could not understand, and hence could not appreciate his disinterestedness, something it is never able to do, for it simply cannot understand why one does not wish to be considered interested; on the other hand, why an interested party even more interestedly might wish to be regarded as disinterested.

In this understanding about helping another man, the true lover and that noble wag are in agreement. The latter knows in himself, and it is true that he has done the other man the greatest service possible; he knows himself how he has worked for this, what time and industry and art it has cost him to inveigle the other man into an admission of the truth; how much misunderstanding he has had to endure from the one he helped by depriving him of his folly and cleverly leading him to the acquiring of the truth. For the art of divesting a man of his folly is a dangerous one to practice; that noble wise man himself says "that men became so angry with him that they were sometimes ready to bite him, every time he took away a stupid idea from them" — for they regarded as love that which confirmed them in their folly. What wonder then that they were angry at anyone who wished to take that, their choicest treasure, away from them! Thus he labored; and when the work was finished he said quite softly to himself: "Now this man stands alone." But thereby we come to the dash; and with the dash a smile comes upon the lips of this man, so noble and yet so mischievous, and he says, "Now this man stands alone — by my help"; he reserves for himself the secret of this inscrutable smile. Truly there is no trace of malice in this smile; he himself knows that what he has done is well-intentioned, that it is in truth a benefaction, and in truth the only way in which it could be done: but the smile, that is, however, the self-conscious smile of ingenuity.

It is otherwise with the lover. He too says: "Now this man stands alone." Then comes the dash. Oh, but this dash signifies for the lover something other than a smile; for however noble and magnanimous and disinterested that wise rogue was, he still did not love the one he wished to help with a true sense of concern. While then by means of the cunning of the dash, that wag accomplishes this task with infinite ease, and this is precisely his art, that he was able to do everything for the other man, and still let it seem as if he had done nothing: so, too, for the lover, although in the thoughtful sense the dash is infinitely easy, in another sense (it is well to notice there is nothing to notice) it is like a labored breathing, almost like a deep sigh. For in this dash is concealed the sleepless anxiety, the toilsome night watches, the almost desperate exertion; in this dash is concealed a fear and trembling which, and for that reason more terribly, has never found expression. The lover has understood that in truth the greatest, the only benefit that one man can bestow upon another, is to help him to stand alone, to become himself, to be his own; but he has also understood the danger and suffering involved in the passionate labor, and above all, the terrible responsibility. Therefore in gratitude to God he says: “Now this man stands alone — by my help.” But there is no self-satisfaction in this last phrase; for the lover has understood that every man essentially stands alone — by the help of God, and that the lover’s self-annihilation is merely so that he may not hinder the other man’s God-relationship; so that all the lover’s help infinitely disappears in the God-relationship. He works without reward; for he makes himself into nothing, and just at the moment when some mention might be made of it, so that he could retain a proud self-consciousness as a reward of his labor, God steps in, and he is again annihilated, which nevertheless makes for his eternal happiness.

Suppose a courtier had it in his power to make himself important to someone to whom an audience with his majesty was of extreme importance. But now, if we can imagine such a situation, suppose the courtier, by putting himself to one side, were able to secure this audience at any time for the one seeking it: I wonder, then, if the suppliant, in his joy at having received an audience, would entirely forget the poor courtier; the poor courtier, who had had it in his power, unkindly, sometimes to secure an audience with his majesty for the seeker, had had the power to put him under particular obligations, to make himself loved for his love; the poor courtier, who instead of doing this had lovingly chosen to set himself to one side, and just by so doing, to pave the way for the suppliant at any time to secure an audience with his majesty, to help the seeker to the independence which at any time is permitted access to his majesty!

This is the way with all the lover's work. Truly he does not seek his own, for he gives precisely in such a way that it looks as if the gift had been the recipient's possession. So far as the lover may, he seeks to help a man to become himself, to become his own. But in this way there is simply nothing changed in existence, except that the lover, the concealed benefactor, is thrust outside, since it is every man's destiny to be free, to be independent, to be himself. If the lover in this respect has been a fellow-laborer with God, everything has still become — like the fulfillment of the destiny. If it is noticed that the lover has helped, then the relationship becomes confused, or then the helper has not helped lovingly, the lover has not helped in the right way.

Wonderful memory, which the lover acquires as thanks for his labor! He can in a manner of speaking, pack his whole life into a dash. He can say: "I have labored in spite of everyone, early and late, but what have I accomplished — a dash! (If what he had accomplished could be directly seen, then he would have worked less lovingly.) I have suffered as severely as any man, inwardly as only love can suffer; but what have I gained — a dash! I have proclaimed the truth clearly and thoughtfully in spite of everyone; but who has appropriated it — a dash!" Had he, namely, not been the lover, then would he, certainly less thoughtfully, plainly have shouted forth the truth, and then he would have had disciples at once, who would have appropriated the truth — and hailed him as master.

Is the lover's life then wasted, has he absolutely lived in vain, since there is nothing, nothing at all, which witnesses to his work and striving? Answer: is, then, not to seek his own, is that to waste his life? No, truly, this life is not wasted; the lover knows that in his blessed joy in himself and with God. His life is in a certain sense quite wasted on existence, on the existence of others; without wishing to waste any time or strength in asserting himself, in being something for himself, he is in his self-sacrifice willing to perish, that is, he is wholly transformed into being merely an active power in the hand of God. Therefore his work cannot be made visible. His work consists simply in helping another man or other men, to become their own, which in a certain sense they were before. But when one actually has by another's help become his own, then it is absolutely impossible to see that it is by another's help; for if I see the other's help, then I see, too, that the one helped did not become his own.

V. LOVE COVERETH A MULTITUDE OF SINS

THE TEMPORAL HAS three times, and therefore it never really absolutely exists, or absolutely in any one of them. The eternal is. A temporal object can have many different attributes, and in a certain sense can be said to have them all at one time, insofar as it is what it is in these definite attributes. But duplication in itself never has a temporal object; as the temporal disappears in time, so too it exists only in its attributes. On the contrary, when the eternal is present in a man, then this eternal so reduplicates itself in him, that every moment it is present in him, it is present in a twofold manner; in an outward direction, and in an inward direction back into itself, but in such a way that this is one and the same thing; for otherwise it is not duplication. The eternal is not merely in its own attributes, but is in itself in its attributes; it not only has attributes, but is in itself when it has attributes.

So now with love. What love does, that it is; what it is, that it does — and at one and the same time: at the very moment it goes out of itself (the direction outward) it is in itself (the direction inward); and at the very moment it is in itself, it thereby goes out of itself, so that this outgoing and this return, this return and this outgoing, are simultaneously one and the same.

When we say that "Love gives fearlessness," we mean by that, that the lover by his very nature makes others fearless; everywhere where love is present, it spreads fearlessness; one freely approaches the lover, for he drives out fear. Whereas the suspicious man frightens everyone away from him, whereas the cunning and the crafty spread fear and painful unrest about them, whereas the presence of the tyrant oppresses like the heavy pressure of sultry air: love gives fearlessness. But when we say that "love gives fearlessness," we also say at the same time, something else, that the lover has fearlessness, just as it is said that love gives boldness on the day of judgment, that is, it makes the lover fearless in the judgment.

When we say, "Love saves from death," it is precisely a duplication of the thought: the lover saves another man from death, and he saves, either in absolutely the same or yet in another sense, himself from death; he does it at one and the same time, it is one and the same thing; he does not save the other at one moment and himself the next, but at the very moment that he saves the other, he saves himself from death. Only love never thinks about the latter, about saving himself, about himself acquiring fearlessness; the lover in his love thinks only about giving fearlessness and saving another from death. Yet the lover is not therefore forgotten. No, the one who lovingly forgets himself, forgets his own suffering to consider another's, forgets all his own wretchedness in order to think of another's misery, forgets what he himself loses in order lovingly to consider another's loss, forgets his own advantage in order lovingly to look at another's: truly such a one is not forgotten. There is One who considers him: God in heaven; or love considers him. God is love, and when a man from love forgets himself, how then could God forget him! No, while the lover forgets himself and thinks of the other man, God thinks of the lover. The self-lover is busy, he shrieks and shouts, and stands for his rights in order to make certain of not being forgotten — and yet he is forgotten; but the lover who forgets himself, he is remembered by love. There is One who thinks of him, and thereby it comes to pass that the lover gets what he gives.

Look at the duplication: what the lover does, that he is, or he becomes that; what he gives, that he has, or he gets it — wonderful, as that "out of the eater came forth meat." Still, perhaps someone says, "It is not so wonderful that the lover has what he gives, that is always the case; what one does not have, one cannot give." Oh, well, but is it then also always the case that one keeps what one gives, or that one gets that which one gives to another; that just by giving one gets, and gets exactly the same one gives, so that the thing given and the thing received are one and the same? Ordinarily this is probably not the case, but, on the contrary, what I give the other gets, not that I myself get that which I give to another.

So love is always duplicated in itself. This holds true, too, when it is said that love covers a multitude of sins.

In the Scriptures we read that which is "love's" own word, that many sins were forgiven to the one who loved much — because the love in him conceals the multitude of sins. However, we shall not speak about that at this time. In this little essay we are constantly discussing the works of love, consequently we are looking at love directed outward. With this meaning in mind, we shall now speak about:

LOVE COVERETH A MULTITUDE OF SINS.

Love covers a multitude of sins. For it does not discover the sins; but the fact that it does not discover what still must exist, insofar as they can be discovered, that is hiding them.

The concept "multiplicity" is in itself indefinite. Thus we speak about all the multiplicity of creation, yet this same word signifies something very different, depending on who is speaking. A man who has spent his entire life in an out-of-the-way place, and has therefore acquired little taste for studying nature: how little does he know, and yet he speaks about the multiplicity of creation! A naturalist, however, who has traveled around the world, who has been almost everywhere, both above and beneath the surface of the earth, who has seen the much that he has seen; who has by the use of the telescope sometimes discovered otherwise invisible stars, sometimes by the use of the microscope has discovered otherwise invisible insects; what an astonishing variety he knows, yet he uses the same word, "the multiplicity of creation." And further; while the naturalist rejoices at what he succeeded in seeing, he readily admits that there is no limit to discoveries, since there is no limit to the invention of instruments used in making these discoveries. Consequently the multiplicity of creation, with new instruments constantly being invented, becomes greater and greater, and can always appear to increase — while it still, all things considered, is comprehended in the phrase, “multiplicity of creation.” The same holds true about the multitude of sins, in that the word may signify very different things, depending on who the speaker is.

Consequently one discovers that the multitude of sins is constantly increasing; that is, through their discovery, it constantly seems to be increasing, naturally also by the help of the discoveries one makes about how cunningly, how suspiciously one acts in order to make discoveries. He who makes no discoveries, consequently hides the multitude of sins, for to him the multitude is less.

But discovery is something praiseworthy, something admirable, even if this admiration is sometimes forced to bring the heterogeneous together in a strange way; for one admires the naturalist who discovers a bird, but one also admires the dog that discovered purple. Still, we shall let this pass for what it is worth, but it is certain that the world admires and praises discoveries. And on the other hand one who makes no discoveries, or as good as none, is rated very low. We readily say about someone, in order to brand as an eccentric one who is wrapped up in his own thoughts, “He really does not discover anything.” And if we wish to designate one as being especially limited and stupid, we say, “He will certainly never invent gunpowder!” — which certainly is not necessary in our time, since it has already been invented; so it would be an even more questionable matter if someone in our time were to think that he was the one who invented it. Oh, but the fact of having made some discovery is so admired by the world that one cannot forget the enviable lot: of the one who discovered gunpowder!

Of course it is easy to see that the lover who discovers nothing looks very mediocre in the eyes of the world. For even in regard to evil, in regard to sin and the multiplicity of sin, one discovers that there is the smooth, cunning, obtrusive, perhaps half-corrupt observer, who really can make discoveries: that is highly regarded in the world. Even the youth the very moment that he steps out into life (for he would certainly object to having the world call him a fool) is most willing to disclose how he knows and has discovered evil. Even a woman in her earliest youth (for she would then object to having the world call her a little goose, or a rustic innocent), will readily disclose that she is vain of being a judge of character, naturally in the direction of evil. Moreover, it is incredible how the world has changed in comparison with old times: then there were some few who knew themselves; now all men are judges of character. And this is the curious thing; if someone had discovered how fundamentally humane almost every man is, he would scarcely dare to make his discovery known for fear of being laughed at; perhaps he might even fear that the community would feel insulted at the idea. On the other hand, if someone pretends that he has discovered how fundamentally paltry every man is, how envious, how selfish, how faithless, what abominations can dwell secretly in even the purest, that is, in the one who is regarded by fools and geese and rustic innocents as the purest: then he knows vaingloriously that he is welcome, that the world is longing to hear the results of his observations, his research, his stories. Thus have sin and evil acquired a greater power over men than one ordinarily imagines: it is so silly to be good, so intellectually stupid to believe the good, so provincial to betray ignorance, or that one is not an initiate — an initiate into the most intimate mysteries of sin.

Here we see very clearly how evil and sin in a great measure are the consequence of a vainglorious comparison of one’s self with the world and with other men. For one can be quite certain that the same men, just because they vaingloriously fear the judgment of the world, strive in their intercourse with others to be agreeable and interesting by betraying a sophisticated knowledge of evil. One can be quite certain that those same men, when they are alone in quiet meditation, where they do not need to be ashamed of the good, hold a very different view. But in intercourse with others, in society, when one is with many or at least a few, and hence where the company affords a comparison, a comparison-relation, of which vanity cannot possibly remain unconscious: each one tempts the other to disclose what he has discovered.

Yet there are times when even the absolutely worldly-minded man makes an exception, sometimes judges a little more leniently the one who discovers nothing. Suppose that two shrewd men of affairs had some decision to make to which they did not wish to have witnesses, but they were unable to arrange it otherwise, so that their conference must take place in a room where a third party was present — and this third party, as they knew, was very much in love, happy in the first days of love: is it not true that one of the businessmen might say to the other, “Well, it doesn’t matter if he is present, he won’t hear anything”? They would say it with a smile, and by this smile they would pay tribute to their own astuteness; but they would still have a kind of respect for the lover who discovers nothing.

And now the lover! For whether the world laughs at him, whether it ridicules him, whether it pities him, or whatever the world says about him, it is certain that concerning the multitude of sins, he discovers nothing, not even this laughter, this ridicule, this pity; he discovers nothing, and he sees but very little. He discovers nothing; we here make a difference between discovering as a conscious act, as a deliberate attempt to find out something, and the involuntary seeing or hearing something. He discovers nothing. And yet, whether one laughs at him or not, whether or not one ridicules him: fundamentally one has an inward respect for him, because resting in, engrossed in his love he discovers nothing.

The lover discovers nothing, hence he conceals the multitude of sins which would be exposed through the discovery. The life of the lover is an expression of the apostolic precept of being a child in malice. That which the world really admires as shrewdness is an understanding of evil — wisdom is essentially the understanding of the good. The lover has no understanding of evil and does not wish to have; he is and remains, he wishes to be and to continue to be in this respect a child. Place a child in a den of thieves (but the child must not remain there so long that it becomes itself perverted), hence let it remain there only a very short time; then let it come home and tell of all its experiences: you will see that the child, who (like every child) is a good observer and has an excellent memory, will tell everything with the utmost detail, yet in such a way that in a sense the most important things are omitted, so that one who did not know that the child had been among bandits, would least suspect it from the child's narrative. What is it then which the child omits? What is it that the child did not discover? It is the evil. And yet the child's description of what it saw and heard is absolutely accurate. What is it then the child lacks? What is it that so frequently makes a child's narration the most profound mockery of its elders? It is the sense of evil, and that the child lacks the sense of evil, so that the child finds no pleasure in wishing to understand it. Herein the lover resembles the child. But as a basis of all understanding there must first and foremost be an understanding between the one who will understand and the thing which shall be understood. Therefore, too, the understanding of evil (however much it wishes to delude itself and others into thinking that it can preserve its purity, that it has a pure understanding of evil) is still in understanding with the evil; if this understanding did not exist, if the intelligent man did not take pleasure in understanding it, then he would abominate the understanding of it, would prefer not to understand it. Even if this sense of evil indicates nothing else, it is still a dangerous curiosity about evil; or it is a cunning search for an excuse for its own fault in spreading evil by the aid of knowledge; or it is the false reckoning which exaggerates a man's feeling of importance by the help of his knowledge about another man's corruption.

But let one set a strict guard upon himself; for if out of curiosity one offers evil the little finger, it soon takes the whole hand. And it is most dangerous of all to have ready a stock of excuses; and to become better, or to seem to be better, through comparison with the badness of others, is to become better in a bad way. However, if even this understanding discovers the multitude of sins, what discoveries must not the even more confidential understanding, which is really in a covenant with evil, be able to make! As the jaundiced see everything as yellow, so such a man discovers, as he sinks deeper and deeper, an increasing manifold of sin about him. His eye is alert and trained, not for the understanding of truth, hence for untruth; consequently his sight is prejudiced more and more, so that increasingly defiled, he sees evil in everything, impurity even in what is purest — and this sight (O terrible thought!) is still to him a kind of consolation, for it is important to him to discover as boundless a multitude as possible. At last there are no limits to his discovery; for now he discovers sin even where he himself knows that there is none; he discovers it by the help of backbiting, slander, the fabrication of lies, in which he has trained himself so long that he at last believes it. Such a man has discovered the multitude of sins!

But the lover discovers nothing. There is something so infinitely solemn and yet also so childlike, something which recalls a childish game, when the lover by discovering nothing at all, hides the multitude of sins; something that recalls a childish game; for that is the way we play with a child. We play that we cannot see the child who is standing in front of us, or the child plays that it cannot see us, and this the child finds indescribably amusing. The childlikeness here is that the lover, as in the game, with his eyes wide open, cannot see what is happening just in front of him; the solemnity consists in the fact that it is the evil which he cannot see. We all know that orientals honor a demented person, but this lover, who is worthy of honor, is, as it were, a demented person. We all know that in the old times they made, and rightly, a great distinction between the two kinds of madness, one was a distressing sickness, and one bemoaned such a misfortune; the other was called a divine madness. If we may for once be excused for using the pagan word "divine": it is a divine kind of madness, lovingly not to be able to see the evil which lies just in front of one. Truly, it is really necessary in these clever times, which have so much understanding of evil, that we should make some effort to learn to honor this madness; for unfortunately it is all too frequent in these times that such a lover, who has a great understanding of the good but does not wish to understand the evil, is looked upon as a madman.

Imagine, to mention the supreme example, imagine Christ at the moment when He was silent before the Counsel; imagine the infuriated mob, imagine the group of dignitaries — and then imagine how many a glance they directed towards Him, their eyes upon Him, only waiting for Him to look at them so that their glance might convey their mockery, their contempt, their pity, their insults, to the accused! But He discovered nothing; lovingly He concealed the multitude of their sins. Imagine how many an abusive epithet, how many insults, how many taunts were shouted at Him — and each participant was so terribly insistent that his voice should be heard, so that, above all, it might not seem that he had been so indescribably stupid as to have missed the opportunity, as not to have been there participating in common with everyone else, hence as the true instrument of public opinion, in insulting, in injuring, in mistreating an innocent man! But He discovered nothing; lovingly He hid the multitude of their sins — by discovering nothing.

And He is the pattern; the lover has learned from Him, when he discovers nothing and thereby hides the multitude of sins, when like a worthy disciple, “forsaken, hated, bearing his cross,” he walks between mockery and pity, between insults and lamentations, and yet lovingly discovers nothing — in truth more wonderful than when the three men walked unscathed in the fiery furnace. Still, ridicule and insults really do no harm, if the one insulted does not harm himself by discovering them, that is, by becoming resentful. For if he is resentful he discovers the multitude of sins. If you really wish to illustrate more clearly how the lover by discovering nothing hides the multitude of sins, then sometime do away with love. Imagine that the lover had a wife who loved him. Therefore, just because she loved him, she would discover how many sinned against him; she would, affronted, with resentment in her soul, discover every mocking glance; with bruised heart she would hear the insults — whereas he, the lover, would discover nothing. And when the lover, insofar as he could not avoid seeing and hearing some things, would still have the excuse ready for the aggressor, that he himself was at fault; then his wife would not be able to discover any fault in him, but only the more, how many had sinned against him. Do you see now, as you consider what his wife and with truth discovered, do you see how true it is that the lover who discovers nothing, hides a multitude of sins? Imagine this applied to all the relationships of life, and you will admit that the lover really hides a multitude of sins.

Love covers a multitude of sins; for what it cannot avoid seeing or hearing, it hides by keeping silent, by a lenient explanation, by forgiveness.

Through silence it hides the multitude of sins.

It is sometimes the case that two lovers wish to keep their relationship secret. Suppose now that at the moment they confessed their love for each other and promised each other secrecy, there happened quite accidentally to be a third party present, but this intruder was an honest and kindly man who could be relied on, and that he pledged them his silence: would not the love of the two be concealed and continue to be so? But this is the way the lover behaves when he inadvertently, quite accidentally, never because he has tried to, becomes cognizant of a man's sin, of his fault, of how he had offended, or how he had been overtaken in a fault: the lover keeps silent, and hides a multitude of sins.

Say not that "the multitude of sins still remains equally great whether one keeps silent or tells about them, since the silence certainly does not take them away merely because no one mentions them"; rather answer the question: "Does not the one who discloses his neighbor's faults and sins, increase the multitude of sins?" Even if it be true that the multitude of sins remains equally great whether I keep silent about them or not, when I keep silent, I am still doing my part to conceal them. And, furthermore, do we not say that rumor really increases them? We mean thereby that rumor makes the guilt greater than it actually is. Still, I am not thinking of this now. It is in quite a different sense that we may say that the rumor which tells of the neighbor's fault, increases the multitude of sins. Let one not take too thoughtlessly the knowledge of a neighbor's faults, as if it were quite proper if it was once decided that what was said was true. Truly not every witness as to what is true concerning a neighbor's faults, is therefore without guilt; and just through being made a witness to a neighbor's fault, one may easily himself become guilty. So rumor grows, or the one who tells of his neighbor's fault, increases the multitude of sins. The fact that men through rumor, through village gossip, are accustomed inquisitively, frivolously, enviously, maliciously perhaps, to learn of their neighbor's faults, that is debasing to men. It would certainly be desirable if men once more learned how to be silent. But if there must be talk, and consequently inquisitive and frivolous talk, then let it be about stuff and nonsense — the neighbor's fault is and ought to be too serious a matter; inquisitively, frivolously, enviously, to talk about that is, therefore, a sign of depravity. But he who, by telling of his neighbor's faults, helps to pervert men, he increases the multitude of sins.

It is unfortunately only too certain that every man has a strong propensity for seeing his neighbor's faults, and perhaps for making them even greater in telling about them. If there were nothing more to this (alas, but there is) than, to use the mildest expression possible, a kind of nervousness which makes one so weak in this temptation, in this excitement of being able to tell something bad about one's neighbor, in securing to one's self for a moment breathless attention by the help of such an interesting story! But that which is already pernicious enough as a nervous desire which cannot keep silent, is sometimes in a man a horrible, devilish passion developed on the most terrible scale. Is any robber, any thief, any bandit, in short, any criminal, at bottom so depraved as the man who has made it his task, his despicable occupation, on the greatest possible scale, more vociferously than any word of truth ever sounds, extending far over the whole land as anything profitable rarely does, intruding into every corner where the word of God scarcely enters, to proclaim his neighbor's fault, his neighbor's weaknesses, his neighbor's sins; to obtrude on everyone, even the most unstable youth, this defiling knowledge — is there really any criminal so fundamentally depraved as such a man, even if it were so, even if the evil he told about were true! Even if it were so; but it is inconceivable that one who had the earnestness of eternity could be strict in verifying that the evil he described was unconditionally true, and so could be willing to sacrifice his life in this — abhorrent service of truth: the telling of evil. In our prayers to God we pray that God will not lead us into temptation; but if it should happen, and if it should happen that I fell into temptation — merciful God, yet one favor, that my sin and my guilt might be such as the world rightly regards as abominable and rebellious! The most terrible thing of all must still be to incarnate guilt, heaven-crying guilt, to incarnate guilt and again guilt and new guilt day in and day out — and simply not notice it, because one's whole environment, because existence itself, had changed into an illusion, which confirmed one in thinking that it was nothing, that it not only was not guilt, but that it was almost meritorious!

Oh, there are criminals whom the world does not call criminals, whom it rewards and almost honors — and yet, yet would I rather, which God forbid! but I would rather enter into eternity with three repented-of murders on my conscience than as a worn-out slanderer with this horrible, interminable burden of offense, which had been accumulating year after year, which had been spreading itself to an almost inconceivable degree, which had laid men in the grave, embittered the most intimate relationships, injured the most innocent compassion, defiled youth, led astray and perverted both old and young, in short, extended itself on a scale which even the most vivid imagination can form no conception of — this horrible burden of offense, which I still had never found time to begin to repent of, because the time must be used in committing new offenses, and because the infinitude of the offenses had secured me wealth, influence, everything but esteem and, above all, an enjoyable life!

We still make a difference, with respect to incendiarism, whether the one who sets fire to a house, knows that it is occupied by a number of people or that it is vacant: but through scandal to set, as it were, a whole community on fire, that is not even regarded as a crime. We still quarantine against the plague — but that plague, which is worse than the oriental pestilence, the slander which perverts the soul and mind, that we open our house to, we pay money in order to be defiled, we greet as a welcome guest that which brings defilement!

Say, then, whether it is not true, that the lover by keeping silent about his neighbor's faults hides a multitude of sins, when you consider how by telling them, one increases them.

By an extenuating explanation, the lover hides the multitude of sins.

There is always an explanation for something being what it is. The fact or the facts underlie the situation, but the explanation swings the balance. Every event, every word, every act, in short, everything, may be explained in many ways; as someone has falsely said that clothes make the man, so one can truly say that the explanation makes the object of the explanation into what it is. As regards another man's words, deeds, modes of thought, and so on, there is no such certainty, so that to accept them really indicates choosing. The interpretation, the explanation is therefore, just because a different explanation is possible, a choice. But if there is a choice, then it constantly lies in my power, if I am the lover, to choose the more extenuating explanation. If, then, this milder or more extenuating explanation explains what others frivolously, overhastily, hardheartedly, enviously, maliciously, in short, unlovingly, as a matter of course, explain as guilt, if the extenuating explanation explains this in another way, then it takes away now one fault, now another, and thus makes the multitude of sins less, or conceals it.

Oh, if men would rightly understand what a beautiful use they could make of their imagination, their acuteness, their ingenuity, their ability to co-ordinate, by using it in every possible way to discover an extenuating explanation: then would they increasingly taste one of the most beautiful joys in life; it could become to them a passionate pleasure and need, which would cause them to forget everything else.

Do we not see this in other relationships, how, to mention this one instance, the hunter with every year becomes more and more passionately devoted to the chase? We do not commend his choice, but we are not speaking about that; we are speaking only about how with every passing year, he devotes himself more and more passionately to this occupation. And why does he do this? Because with every year his experience increases, he becomes more and more resourceful, he overcomes more and more difficulties, so he, the old, experienced hunter, now knows trails no one else knows, knows how to track the game where no one else is able to, now has signs that no one else understands how to make use of, now has discovered a more ingenious method of setting traps, so that he is fairly certain of always succeeding in having a good hunt, even when everyone else is unsuccessful.

We regard it as a burdensome, but yet in another respect, a satisfying and fascinating occupation to be the servants of justice who track down guilt and crime. We are astonished at such knowledge of the human heart, at their knowledge of all, even the most sophistical excuses and inventions, how they can remember from year to year, all, even the most trivial circumstances, just in order, if possible, to secure a clue; at how, if they only glance at the circumstances, they can, as it were, adjure them so they will provide the proof against the guilty; how nothing is too humble to attract their attention, insofar as it might contribute to enlightening their understanding of crime. We admire him when such an officer of justice, by bearing with what he calls a really hardened and thoroughgoing hypocrite, at last succeeds in wresting away his disguise and making his guilt evident. Ought it not to be just as satisfying, just as fascinating, by bearing with what one calls an occasional unseemly conduct, to discover that it was really something quite different, something well-intentioned! Let the judge be appointed by the state, let the officers of justice work to discover guilt and crime: the rest of us are neither called on to be the judge nor the officer of justice, but, on the contrary, we are called by God to love, hence by the help of the extenuating explanation, to cover the multitude of sins. Imagine such a lover, equipped by nature with the most glorious capacities, which every judge must envy him, but all these capacities employed with a zeal and an endeavor which would do honor to a judge, in the service of love, in order to train himself in the art, in order to practice the art, the art of interpretation, which by the help of an extenuating explanation, conceals the multitude of sins! Imagine his rich, his blessed experience, considered in its noblest sense; what a knowledge he has of the human heart; how many noteworthy and touching incidents he has seen, in which, no matter how complicated they seemed, he still succeeded in discovering the good, or even the better, because he had for a long, long time held his judgment in suspense, until quite definitely a little circumstance came to light which led him to a clue; how by swiftly and boldly centering his whole attention on a quite different aspect of the matter, he had had the good fortune to discover what he was looking for; how by thoroughly exploring the man's life-relationships, by obtaining the most meticulous enlightenment about his condition, he finally triumphed in his explanation! Hence, he "came upon the trail," "he had the good fortune to find what he sought," "he triumphed in his explanation" — alas, is it not strange that whenever these words are read outside of their context, almost every man involuntarily connects them with the uncovering of a crime: we are all so much more apt to think about discovering evil than about discovering good. So the state appoints the judges and the civil officers for the purpose of discovering and punishing the evil. As to the rest, we form associations for the praiseworthy purpose of relieving the poor, educating the orphans and lifting up the fallen: but, in addition to these worthy undertakings, to get by means of the extenuating explanation only a little power, even if it were very little, over the multitude of sins — for this purpose no association has been created!

However, how the lover by means of the extenuating explanation hides the multitude of sins, we do not care to pursue further at this time, since in the two preceding reflections we have considered that love believes all things and hopes all things. But lovingly to believe all things and lovingly to hope all things are the two principal expedients which love, that lenient interpreter, uses for the extenuating explanation which hides a multitude of sins.

Through forgiveness love covers a multitude of sins.

Silence really takes nothing away from the multitude of notorious sins. The extenuating explanation takes away some from the multitude by showing that this or that was not really sin; forgiveness takes away that which still cannot be denied as being sin. So love strives in every way to hide the multitude of sins; but forgiveness is the most outstanding way.

In one of the preceding pages we were reminded of the expression "multiplicity of creation"; let us again employ it for the purpose of illustration. When we say that the investigator discovers a multitude of things, while in comparison with him, the ignorant, who also speak about the multiplicity of creation, certainly know very little: then, consequently, the ignorant do not know that this and that exists, but it exists for all that; it is not taken away by nature because of their ignorance; it is only that in their ignorance it does not exist for them. It is different concerning the relation of forgiveness of sins to the multitude of sins; forgiveness takes the forgiven sins away.

This is a wonderful thought, hence also the thought of faith; for faith always lays hold on that which is not seen. I believe that the visible has come into existence from that which is not seen; I see the world, but the invisible I do not see, I believe it. So there is also in "forgiveness — and sin” a relation of faith, which one more rarely notices. What here is the invisible? The invisible is, that forgiveness takes away that which still exists; the invisible is, that that which is seen, yet still is not seen; for when it is seen it is evidently invisible so that it is not seen. The lover sees the sin he forgives, but he believes that forgiveness takes it away. This cannot be seen, since the sin can be seen; and, on the other hand, if the sin could not be seen, then neither could it be forgiven. As one, therefore, through faith believes the invisible in the visible, so the lover through forgiveness believes the visible away. Both premises are true. Blessed the believer, he believes what he cannot see; blessed the lover, he believes that away which he still can see.

Who can believe this? The lover. But why is forgiveness so rare? Is it not because faith in the power of forgiveness is so little and so rare? Even a better man, who is by no means inclined to bear malice or spite, and far from being unforgiving, is often heard to say: “I could readily forgive him, but I don’t see how that can help.” Oh, it is not seen! Still, if you have ever yourself needed forgiveness, then you know what forgiveness can do: why do you speak with so little experience or with such unkindness about forgiveness? For there is something really unkind in saying: “I do not see how my forgiveness can help him.” We are not saying that as if a man should become self-important through having it in his power to be able to forgive another man, far from it. This would also be unkindness; truly there is a way to forgive which perceptibly increases the guilt instead of diminishing it. Only love has — know it seems like jesting, but let us speak thus, only love is resourceful enough through its forgiveness to take the sin away. When I am oppressed by the thought of forgiveness (the fact that I am slow to forgive, or that being able to forgive makes me feel self-important), then no miracle takes place. But when love forgives, the miracle of faith takes place (and since every miracle is one of faith, what wonder, therefore, that along with faith miracles, too, are abolished!): so that which is seen, yet through being forgiven, is not seen.

It is erased, it is forgiven and forgotten, or, as the Scriptures say about what God forgives, it is hidden behind His back. But that which is forgotten, one is not ignorant of, for one is ignorant only of that which one does not know and never has known; what one has forgotten that one has known. Forgetting is in this highest sense the opposite not of remembering but of hoping; for hoping is in reflection to give existence; forgetting is in reflection to take existence from that which still exists, to erase it. The Scriptures teach that faith lays hold on things not seen, but they also say that faith is the substance of things hoped for; which means that that which is hoped for is, as it were, the unseen, that which does not exist, that to which, on the contrary, hope through reflection gives existence. Forgetting, when God does it in relation to sin, is the opposite of creating; for creating is bringing forth from nothing; forgetting is resolving back into nothing. What is hidden from my eyes, that I have never seen; but what is hidden behind my back, that I have seen. And just in this way does the lover forgive: he forgives, he forgets, he erases the sin; affectionately he turns toward the one he forgives; but when he turns toward him he cannot see what is lying behind his back. That it is impossible to see what lies behind one's back is easy to understand, as also that this expression is also rightly the invention of love; but, on the other hand, it is perhaps then difficult to become the lover who by the aid of forgiveness puts the other's fault behind his own back. It is generally easy for men to place the guilt, even of a murder, upon another man's conscience; but by the aid of forgiveness to put his guilt behind his own back, that is difficult. However, not for the lover; for he hides the multitude of sins.

Do not say, "The multitude of sins remains equally great, whether the sin is forgiven or not, since forgiveness neither takes from nor adds to." Rather answer the question: “Does not the one who unlovingly refuses his forgiveness increase the multitude of sins, not only by the fact that this, his unforgivingness, becomes one sin more, which nevertheless is true and ought then to be taken into account?” Still, we shall not emphasize this at this time But is there not a secret relationship between sin and forgiveness? When a sin is not forgiven, it demands punishment; it cries to men or to God for punishment; but when a sin cries for punishment, then it looks quite different, far greater than when the same sin is forgiven. Is this only an optical illusion? No, it is actually so. It is, to use a rather imperfect figure, not an optical illusion that a sore which has looked dreadful, after the doctor has drained and treated it, looks far less dreadful, although it is, nevertheless, the same sore. What does the one who refuses forgiveness do? He increases the sin, he makes it seem greater. And next, forgiveness takes the life from the sin; but denying forgiveness nourishes the sin. Therefore, even if no new sin appears, if the same old sin still persists, the multitude of sins is really increased. When a sin persists, a new sin really comes, for sin increases through sin; the fact that sin persists is really a new sin. And this new sin you might have prevented by lovingly forgiving, by taking away the old sin, as the lover does who hides a multitude of sins.

Love covers a multitude of sins; for love prevents the sin from coming into existence, strangles it at birth.

Even though with respect to one or another undertaking, a work one wishes to accomplish, one has everything in readiness: one must still wait for one thing, the occasion. So, too, with sin; when it is in a man, it waits for an occasion to manifest itself.

The occasions can be very diversified. The Scripture says that sin takes occasion by the commandment or by the prohibition. Just the fact that something is commanded or prohibited becomes then the occasion; not as if the occasion brought forth sin, for the occasion never produces anything.

The occasion is like a middleman, a broker, only helpful in the turnover; it occasions only that which has already been brought about, that which in another sense already existed, namely, as possibility. The commandment, the prohibition tempts, just because it wishes to constrain the evil, and now if sin takes occasion it takes it, because the prohibition is the occasion. Thus the occasion is, as it were, nothing, a swift something which walks between the sin and the prohibition; in a certain sense it belongs to both, while in another sense, it is as if it did not exist, although, however, again nothing, which is actually existent, came into existence without an occasion.

The commandment, the prohibition is the occasion. In an even more distressing sense, sin in others is the occasion which produces sin in everyone who comes in contact with it. Oh, how often has not an unconsidered, a thoughtless, casually dropped word, been sufficient to furnish an occasion for sin! How frequently has not a frivolous glance caused the multitude of sins to become greater! To say nothing of when a man lives under daily circumstances where he sees and hears nothing but sin and ungodliness; what a rich occasion for the sin in him, how easy the transposition between this, giving occasion and taking occasion! When the sin in a man is encompassed by sin, is it not as if it were in its own element? Nourished by the perpetual occasion, it thrives and grows (if one may be allowed to speak of thriving in connection with evil); it becomes more and more malignant; it takes on a more and more definite form (if one may speak about gaining form in connection with evil, since evil is a lie and a deception, hence without form). It consolidates itself more and more, even though its life is hovering over the abyss, hence without a foothold.

Still, everything which is occasion contributes, insofar as the occasion to sin is taken advantage of, to increase the multitude of sins.

But there is one environment which absolutely does not give and is not an occasion for sin: that is love. When a man’s sin is encompassed by love, than it is outside its own element; it is like a beleaguered city whose every connection with its own people is cut off; it is like a man who has been addicted to drink; when placed upon a scanty ration he loses his strength, vainly waiting an occasion to become intoxicated. It is certainly true, it is possible (for what cannot a depraved man divert to his own depravity!), that sin can make love the occasion for resentment, can rage against it. However, sin cannot in the long run hold out with love; such advantage as it has is generally at the beginning; just as when the drunkard in the first days, before the medical treatment has had the necessary time to make its effects felt, rages with the strength of his infirmity. And next, if there were really a man such that even love — must give up, ho, love never does that, but a man who, continually without love, took occasion to sin: just because there is one incorrigible, it does not necessarily follow that there are not many who are healed. So it continues to be exactly and absolutely true that love does cover a multitude of sins.

Oh, the magistrate must often devise very ingenious means to hold a criminal prisoner, and a physician often employs great ingenuity in formulating coercive methods for restraining a demented person; in connection with sin there is no environment so coercive, but also no coercive environment so saving, as love. How often was not the wrath that smoldered within a man only awaiting an occasion; how often was it not stifled because love gave it no occasion! How often did not the evil passion which in the sensual apprehension of curiosity sat on the lookout, spying for an occasion, perish; how often did it not perish at birth because love gave it no occasion, and lovingly watched to see that no occasion should be given! How often did it not free its soul from that resentment, which was so assured of and so prepared, moreover so set upon being able to find ever new occasions to be resentful of the world, of God, of everything; how often did it not find alleviation in a milder mood because love gave no occasion at all for resentment! How often this conceited and defiant mood, which, believing itself injured and misunderstood, therefore took occasion to become even more conceited, desired only a new occasion to prove that it was right, melted away; how often it again died down, because love so soothing, so mildly discutient, simply gave no occasion to the sick conceit! How often did it not go back to what it had contemplated, just to see if it might not succeed in finding an occasion which would justify it, and how often it returned, because love simply gave no occasion for finding an excuse for the evil! Oh, how many crimes have not been prevented, how many evil purposes defeated, how many desperate resolutions consigned to oblivion, how many sinful thoughts halted on the way to becoming deeds, how many rash words repressed in time because love gave no occasion!

Woe to the man by whom the offense cometh; blessed the lover who by refusing to furnish the occasion covers a multitude of sins!

VI. LOVE ABIDETH

Now abideth… love. — I Corinthians 13:13

YES, GOD BE PRAISED, love abides! Whatever the world may take from you, even if it were your dearest; whatever may befall you in life; however much you may in your striving for the good have to suffer, as you will if men turn indifferently away from you, or as enemies against you; if no one is willing to recognize you or he is ashamed to confess how much he, nevertheless, owes you; if even your own best friend should deny you — if you still in some of your striving, in some of your work, in some of your words have truly been inspired by love: then be comforted, for love abides. What you know of love will be a comfort to you to remember — oh, more blessed than any achievement that man may have accomplished; more blessed even than having spirits subject unto you; more blessed than being remembered by love! What you know of love will be a comfort to you to remember, that neither the present nor the future, nor angels nor devils, and also, praise God, neither your own timid thoughts which spring from a confusion of mind, nor the stormiest and most difficult moment of your life, any more than its last moment, shall be able to take this love away from you; for love abides!

And if at first despondency should make you weak so that you lose the desire to will, in order again to make you strong, alas, in the way despondency does it, strong in the defiance of despondency; if despondency wishes to make everything empty for you, wishes to transform all life into a monotonous and meaningless repetition, so that you look at everything, but so indifferently; you see the fields and forests again become green, you see the manifold life again moving in the air and water; you hear again the chorus of singing birds, again see men everywhere engaged in all kinds of labor — and you know of a truth that God exists, but it seems to you as if He had withdrawn into Himself as if He were far away in heaven, so infinitely far away from all these trivialities, which are hardly worth living for; when despondency would drain the soul out of life, then you still know, but so dubiously, that Christ has existed, but, on the other hand, you realize with an alarming clarity that it was eighteen hundred years ago, so He seems infinitely far away from all these trivialities which are hardly worth living for, then remember that love abides! For if love abides it is equally certain that it is in the future, should this be the comfort you need and it is in the present, if this is the comfort you need. Set this consolation against all the terrors of the future, that love abides; set this consolation against all the anxieties and weaknesses of the present, that love abides! Oh, it is consoling to dwellers in the desert when they know with certainty that there are water springs, and that there will be water springs however far they travel: what water springs would be so missed, what manner of death would entail so much suffering as if love had not existed and would not exist eternally!

Behold, this is a very edifying thought, that love abides. We are speaking now, when we speak thus, of the love which sustains the whole of existence, the love of God. If for a moment, a single moment, it were to cease, then would everything be thrown into confusion. But it does not cease, and therefore, however confused everything else may become for you — love abides. Hence we speak about the love of God, about this quality of abiding.

However, in this little work we are constantly dealing only with the works of love, and therefore not with the love of God, but with human love. Naturally no man is love; if he is in love, he is a lover. On the other hand, love is everywhere present where there is a lover. One might believe and one certainly thinks more frequently, that love between man and man is a relation between two. This is indeed true, but untrue insofar as this relation is also a relation between three. First there is the lover; next the one, or the ones, who are the object of his love; but for the third person, love itself is present. When then, in relation to human love, we speak about love abiding, this readily appears to be an act, or that it is not an abiding quality which love has as such, but a quality acquired at every moment, and which also, every moment it is acquired, is again an actual work. The lover abides, he abides in love, preserves himself in love; just by that he brings it about so that his love for men abides. He continues to be lover by abiding in love; through abiding in love, his love abides; it abides, and it is this thought upon which we shall now meditate, that:

LOVE ABIDES.

Love never faileth — it abides.

When a child has been away all day among strangers and now considers that it ought to go home, but is afraid to go alone, and yet really wants to stay as long as possible, it says to the older children, who perhaps wished to leave earlier, 'Wait for me'; and so the older ones do as the child asks. When of two equals one is more advanced than the other, the latter says to the first, "Wait for me"; and so the second does what the first asks. When two have planned and taken pleasure in the thought of a trip together, but one of them is taken sick, the sick man says, 'Wait for me, and so the other does as requested. If one man owes another man money and cannot pay, then he says, "Wait on me," and so the other man grants his request. When the maiden in love sees that there will be great and perhaps complicated difficulties in the way of her union with the beloved, she says to him, "Wait for me," and so the beloved does as he is asked. And all this is very excellent and commendable, to wait thus on another man. But whether it is love which thus waits, we have not yet seen. Perhaps the interval of waiting is too short really to show how far that which determines the one thus to wait, deserves in a decisive sense to be called love. Alas! perhaps the interval of waiting was so long that the older children said to the child, “No, we can’t wait any longer for you.” Perhaps the time of waiting went so slowly that the one more advanced said, “No, I can’t wait for you any longer without retarding myself too much.” Perhaps the sickness dragged out so long that the friend said, “No, I can’t wait any longer for you, I shall have to go alone.” Perhaps the time dragged out so long for the man who could not pay his debt, that the other said, “No, I can’t wait any longer on you. I must have my money now.” Perhaps the prospect of marriage with the young girl became so remote that the lover said, “No, I can’t wait any longer for you; I owe it to myself and my life not to put it off in this way any longer, hoping year after year for that which is uncertain.” — But love abides.

The fact of love abiding, or, perhaps more correctly, the question of whether it really abides in this or that case, or whether it ceases: is something which occupies the thoughts of men in such manifold ways, is so frequently the subject of their conversation, and very frequently the principal content of all their poets’ works. It is regarded as praiseworthy that love abides, but as unworthy that it does not last, that it ceases, that it changes. Only the first is love; the other seems, because of the change, not to be love — and consequently not to have been love. The facts are these, one cannot cease to be loving; if one is in truth loving, one remains so; if one ceases to be loving, then one was not loving. Ceasing to love has therefore, in relation to love, a retroactive power. Moreover, I can never weary of saying this and of demonstrating it: wherever there is love, there is something infinitely profound. For instance, a man may have had money, and when he no longer has it, it still remains entirely true that he had had money. But when one ceases to be loving, he has never been loving. What is still so gentle as love, and what so strict, so jealous for itself, so chastening as love!

Furthermore! If then love ceases, if in the love, the friendship, in short, in the affectionate relation between two, something comes between them so love ceases: then there takes place, as we say, a breach between these two. Love was the connection, was in good understanding between them; then when something comes between them, then is the love displaced, it ceases, the connection between them is broken, and the breach effects a separation between them. Consequently there is a breach. Christianity, however, does not know this manner of speaking, does not understand it, does not wish to understand it. If one speaks about there being a breach, this is because one believes that love is a relation only between two, instead of its being a relation between three, as was shown. This talk about there being a breach between the two is much too thoughtless; it gives the impression of the love-relationship being merely a matter between these two, as if there were no third party whom it concerned. If then the two are agreed about breaking with each other, there would consequently be no one to object to it. Again, because these two break with each other, it does not follow that these same two might not have affection for others; hence they retain their loving attributes, but their love now applies only in relation to others. Again, the one guilty of causing the breach would have the upper hand, and the innocent one would be defenseless. Still it would be pitiful for an innocent person to be the weaker; it certainly is this way in this world, but eternally understood it can never be this way. Therefore what does Christianity do? Its earnestness immediately fixes the attention of eternity upon the individual, upon each of the two. Just as the two clung to each other in love, each one especially clings in himself to “love.” Now that does not simply go out with the breach. Before it comes to the breach, before one came to break his love-relationship with the other, he must first have fallen away from “love.” This is the important thing; therefore Christianity does not speak of the breach between the two, but always only about what the individual can do who falls away from “love” A breach between two smacks too much of business in the temporal existence, as if then the matter were not so dangerous; but to fall away from “love,” this expression has the seriousness of eternity. Lo, now everything is in order; now eternity can maintain discipline and order; now will the innocent sufferer in and through the breach, yet become the stronger, if he, too, does not fall away from “love.” If love were solely a relationship between two, then the one would constantly be in the other’s power, insofar as the other were an unprincipled man who wished to dissolve the relationship. When a relationship is only between two, then one constantly dominates the relationship through being able to break it; for as soon as one has broken it, the relationship is broken. But when there are three, then one alone cannot do it. The third, as we said, is “love” itself, to whom in the breach the innocent sufferer can cling, so that the breach has no power over him. Nor will the guilty be able to flatter himself on making a good bargain in getting out of the affair; for to fall away from “love,” that is certainly the dearest possible price; it has an earnestness different from the hasty breaking with a particular man — and then in other respects being a good and loving man in every way.

But the true lover never falls away from “love”; therefore for him there can never come a breach; for love abides. Still in a relationship between two, can one prevent the breach if the other breaks it? It must indeed seem that one of the two is sufficient to break the relationship, and if it is broken, then there is a breach. In a certain sense this is indeed true, but if the lover still does not fall away from “love,” he can prevent the breach, he can effect the miraculous; for if he abides, the breach can never really be brought about. Through abiding (and in this abiding the lover is in a covenant with the eternal) he retains superiority over the past, so he transforms what in the past and through it, is a breach, into a possible future relationship. If viewed in connection with the past, the breach becomes with every day and with every year clearer and clearer; but the lover who abides, belongs, through abiding, to the future, to the eternal, and from the viewpoint of the future the breach is not a breach; on the contrary, it is a possibility. But to that the forces of eternity belong; and therefore the lover who abides, must abide in "love," otherwise the past, nevertheless, gradually acquires power, and then gradually the breach becomes evident. Oh, and to this, belong the powers of eternity, in the decisive moment, immediately to transform the past into the future! Yet it has this power of abiding.

How shall I now describe this work of love? Oh, that I might be inexhaustible in describing what is so indescribably joyous, and so edifying to consider!

So, then, a breach took place between the two; it was a misunderstanding, yet the one broke the relationship. But the lover says, "I abide" — so there is still no breach. Imagine a compound word, the last word is missing; there is only the first word and the hyphen (for the one who breaks the relationship can still not take the hyphen with him, the lover retains the hyphen, as naturally belonging to him), consequently imagine the first word of a compound word and the hyphen, and imagine that you know nothing further of what belongs with it; what will you say then? You will say the word is not finished, that something is missing. So with the lover. That it came to a breach cannot be plainly seen, it can only be known by an understanding of the past. But the lover will not know the past, for he abides; and abiding is in the direction of the future. Hence the lover expresses the fact that the relationship, which the other calls a breach, is a relationship which is not yet finished. But because something is lacking, it is not therefore yet a breach. It depends, consequently, on how the relationship is regarded; and the lover, he abides.

So if it then came to a breach, it was a dispute which separated the two; yet if one broke it, he said, “It is all finished between us.” But the lover abides, he says, “It is not finished between us; we are still midway in the sentence, it is only the sentence which is not finished.” Is this not true? What is the difference between a fragment and an unfinished sentence? In order to call something a fragment, one must know that there is nothing more to come; if one knows nothing about it, then one says that the sentence is not yet finished. From the standpoint of the past, that it is decided that there is no more to come, we say. It is a broken-off fragment.” As concerns the future, waiting for the next, we say, “The sentence is not finished, something is still lacking.” So if it then came to a breach, it would be dejection, coldness, indifference, which separated them; yet if one caused the breach, he says, “I no longer talk with that man, I do not even see him.” But the lover says, “I abide, so we shall still talk with each other, for in conversation silence is sometimes part of it.” Is this not true? But suppose it was now three years since they last talked together. Behold, it happens here again.

That it was three years ago, one can only know by an understanding of the past; but the lover who each day renews himself through the eternal and abides, over him the past has no power. If you saw two men sitting silently side by side, and you knew nothing else about them, would you infer that it was three years since they had talked with each other? Can anyone determine how long the silence must continue before a man can say, “Now there is no more conversation”? And if one can determine that, can one still know in the particular case, except in the sense of what was past, whether it was true, for time must certainly have elapsed? But the lover who abides constantly extricates himself from his knowledge of the past; he knows no past, he waits only on the future. Is the dancing interrupted because one dancer has gone away? In a certain sense. But if the other one continues to stand in the position which expresses the bowing toward one who is not seen, and if you know nothing about the past: then you will say, “Now the dancing ought to begin, if only the other would come for whom they are waiting.” Do away with the past; drown it in the oblivion of eternity through lovingly abiding: then is the end the beginning, and there is no breach!

If the faithless lover has deserted the maiden, but she in the darkening afterglow sits each evening by the window and waits, so she exclaims every evening: “Now he is coming, he is coming right away”; it looks every evening as if there had been no breach, for she abides. That she has sat thus every evening for three years, that she does not say on the individual evenings; therefore the past does not discover it, as little as she herself is aware of it, if she really does abide in love. Still, perhaps the maiden really loved herself. She desired union with the beloved for her own sake; it was her sole desire; her soul was at one with her desire. In gratitude for its fulfillment she would do everything to make the life of the beloved as beautiful as possible; yes, it is true, but still, still it was for her own sake that she desired the union. If this is true, if she becomes weary, if she adverts to the past, to the length of time — then she no longer sits at the window, she expresses the fact that there is a breach; but love abides.

So then it came to a breach, whatever the occasion was; the one broke the relationship; it was terrible, hate, everlasting, unforgiving hate, would for the future fill his soul: “I will never look at this man again, our ways are forever separated, the abysmal depths of hate lie between us.” He concedes certainly that inasmuch as life is a way, they are on the way together, but not in any other sense; he carefully avoids allowing his path to cross the path of the one he hates; the world is almost too small to hold them both; it is agony to him to breathe the same air as the other does; he shudders at the thought that eternity must hold them both. But the lover abides. “I abide,”

he says, "so we are still on the way together." Is this not so? When two balls (as everyone can prove for himself) strike together, so that by repulsion one takes the other with it in its course, are they not then on the way together? That it happened through repulsion is not seen, that is something in the past which has to be known. But the lover does not wish to know the past, he abides; he continues on the way with the one who hates him, so there is consequently no breach.

What wonderful strength does love not have! The most powerful word ever spoken, moreover, the creative word of God, is: "Be." But the most powerful word any man has uttered is when the true lover says, "I abide." Reconciled with himself and with his conscience, the friend of God, in a covenant with all good angels the lover walks defenseless in the most terrible war; he says only, "I abide." And so he truly is the lover, he will yet conquer, will triumph through his abiding, triumph even more gloriously than did that Roman through his hesitation. For love's abiding is in itself far more glorious. So truly he is the lover: there is no misunderstanding save the one that sooner or later must be overcome by his abiding; there is no hate such but that it must at last give up, and give way to his abiding — if not before, then in eternity. Lo, the one who secured for himself another man's love, and consequently is in possession of it, may every moment be in fear of losing it. But the one who was hated for his love, he is everlastingly certain of gaining love. If time cannot, then will eternity take away the other's hatred, open his eyes to "love" and thereby to the love which continued for the whole life, and now abides in eternity. So love never fails — it abides.

LOVE ABIDETH — IT NEVER FAILS.

That a certain natural, good disposition, a certain benevolent sympathy and helpfulness, which we gratefully appreciate, still has to spend some time in affectionately waiting — that it becomes weary in the course of time, or when it progresses so slowly and consequently over a long period of time: is only too certain. The long process of time is certainly the exigency which causes most people to liquidate their estates. In the commercial world it generally happens that a house fails because suddenly there is all at once a great run on it; but in the spiritual world it is the long time which makes away with so many. Men have spiritual strength enough for a moment, but in the long run, on the contrary, they become irresponsible. Yet love abides. Oh, how well do not the poet and the novelist know how to describe the mutability of everything, to show the power of time over all things which existed in time, over the greatest, the mightiest, the most glorious achievements, over the wonders of the world, which in time became almost unrecognizable ruins; over the most immortal names, which in time ended in the vagueness of legends!

But cannot something happen to love now while it abides, so that although it abides it is transformed in time, but yet in such a way that this transformation is not its fault but is something suffered? Consequently the relationship would be: love abides, no circumstance alters it or forces it to give itself up, yet it is transformed in a change which we call decrepitude, and that although we may say about this same love, that it never failed.

Let us for a moment speak about that which occupies men so much, about earthly love, or about that maiden, who according to the poet's tale, sits in the afterglow of evening by the window, and waits for her beloved; alas, while "time comes and time goes." Now it is something long past, for it happened, says the poet, "in a long-vanished age." The maiden did not mark how time came and went, while she waited — and while time marked her. Ordinarily we merely say that time passes; oh, it passes so swiftly for the happy, so indescribably slowly for the sorrowing! Or we say that "time is coming." Oh, it comes so slowly for the hoping, only too swiftly for the fearful. But here the poet says, and excellently, that time comes and time goes, for he wishes to describe the expectant; and for such a one it neither merely goes nor merely comes, it comes and goes. Out of sympathy for the waiting girl time, as it were, undertook to do what the faithless lover should have done. Then when the time came when "he" ought to have come, then time came, but "he" did not come; so time went again, until the time came when it was time that "he" should come who did not come. And thus time soothed the waiting maiden by coming and going, until, rocked by this movement, she rested in her expectation. Wonderful! One would think that expectation would be more apt to keep a man awake, yet expectation, when one resigns himself to it, is so soothing, and is it not then wonderful! For if you had lain down to sleep, and then suddenly while you slept a powerful fountain had begun its lofty play, you would suddenly wake up startled. But if you lie down to rest by a fountain, you never sleep more soundly, more sweetly, more refreshingly, more deliciously, than when soothed by the rippling play of this fountain.

Consequently time came and time went; the girl truly did not fall away from her love, but yet she fell away — for it was not time which vanished, no, it came and went, but the maiden wasted away. Honor to her steadfast soul! She, too, has honor, the greatest human honor: that a poet has celebrated her in his songs, not as an occasional-poet does for money, not because a girl was from a distinguished family, not because the poet had perhaps known her. No, her name is unknown, it was only her beautiful devotion which inspired the true poet. Let us never forget that thus to remain faithful to her love is a noble, womanly act, a great and glorious deed. As long as there lives a poet she will be highly honoured in the world, despite all talk about a busy domestic life; and if the world becomes so wretched that a poet no longer exists, then will the race learn to despair over having no poet, and then a poet will again come who will do her honor.

She wasted away — a sacrifice to love. And yet this is precisely the highest that can be said of any man: he is sacrificed. The problem is only about whether that for which he was sacrificed, was the highest. But the fact of being sacrificed is and remains as long as the world remains a world, eternally understood, a far greater achievement than the fact of triumphing. For the world truly is not so perfect, so the fact of triumphing in the world, precisely through identification with the world, has a serious admixture of the world's paltriness. That is, triumphing in the world is like becoming something great in the world; it is as a rule a dubious matter to become something great in the world, for the world is not so excellent that its judgment about greatness would have great significance — except as an unconscious sarcasm.

Hence the maiden is sacrificed to love. Alas, but earthly love is not in the highest sense love, and not the highest love: lo, therefore she faded away — Gloving in death as she had been in life, but mark, that earthly love had been her highest aspiration. And earthly love is a wish for this life; therefore time had power over her, therefore she faded away in love, until it also dwindled away, while she, nevertheless, showed that she had power over time, for she did not herself fall away from her love.

But love abides — it never fails. For in spiritual love itself is the spring which wells up in eternal life. That this lover, too, grows old in years and dies sometime in time, proves nothing, for his love remains eternally young. In his love he does not lay hold on the temporal existence as does earthly love, dependent on the temporal existence; for his love eternity is the true season. When he dies he has simply reached the goal; when he dies it simply shows that he had not waited in vain. Alas, when the young maiden died, we simply said: "Unfortunately it seems that she waited in vain." And how could the love which abides become infirm? Can then immortality become infirm? But what is it which gives a man immortality, what except the love which abides? For earthly love is of the temporal existence the most beautiful of temporal things, but yet the frail invention of the temporal existence. Therefore there is here a more profound contradiction. There was no fault in the maiden; she was and remained true to her love. Yet her love changed somewhat through the years. This change lies in the nature of the earthly love. The contradiction is then this: that one with the most honest intentions, willing to be sacrificed, cannot in the deepest sense be absolutely steadfast, or abide in what does not itself abide eternally — and earthly love does not do this. Perhaps the girl herself did not understand this connection; but this persistence of the self-contradiction was what made her death sad. That she is sacrificed has not the solemnity of the eternal, and, hence, neither its inspiration nor its elevation, but it has the sadness of the temporal existence, and so it inspires the poet.

The young maiden wasted away. Even if "he" had come, consequently had come before her death, it would still have been too late. She remained; but time had weakened her desire, the desire for which she lived, while at the same time the desire consumed her. In the most profound sense, on the contrary, the lover who abides, does not become infirm; his love does not consume away. If the one who misunderstood him, the one who became cold to him, the one who hated him, returns, he finds him unchanged, unchanged in his same longing for the eternal, and with the same quiet calmness in the temporal. His love is eternal, he lays hold on the eternal, he rests in the eternal; therefore he expects each moment the same as he expects eternally, and therefore he is without disquietude, for in eternity there is time enough.

When an expectation of love is essentially able to make a man infirm, it must be because his expectation halts in a dependent-relationship to time, so that time has it in its power to determine whether the expectation is fulfilled or not. That is to say, the expectation is principally a temporal expectation;

but such an expectation does not have the love which abides. That an expectation is essentially merely temporal, produces unrest in the expectation. Time does not really exist without unrest; it does not exist for dumb animals who are absolutely without anxiety; and the watch which tells the time cannot do it when the movement stops. But when the disquietude, as is the case in the merely temporal expectation, oscillates between fulfillment and non-fulfillment, so that the movement becomes swifter in time because of the passing of time, the fact that time elapses precipitates the disquietude, since the fulfillment, if it does not take place in time, cannot take place at all — when this is the case, the expectation is consumed. At last the unrest apparently disappears, alas, just as when sickness has developed into consumption. But the lover who abides, has an eternal expectation, and this eternal expectation gives a sense of proportion in the unrest, which certainly in time swings between fulfillment and non-fulfillment, but independently of time, for the fulfillment is by no means made impossible because time is past: this lover is not consumed.

What faithfulness in the love which abides! It is far from our intention to wish to disparage the loving maiden, as if it were a kind of disloyalty in her (alas, a disloyalty — to a faithless lover!) that she weakened through the years and faded away, so that her earthly love became changed in the change which is the change of love itself through the years. And yet, yet — aye, it is a strange intercrossing of the self-contradictory thought, but it cannot now be otherwise with even the highest form of faithfulness in earthly love, than that it almost seems to be disloyalty, because the earthly love is not the eternal. The contradiction does not lie in the girl, she remained faithful; the contradiction, which the girl herself suffered, lies in the fact that the earthly love is not the eternal, and consequently in the fact that it is impossible with eternal loyalty to lay hold on that which is not in itself the eternal. What faithfulness of love, on the other hand, to abide completely unchanged, without the slightest weakening, the same at every moment — whenever, at whatever time or hour, the misunderstanding, the enemy, the hater wishes to return to this lover! That he who abides never becomes infirm, is indeed to him an eternal gain; but it is in addition, and thus we here regard it, and thus he himself regards it, a work of love in faithfulness to those he loves.

And what would be so disconsolate, something indeed almost to despair over, as if, when the moment came when the mistaken one turned back and sought understanding, when the enemy turned back and sought friendship, when the one who had hated turned back and sought reconciliation — what would be so disconsolate as for the lover then to become worn out, so that neither understanding, nor the re-establishment of friendship, nor the renewed reconciliation in love would be able to bring about this blessed joy of eternity! And, on the other hand, what can make the moment of forgiveness, the transition to reconciliation so natural, so easy, as the fact that the lover (as was shown in the preceding) by constantly abiding has put the past away from him; for then on his part reconciliation is ready, just as if there had been no separation. When two people both have an idea about the past, or about the separation having been long, then the forgiveness is often a difficult collision, the relationship perhaps never becomes completely re-established. But the lover knows nothing about the past, therefore he does even this last thing in love, he reduces the shock, so that no collision can take place: the transition to forgiveness cannot be made easier. How often have not two been almost on the verge of a reconciliation, but one became hurt, as they say? If this is the case it must be because something unkind from the past has been brought out; for it is indeed impossible for one to hurt one's self on what is softer than the softest, on love. Truly, no boat which glides softly through the smooth water to where the rushes halt its progress and close about it, can be more certain of not being overturned than the one who returns and seeks reconciliation with the love that abides!

Such is the lover. That the most beautiful of everything, that the moment of reconciliation, should become a fruitless effort, a vain attempt, because by that time he had changed: he prevents that; for he abides, and never becomes worn out. And that the transition of forgiveness may be as easy as the meeting with one whom one has not seen for a long time; that the conversation of love may immediately be as natural as it is with one with whom one carries on a conversation; that the rambling pace may be as swift in measure as it is between two who for the first time begin a new life — in short, that there may be nothing, simply no halting, which might repel, not a second, not a split second: the lover effects this, for he abides and never becomes infirm.

VII. MERCY, A WORK OF LOVE, EVEN IF IT CAN GIVE NOTHING AND CAN DO NOTHING

"But to do good and to communicate, forget not" — but neither forget that this incessant worldly talk about charity and benevolence and generosity and liberality and gifts and donations is almost unmerciful. Oh, let news writers and tax gatherers and parish beadles talk about generosity and count and count the receipts; but let us never fail to realize that Christianity essentially speaks about mercy, that Christianity would be the last of all to reward the unmerciful; as if the poor and the wretched were not only in want of money, and so on, but were also excluded from the highest power of all, that of being able to show mercy, because they are not able to be generous, charitable and benevolent. But one preaches and preaches, ecclesiastically and secularly, about liberality and generosity — one forgets even while delivering the sermon, about mercy. This from the Christian standpoint is an indecency. The poor man who sits in church must groan; and why must he groan? Is it so that his groaning, together with the preacher's eloquence, might help to get the purse strings of the rich opened up? Oh, no, he must groan, in the scriptural sense he must "groan against" the preacher, because just when one is so eager to help him, one suffers the greatest injustice. Woe to the one who consumes the inheritance of the widow and the fatherless, but woe, too, to the preacher who keeps silent about mercy in order to speak about charity! The preaching should be solely and alone about mercy. If you know how to speak effectively about that, then will the benevolence follow as a matter of course, in proportion to the individual ability. But consider this, that if a man by talking about charity procured money, money, money, consider this, that by keeping silent about mercy, he acted unmercifully toward the very poor and wretched, for whom he secured relief through the help afforded by the rich gifts of charity. Consider this, that if the poor and the wretched disturb us by their petitions, we may be able to get their poverty relieved by charity, but then consider that it would be far more terrible if we forced the poor and the wretched to “hinder our prayers” by groaning against us to God, as the Scriptures say, because we atrociously treated the poor and the wretched unfairly by not telling them that they can practice mercy.

We shall in this talk about mercy keep dose to this thought, and try to guard ourselves against confusing mercy with what really belongs to external conditions, over which consequently, as such, love has no control, while it does truly have mercy in its power, just as certainly as love has a heart in its bosom. Because a man has a heart in his bosom, it by no means follows that he has money in his pocket, but the former is far more important, and is certainly decisive as regards mercy. And truly, if one had no money but really knew how to encourage and inspire the poor and the wretched by talking about mercy; then he would have done quite as much as the one who throws some money to the poor, or holds forth about charity from the rich.

So we shall meditate on:

MERCY, A WORK OF LOVE, EVEN IF IT CAN GIVE NOTHING AND CAN DO NOTHING.

We shall strive, according to the ability granted us, to make it as obvious as possible, as alluring as possible, to bring as close home to the poor as possible, what consolation there is for him in being able to be merciful. We shall speak about this by doing away with a part of the worldly illusion. But truly our desire is, by means of what we say, to contribute whatever is needed to make the one who can be charitable and benevolent as humble as possible in his giving, as is well pleasing unto God; as modest in divine shyness as is becoming to a Christian; as willing to give and yet as unwilling to confess that it is alms, as is the one who turns away his face in order not to be shamed by others seeing that it brings him honor; or as the one whose left hand actually does not know what his right hand does.

Mercy has nothing to give. It follows as a matter of course that if the merciful has anything to give, then he gives it most willingly. But it is not on this we focus our attention, but on the fact that one can be merciful without having the least thing to give. And this is of great importance, since the fact of being able to be merciful is a far greater perfection than having money, and hence being able to give.

If that man celebrated for eighteen hundred years, the good Samaritan, had not been riding but walking on the way from Jericho to Jerusalem, where he saw the unfortunate man lying; if he had carried nothing with him with which to bind up his sores; if he had then lifted the unfortunate in up, laid him upon his own shoulders and borne him nearest inn, where the landlord would under no conditions receive either him or the unfortunate, because the Samaritan did not have even a farthing, and could only beg and beseech the hard-hearted landlord to be merciful, since a man's life was at stake: if he had not therefore... still, no, the story is not even finished — hence, if the Samaritan now, far from losing patience because of this, had again gone on, carrying the unfortunate man, had looked for a softer bed for the wounded, had sat by his side, had done everything he could to stanch the flow of blood, but the unfortunate man had died on his hands: would he not then have been just as merciful, quite as merciful, as that merciful Samaritan? Or would there be any objection to calling this the story of the good Samaritan?

Take the story about the woman who laid the two pennies in the Temple chest, but let us make a little poetic change in the story. The two pennies were to her a great sum, which she had not accumulated all at once. She had saved for a long time in order to get them together; and for that she had treasured them wrapped up in a little cloth, in which to carry them when she went up to the Temple. However, a thief had noticed that she had these pennies, had stolen them from her, and had left a similar cloth in place of hers, which contained nothing — something the widow did not know. Hence she went up to the Temple, carrying, as she supposed, the two pennies, that is, nothing to the Temple chest: I wonder if Christ would still not have said what He did say of her, that "she gave more than all the rich"!

Still, mercy without money, what significance has it? Furthermore, the worldly arrogance of charity and benevolence finally goes so far as to laugh at a mercy which has nothing! For it is already bad and revolting enough, this mercilessness of the earthly existence, that when the poor gives his last shilling, and then the rich comes and gives a hundred dollars, that then all see the hundred dollars, that is, that the rich by his gifts entirely obscures the gift of the poor — his mercy. But what madness, if what Christ says is still true, that the poor gave the most, what madness: that the one who gives less (the rich — and the great sum) obscures the one who gives more (the poor — and the small portion), moreover, even obscures the one who gives most! However, of course, the world does not say that; it says that the rich gave most, and why does the world say this? Because the world understands only about money — and Christ only about mercy. And just because Christ understood only about mercy, that is why He was so particular about the fact that the widow gave only two pennies; and just for this reason He would say that not even so much was needed, or that she might have given less, and even in giving the less have given more. Wonderful arithmetic! Or rather a wonderful kind of reckoning, not to be found in any arithmetic! He uses a remarkable expression about this widow, "that she gave of her poverty." But the magnitude of the gift increases in proportion to the extent of the poverty, hence, contrary to what the world believes (that the magnitude of the gift is in proportion to the wealth), so the one who is even poorer than that widow, by giving one penny out of his poverty, gives even more than that widow, who still in comparison with all the rich gave most.

To the world this may seem the most tiresome kind of reckoning, where one penny can become so significant, can become the most significant gift. The world and the world's charity would prefer to deal with great amounts, so great that they are astonishing; and one penny certainly does not astonish — just as little as mercy is one of the shining virtues. Eternally understood, however, this kind of reckoning is the only true one, and it is learned only from eternity, and by abandoning worldly and temporal illusions. For eternity has the keenest eye for and the most completely developed sense of mercy, but no sense at all of money, as little as eternity is in financial embarrassment, or has, according to the Word, the least use for money. Really this is something both to laugh at and to weep over! It would undeniably be an excellent invention on the part of laughter to imagine eternity in financial embarrassment: oh, but let us then weep a little over the fact that the temporal existence has so completely forgotten eternity, and forgotten that, eternally, money is less than nothing! Alas, many believe that the eternal is a delusion, money the actuality: whereas money is, in the understanding of eternity and truth, a delusion! Imagine eternity as you will; confess only that from what you have seen of the temporal existence, there is much of it that you would like to find again in eternity, that you would wish to see again the trees and flowers and stars, to hear again the song of birds and the rippling of brooks. But could it occur to you that there should be money in eternity? No, for then the kingdom of heaven itself would become a land of wretchedness; and therefore this cannot possibly occur to you, just as it cannot possibly occur to the one who believes that money is the actual, that there is an eternity. There is nothing of all you see that you can be so certain will never enter into heaven as: money. And on the contrary, there is nothing which is so certain of heaven as mercy. So you see that mercy infinitely has no relation to money.

Yet money, money, money! That foreign prince may have said, when he turned his back on mighty Rome, “Here lies a city which is for sale, and only waits a buyer”: oh, how often has one not been tempted by despondency to turn his back on existence, with these words: “Here lies a world which is for sale, and only waits a buyer” — insofar as one is not ready to say that the devil has already purchased it!

What is the earnestness of life? If you have in truth propounded this earnest question to yourself, then remember how you answered it; or let me remind you of how you answered it. Earnestness is a man’s God-relationship. Everywhere where the thought of God is present in what a man does, thinks and says, there is earnestness, in that is there earnestness. But money is the world’s god; therefore it thinks that everything that has to do with money, or has some relation to money, is earnestness. Look at that noble, simple wise man of old; he would not take money for his instruction; and the apostle Paul preferred to work with his own hands rather than defile the Gospel and degrade his apostolic mission and falsify the proclamation of the Gospel, by taking money for it. How does the world judge about such things? However, let us not foolishly ask what the judgment of the world is about that noble, simple man and about the holy apostle, for now the world has learned to pronounce by rote a panegyric upon them. But if a single contemporary in this age were to do at this moment as those two did, how would his contemporaries judge him? They would judge that he was an eccentric, that he was visionary; they would judge that such a man “lacks earnestness.” For to make money, that is earnestness; to make much money, even if it was by selling men, that is earnestness; to make much money by contemptible slander, that is earnestness. To proclaim some truth — if one also earns much money in so doing (for the fact of its being true is not taken into consideration, but only the fact that one makes money), that is earnestness. Money, money, that is earnestness.

Thus we are trained from our earliest childhood, disciplined in the ungodly worship of money. Let me cite an example, the first that offers among thousands and thousands — for there are not more herring ahead of the boat that works its way through a shoal of herring, than there are actual examples of training in the worship of money. Imagine, then, a household where the head of the family has issued orders that the next day (which consequently is Sunday) they must all go to church together. But what happens? Sunday morning when it is time to go, the girls are found not to have finished dressing. Then what does the father say, the — earnest father, who earnestly trains his children to worship money? Yes, he naturally says nothing, or as good as nothing, for here there is no occasion for a warning or a reprimand; he says, to be sure, "If the girls are not ready, they will have to stay at home, that is all there is to it." But imagine, just imagine, how terrible it would have been, if it had been the theater, and the girls had not been ready at the proper time. Imagine then how this — earnest father would have taken on, and why? Because they had wasted so much money — while, on the contrary, by remaining home one Sunday, they had even saved the collection money. Now, however, the girls will get a severe — earnest, fatherly reprimand; now it is a great fault, a great sin, not to have been ready — and therefore that earnest father who brings up his children with earnestness, must not allow a second offense to go unpunished. For the fact that it is disobedience on the part of the girls, is the least of it — in that case the fault would be just as great on Sundays; no, the serious thing was that the money was wasted. Lo, one is called to be a father, one is expected to have a fatherly dignity and to make a responsible use of this dignity; he is expected to educate his children. Now this may be educating, but one does not train human beings in this manner, but only fools and monsters!

But if a man has this conception about money, what conception can he have about the mercy which has no money? Such a mercy must be regarded as a kind of madness, an illusion. Yet then, too, must eternity and Christianity be regarded as a kind of madness, an illusion. A pagan emperor may have said that one should not smell of money. On the contrary, Christianity teaches how rightly to smell of money. It teaches that money as such smells bad. Therefore is some powerful perfume needed to drive out the stench. Have mercy: let it be present in giving money; without it money has a bad odor. Lo, even a beggar can say this, and he ought to become just as immortal by his expression as that emperor — and capitalist. Mercy is the most powerful perfume. If prayer is the offering of the lips and acceptable to God, then mercy is truly the offering of the heart, and is, as the Scriptures say, a sweet savor in God's nostrils. Oh, never forget in your thoughts about God, that He has not the slightest understanding of money!

My hearer, if you were a speaker, which task would you choose: the one of speaking to the rich about practicing charity, or the one of speaking to the poor about being merciful? I certainly know which I would choose, or rather which I would have chosen — if only I were a speaker. Oh, there is something so indescribably conciliatory in speaking to the poor about practicing mercy! Oh, how necessary it is, if not for the sake of the poor, then for your own sake, something you can readily verify. For if you only try it, you will see that your ideas about it will constantly reverse themselves, as if it would do no good to speak to the poor about mercy, since they have nothing to give, and therefore one ought to speak to the rich about mercy to the poor. Thus if the poor is indigent in his poverty, and then the world rejects his idea that he might be able to practice mercy, so he is pointed out, abandoned, as a pitiful object of charity, who at most can bow in humble gratitude — while the rich are so kind in practicing mercy! Merciful God, how unmerciful!

So the speech is addressed to you, the poor and the wretched! Oh, be merciful! Preserve that heart in your bosom which in spite of poverty and wretchedness, still has sympathy for the wretchedness of others; that heart which before God has confidence to know that one can be merciful, moreover, that one can be merciful to the highest degree, in a remarkable and superior sense, even though one has nothing to give.

“Oh, be merciful!” See, here it is again, and who does not immediately and involuntarily think of the poor, of the cry of the beggars to the rich, “Be merciful”? — however incorrect this expression is, since it is charity which is asked for. And therefore we speak correctly, we who say to the poor, to the poorest of all: “Oh, be merciful!” Finally let not this envious pettiness of earthly existence so corrupt you as to make you forget that you can be merciful; so corrupt you that a false bashfulness stifles the best in you! A false bashfulness — yes, for until the true comes, oh, that it might always come, but in any case, it ought to come with money; if you get money, and then consequently can give, then, not till then, have you anything to be ashamed of. Be merciful, be merciful toward the rich! Remember, you have mercy in your power, while he has money! Do not misuse this power; do not be so unmerciful as to cry to heaven for punishment upon his lack of mercy! Moreover, we know well how little the world cares about the sigh of the poor to God when it accuses the rich, and yet this air-borne sigh, this ignored word, is the most important of all: but yet, yet, although not unacquainted with the loud scream — I blow all that away, if only no poor man may with justice accuse me in secret before God. Oh, be merciful! If the rich man is stingy and close, or, even if he is not stingy about money, is yet taciturn and repellent: then do you be rich in mercy and compassion. For compassion works wonders; it makes the two pennies into a great sum when the poor widow gives them; it makes the sparse gift into a greater amount, when the poor mercifully does not reproach the rich; it makes the churlish giver less guilty, when the poor mercifully conceal it. Oh, how many has not money made unmerciful! Shall money also have the power to make those unmerciful who have no money? Then the power of money has completely triumphed. But if the power of money has completely triumphed, then, too, is mercy absolutely abolished.

Mercy is able to do nothing. The sacred stories have among other things this remarkable quality that in all their simplicity, they still always get everything said that should be said. Such is also the case in the Gospel about the rich and the poor man. Neither the misery of Lazarus nor the luxury of the rich is minutely painted and described; yet there is one detail added that is well worth our attention. It is said that Lazarus was laid at the rich man's door full of sores, but the dogs came and licked his sores. What is it that the rich man represents? Mercilessness, or more exactly, inhuman mercilessness. In order to illustrate the lack of mercy, we may place a merciful man by his side. This is what was done in the story of the good Samaritan, who by contrast throws light upon the Levite and the priest. But the rich man was cruel; therefore the evangelist uses dogs for illustration. What a contrast! We shall not exaggerate and say that a dog can be merciful; but in contrast to the rich man, it is as if the dogs were merciful. And this is the horrifying thing, that when the rich man had refused mercy, then the dogs had to be merciful. But there is something else to be found in this comparison between the rich man and the dogs. The rich man certainly had it in his power to do something for Lazarus. The dogs could do nothing; and yet it seems as if the dogs were compassionate.

Notice, that this is just what we are speaking about in this meditation. It naturally follows that if the compassionate can do anything, then he is only too glad to. But it is not upon this that we shall focus our attention; on the contrary, it must be focused on the fact that one can be compassionate without being able to do the least thing. And this is of great importance, since the fact of being able to be compassionate is a far greater perfection than being able to do something.

Suppose it had not been one man traveling from Jericho to Jerusalem, but two, and that they were both attacked by robbers, disabled, and that no traveler came by — suppose then, that the one of them could do nothing but groan, while the other forgot and overcame his own suffering in order to speak soothing and friendly words, or, in what involved great pain, he dragged himself to a little water in order to fetch the other a refreshing drink. Or suppose they had both been deprived of speech, but one of them in his silent prayer sighed to God for the other one, too: would he not then have been compassionate? If someone has cut my hands off, I cannot play the zither, and if someone has cut my leg off, then I cannot dance; and if I lie crippled on the shore, then I cannot throw myself into the sea to save another man's life; and if I myself lie with a broken arm or leg, then I cannot rush into the flames to save another's life: but I can be compassionate everywhere.

I have often thought about how an artist might represent compassion, but I am satisfied that it cannot be done. As soon as an artist has done it, it becomes doubtful whether what he has represented is compassion or something else. Compassion is certainly shown when the poor gives the half-shilling and yet all that he owns, when the helpless can do nothing and yet is compassionate. But the artist would prefer to portray the gift, consequently the charity, and would rather portray that which looks best painted, the great achievement. Try to paint this: a poor woman, who gives the other person the only bread she has — and you will certainly find that you cannot portray the most important thing; you can express that it is one loaf, but not that it is the only one she owns. The Danish people are familiar with the dangers of the sea. There is a picture which represents a brave sailor who was responsible for the pilot boat's so frequently having saved human lives. His picture is shown, and below at one side a wreck, and on the other side a pilot boat. You see this can be painted. And it is glorious to steer like an angel of salvation, through the breakers, and to do it bravely, courageously, and, if you like, compassionately. Oh, but have you never seen, have you never imagined the wretchedness of those who, perhaps from childhood or from later in life, have been so unhappily scolded, so ill-treated, that they are not able to do anything, anything at all, are perhaps scarcely able to express their sympathy in dear words: shall we now be unmerciful enough to add this new cruelty to all their misery, to deny them the power of compassion — because it certainly cannot be represented, since such a subject cannot be portrayed except as an object of compassion! And yet it is certain that the compassion of such people is the most beautiful and the truest, and is worth more because they have not been so dulled by their own suffering that they have lost sympathy with others.

Imagine a widow in her poverty; she has but one daughter, but nature has been a stepmother to this daughter, has denied her almost every gift that might make her a comfort to the mother — imagine that this unfortunate girl, who groans under the heavy burden, yet in proportion to the tiny ability granted her is inexhaustible in devising ways to do the little, the nothing, she can do to ease her mother's life. Lo, this is compassion! No rich man would squander a thousand dollars to have an artist paint it, for it cannot be painted. But every time the distinguished benefactor, who assists the mother, comes to them, the poor girl stands embarrassed; for "he" can do so much — his compassion obscures that of the girl! Oh, well, that is the way it looks in the eyes of the world, perhaps, too, in the eyes of a painter and a connoisseur.

So the speech is addressed to you, you wretched one, who can do simply nothing: do not forget to be compassionate! Be merciful; this consolation, that you can be compassionate, to say nothing of the fact that you are compassionate, is far greater than if I could guarantee that the most powerful will show you compassion. Be merciful toward us more fortunate ones! Your sorrow-filled life is like a dangerous indictment of the loving Providence; you have it in your power, therefore, to frighten the rest of us; be merciful! Truly, how much compassion from such an unfortunate one do not the mighty and the happy certainly need! Which is more compassionate, capably to relieve the needs of others, or by suffering quietly and patiently, mercifully to take pains not to disturb the joy and happiness of others? Which of these two loves more: the happy who sympathizes with another's suffering, or the unhappy who truly sympathizes with others' joy and happiness?

"But the principal consideration is still the fact that the needy must be helped in every way, and that everything possible must be done to relieve the needy." So speaks the well-intentioned temporal existence, and it can never speak otherwise. On the contrary, eternity says: there is only one danger, the danger that no compassion is shown; even if all necessity were relieved, it is not therefore decided that it is done through compassion, and if this were not the case, then would the wretchedness arising from the fact that it was done without compassion, be greater than that from any temporal need.

The principal trouble is that the world does not understand eternity. Temporal existence has a temporal, and insofar a hasty conception of the need, and also a sensual conception about the greatness of the gift, and about being able to do something to relieve the need. "The poor, the wretched man might die — consequently it is of the utmost importance that he should be helped." No, answers eternity, the most important thing is that compassion be shown him, or that the assistance is the assistance of compassion. "Raise money, build us hospitals, that is of the utmost importance!" No, says eternity, the most important thing is compassion.

That a man dies is, eternally understood, no misfortune, but it is unfortunate if no compassion is shown. There also hangs, remarkably enough, beneath that picture which represents a wreck on one side and a pilot boat on the other, there hangs the picture: “Poverty — and Violent Death; Prosperity — and Natural Death,” hence death on both sides. And eternity holds it unshakably true that compassion is the more important. No thinker can be so persistent in this thought as eternity is; no thinker is so calm, so undisturbed by momentary appearances and momentary dangers as eternity, which seems to emphasize that it is still more important that help be afforded in every possible way; no thinker is so calm, so untroubled, as eternity. And no thinker is so certain that men must at last give in and accept his opinion as eternity is, for it says: only wait, we shall talk this over in eternity, and there the talk will be solely about compassion, and solely about the difference: merciful — not-merciful. Oh, that I might show the face eternity will put on when the rich man in reply to the question as to whether he has been merciful, answers: “I have given away a hundred thousand dollars to the poor!” For eternity will look at him surprised, as one who cannot get it into his head what the rich man is talking about; and then eternity will again submit the question: Have you been merciful? Imagine a man who went out to a mountain to talk with it about his affairs; or that a man had dealings with the wind about his own achievements: eternity will no more understand what the rich man is talking about concerning the hundred thousand dollars, and what the powerful men mean by saying that they have done everything, than the mountain or the wind would understand what was said to them.

Is it compassionate to give hundreds of thousands to the poor? No. Is it compassionate to give half a shilling to the poor? No. Compassion depends on how it is given. But then the hundred thousand and the half-shilling are of no consequence. That is, I can see compassion just as much in the one as the other; that is, compassion can be, and can be as perfectly manifest in the half-shilling as in the hundred thousand which is given. But if I can really see compassion as well in the half-shilling as in the hundred thousand, then I can really see it better in the half-shilling; for the hundred thousand have an accidental significance which easily attracts the sensual attention to itself, and thereby confuses me in seeing the compassion. Is it compassion when the one who can do everything does everything for the wretched? No. Is it compassion when the one who can do practically nothing, does this nothing for the wretched? No. Compassion depends on how all this and this nothing is done. But then I can equally well see compassion in this everything and in this nothing; and if this is so, then I can really see it best in this nothing, for the being able to do everything is a glittering externality; it has an accidental kind of significance, which still reacts strongly upon the sensual in me, easily attracts my attention to itself, and interferes with my sense of compassion.

Let me continue the illustration. If you wished to observe the movements and the circles which a stone produces when it is thrown into the water: would you journey to those foreign parts where the mighty waterfall dashes roaring down, and there cast in the stone, or would you throw it out into the swelling sea? No, you would do neither. For although the stone would produce movements and create circles here as everywhere, you would be prevented from seeing them. Therefore you would do exactly the opposite; you would seek a quiet little pool, really the smaller the better, and now undisturbed by anything irrelevant, you could really center your attention on the movements you wished to observe.

What do you understand by a significant man? Is it indeed a man who has significant inward worth? If you now seriously desire to absorb yourself in the observation of such a man, would you prefer to see him in the midst of great wealth, or decked out with stars and ribbons? Or would you not think that this precisely interfered with your completely centering your mind on the contemplation of his significant inwardness? So with mercy. Mercy is the true significance. The hundred thousand or the worldly doing of everything, is the significant gift, the significant assistance. But the one significance is that one which must be regarded; the other significance, that one which must be left out of account. And because of distrust of yourself, you wish that away which you must disregard — alas, while the world believes it far easier to pay attention to mercy when it gives a hundred thousand than when it gives a half-shilling, and consequently thinks it easier to see the compassion by looking at that which must be disregarded, if one really wishes to see the compassion.

Still, let us not forget that compassion may be shown in both instances, in the half-shilling and in the hundred thousand, in the everything of the powerful and in the nothing of the wretched. But even if it is conceded that compassion is present, you will still easily convince yourself that the greater, the more astonishing the gift is, the more wonderful the help is, the more there is something which will hinder you from completely dwelling on the compassion. It is told of the apostle Peter, that one day when he went up into the Temple, he met a lame man who begged alms of him. But Peter said to him: "Silver and gold I have none, but that which I have I give you: in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, stand up and walk." And he took him by the right hand and lifted him up. And immediately the man's legs and ankles became strong, and he leaped up, stood, and walked about. Who would dare doubt that this was an act of compassion, and, more, it was a miracle? But a miracle immediately attracts attention to itself, and thereby in part away from the compassion, which is never more apparent than when it can do nothing at all; for then there is simply nothing at all to hinder seeing quite definitely and exactly, what compassion is.

Eternity alone understands about compassion; if you therefore wish to learn to understand compassion, you must learn it from eternity. But if you wish to understand the eternal, then there must be quiet about you, while you absolutely center your attention on inwardness. Alas, the hundred thousand, they make a noise, at least they are easily able to make a noise; you are, as it were, stunned by the thought of being able to give a hundred thousand as easily as you give four shillings; your mind is diverted, you begin to think of the glorious circumstance of being able to do good on such a scale. But then the eternal is disturbed: that the glorious, the blessed, the most blessed condition is to be compassionate.

And now power and might! This again easily confuses the mind; you are amazed at external things. But if you are amazed, then you may be certain that it is not compassion that you see, for compassion does not arouse amazement. What is there, indeed, to be amazed over when even the most wretched, and he best of all, can practice mercy? Oh, compassion, if you in truth see it, it does not awaken amazement; it touches you, it makes, because it is inwardness, the most intimate impression upon you. But when is the inwardness ever more distinct than when there is nothing external in it, or when the external through humility and insignificance, is rather like an opposition, and, sensually understood, literally is a hindrance to seeing the inwardness? And when this is the case with respect to compassion, then we have the mercy which is the subject of the discourse, the mercy which is a work of love, even if it has nothing to give, and is able to do nothing.

VIII. THE VICTORY OF THE RECONCILIATION IN LOVE, WHICH WINS THE VANQUISHED

"AND HAVING DONE ALL, to stand." But is not this then easy enough, is it not a matter of course that one stands, or remains standing, when one has overcome everything? If one actually has overcome everything, what then would be able to pull one down? If one has actually overcome everything, then is there anything more against which one has to stand? Oh, that experienced apostle knew well whereof he spoke! It follows as a matter of course that one who cowardly and fearful never exposes himself to danger, never triumphs, never overcomes anything; that he is, on the contrary, the one overcome is conceded in advance, because he gave up. But, on the other hand, just when a man has overcome everything, he is perhaps nearest to losing everything — if at that moment he loses anything, he really loses everything, which too is only possible for one who has won everything. The moment of victory is perhaps the most difficult of all, far more difficult than any moment of conflict. Precisely the cry of victory, "Everything is decided," is perhaps the most ambiguous word of all, if at the very second it is uttered, "now everything is decided," it means that "everything is lost." Consequently there is something to be said about standing after having overcome everything; moreover, it is really only from that moment that anything can really be said about it.

Now we are ready to understand the concept of overcoming. When you say that one overcomes something, you picture him to yourself as bent forward to push against that which is resisting him. Hence, in the most profound sense, there can be no talk about standing; for although the resistance stands against him, in another sense it holds up the one who leans forward against it. But now, now everything has been overcome. Now it depends on his standing and on his continuing to stand, so that he does not lose the victory as swiftly as he won it. Is this not so? The weak, the timorous, succumb to the resistance; but the courageous, who boldly walks into danger, if he falls, he really falls, as we say, over his own legs: as courageous he overcomes the opposition, and yet he falls. He does not fall in the danger but in his impetus, hence because he did not stand.

Paul says in another place, that we are more than conquerors through faith. But can one do more than conquer? Yes, one can, if one stands after having conquered, preserves the victory and abides in the victory. How often has it not been seen that the one who had conquered had also exerted himself so, that, unlike that Greek commander, he did not even need one more such victory — for this -was enough for his destruction! How often has it not been seen that the one who had lifted a weight, could not support the weight after having lifted it; or that the one who pressed victoriously against the storm without weakening, exhausted could not endure the calm which came with the victory; or the one who was so hardy he could endure all the changes of weather, heat and cold, but could not stand the strong breeze at the moment of victory! And how often has not a victory been won in vain, if the victor then became proud, conceited, arrogant, self-satisfied, and thus lost just through having conquered!

If we were then to express in a qualification of the thought, what lies in that apostolic word (to stand after having overcome everything), we should have to say: spiritually understood there are always two victories, a first victory, and then the second by which the first victory is preserved. We certainly cannot express the distinction between the godly and the worldly more accurately than by saying: the worldly always talks only about one victory, the godly always about two. That no man should deem himself happy until he is dead (and thereby has left it to the survivors), that idea the worldly mind can also get into its head; but, on the contrary, the worldly mind will become impatient when it hears anything said about the second victory. There will, namely, be talk to some purpose about this, or about standing after having conquered, if a man happens to fail in that on which the worldly mind naturally sets the greatest store, to fail in that for whose sake one has endured all the hardships of war; for if this is so, a man never has a chance to be proud of the victory he is granted, not even at the very moment.

On the contrary, at the very moment of his triumph, when he wishes to make preparation for the celebration of the triumph, just at that very moment the godly reflection carries him into a new conflict, in every way the most difficult one, because it is the most inward one, because in it he strives with himself and with God. If he falls in this conflict, then he falls by his own hand; for physically and externally understood, I can fall by the hand of another, but spiritually there is only one who can destroy me, and that is myself; spiritually a murder is inconceivable — certainly no man of violence can murder an immortal spirit. Spiritually only self-destruction is possible. And if a man triumphs in this second fight, it precisely signifies that he gets no honor from the first victory; for conquering signifies in this connection, giving God the honor. In the first conflict, he fought against the world for the victory which was won; in the second conflict he fights with God about that victory. A man only stands then after having overcome everything, when he immediately, at the very moment of victory, ascribes the victory to God. As long as he was striving, the opposition would, in a certain sense, be that which helped him to stand; but when he has ascribed to God the honor of the victory, God is the support by whose help he stands. That it was also through God's assistance that he conquered (although there can also be victory in an external sense without God's assistance) is certainly possible; but God's assistance does not really become clear until after man has conquered. Oh, in the eyes of the world, what folly: to need God's assistance most of all after one has conquered!

It is such a twofold conflict or twofold victory we shall now make the object of a more intensive reflection, as we speak about:

THE VICTORY OF THE RECONCILIATION IN LOVE, WHICH WINS THE VANQUISHED.

There is presupposed consequently, when there is talk about a "vanquished," a first victory which has been already won. What is this? It is overcoming evil with good. The conflict may have been slow and difficult enough; for if the lover is to overcome evil with good, this is not decided all at once or with one blow; on the contrary' the combat often becomes more and more strenuous, and, if you will, more dangerous — if one is willing to understand what the dangerous is. The more good the lover has shown toward the unloving, the longer he has held out in requiting evil with good: the nearer, in a certain sense, comes the danger that at last the evil might still overcome the lover, if in no other way, then by making him cold and indifferent toward such an unkind man. Oh, there must be a great depth of wealth in goodness, as only the lover has it, a steady warmth of inextinguishable, purifying fire over a long time, to be able to hold out in requiting evil with good! — But this victory is won, the non-lover is vanquished.

What is the relationship in this conflict? On the one side stood the lover (or what we might also call him: the good, the noble; for in the first conflict it was not readily apparent that he was the lover), and he had the good on his side. On the other side stood the non-lover, fighting by the aid of evil. Thus they strove. The lover had for his task to preserve himself in the good, so that the evil might get no power over him. Consequently he did not have so much to do with the non-lover as with himself. It was not for the sake of the non-lover but for the sake of the good, also in a noble sense for his own sake, that he strove to conquer in this conflict. The two consequently, as regards themselves, are striving with each other, but, outside of each other, they are in a certain sense irreconcilably striving, as the conflict is between good and evil. The one strove by the help of the good, the other in a covenant with evil; and the latter was vanquished.

Now the relationship is changed; it now becomes readily apparent that the lover is present in the conflict; for he not only fights that the good may abide in himself, but he fights appeasingly so that the good may triumph in the unloving, or he fights in order to win the vanquished. The relationship is consequently no longer a simple conflict-relationship, for the lover fights on the side of his enemy in his behalf; he wishes to fight out the cause of the non-lover to victory.

This is reconciliation in love. For when the enemy, or the one who committed the wrong, comes to you and seeks forgiveness — so that you are willing to forgive: that is commendable and praiseworthy, and also loving. Oh, but how tardy! Do not say that "you granted it immediately, as soon as he begged for it" — consider rather what promptitude in reconciliation true love has in comparison with that, or in comparison with a promptitude which, by being dependent on another's haste or slowness in asking for forgiveness, is precisely essentially, thereby tardiness, even if accidentally it comes very swiftly.

Long, long before the enemy considers seeking reconciliation, the lover is already reconciled with him. And not only this; no, he has gone over to the enemy's side, he fights for his case, even if he does not understand or wish to understand it; therefore he labors to bring about the reconciliation. Lo, we may call it the fight of love, or the fight in love! To fight with the assistance of the good against the enemy — that is praiseworthy and noble; but to fight for the enemy — and against whom? against himself, if you wish to express it thus: that is, yes, that is loving, or it is reconciliation in love! And thus, too, is reconciliation enjoined in the Holy Scriptures. The words read, “When you offer your gift upon the altar, and there remember...” — but what would you expect would now follow? Is it not that you have something against someone? But that is not the way it is. It reads “... and you there remember that your brother has aught against you, then leave your gift before the altar (for there is no hurry about the gift if this is so), and go out and be reconciled with your brother (for reconciliation needs this haste, also for the sake of the gift which waits upon the altar), and then come and offer your gift.” But is not this too much to ask? Who is it who needs forgiveness: the one who did the wrong or the one who suffered the wrong? Certainly it is the one who did the wrong who needs forgiveness. Oh, but the lover, who suffered wrong, he needs to forgive, he needs reconciliation, appeasement, which word, unlike the word “forgiveness,” makes a distinction by reminding about right and wrong, but lovingly notes that both are needed. It is not in the most perfect sense reconciliation to forgive when forgiveness is asked for; but it is reconciliation to need to forgive almost before the other has thought of seeking forgiveness. Therefore the Scriptures say, “Agree with thine adversary quickly”; but one can never be more benevolent then when one is one’s self the needy; and “quicker” to forgive than when one gives his forgiveness before it is asked, fights to give it while there is still opposition — not against giving, but against receiving forgiveness.

Oh, heed well what the relationship is; for the true Christian is always exactly the opposite of that which the natural man most easily and most naturally understands. “To fight for forgiveness,” who does not understand this immediately about fighting in order to get forgiveness? — Alas, for humanly speaking this is often considered hard enough. And yet it is not simply that about which we are speaking; we are talking about lovingly fighting to have the other accept forgiveness, to allow himself to be reconciled. Is not this the Christian way? It is God in heaven who through the apostle says: “Be ye reconciled”: it is not men who say to God, “Forgive us.” No, God loved us first. And, again another time, when the question was about reconciliation, God was the one who came first — although yet, from the standpoint of righteousness. He was the one who had waited longest. So, too, in the relation between man and man: the true reconciliation is, it is well to note, when the one who offers forgiveness is not the one who needs it.

So the lover then in reconciliation fights to win the one vanquished. — To win the one vanquished! What a beautiful use of language, of the word “to win”! For listen to what follows! When we say “to win” a victory, then we immediately hear the violence of the conflict; but when we speak of winning someone, of winning someone to ourselves, what an infinite gentleness is not contained in that word! What is so intriguing as the thought and the phrase, “to win one”; how could it suggest any thought of strife! For in all strife two are needed, and here there is only one: the non-lover; for the lover is in his reconciliation his best friend, who wishes to win the vanquished. To win the vanquished. What a wonderful reversal is not this whole ideal One might believe that the winning would be less than the overcoming, for “over” suggests how it surpasses winning. And yet the speech here is really an ascending climax, is about the higher, although it is still about winning the one overcome. Perhaps from the standpoint of pride overcoming is greater, but in the understanding of love, this less is the eater, “the winning of the overcome.” Beautiful conflict, more beautiful than the lovers’ quarrel when the lover must be the one, and hence so much more the loving, when he must be the one to fight through to reconciliation! Beautiful victory, most beautiful of all victories, when the lover succeeds in winning the vanquished!

To win the vanquished. Do you now see the twofold victory we are speaking about! For if the lover only wishes to fight the one war, to overcome evil with good, and he has then conquered, then let him look well to it that he stands after having overcome everything. Oh, his fall is only too near at hand, if he does not let love and the godly reflection carry him at once into the next conflict, the winning of the vanquished. When this is done, then he has steered safely past the dangerous rocks, where one becomes proud of having held out in requiting evil with good; where one becomes self-important because of having requited evil with good. For if you go immediately into the next conflict, who then becomes the more important? Still, I suppose, the one you are striving to win. But consequently, you are not the more important. Still, just this is the humiliating thing which only love can endure, that one goes backward, as it were, when one is going forward, so everything is reversed; when one has one's self vanquished everything, the vanquished has become the more important. Let us assume that the brother of the prodigal son had been willing to do everything for his brother — one thing had still never entered his head, that the prodigal brother could become the more important. Now it is difficult to get this idea into one's head; it does not enter into a man in that way.

But to win a vanquished adversary is always difficult and has in the relationship of which we speak, a special difficulty. To be vanquished gives a humiliating feeling; therefore the one vanquished prefers to avoid the one who vanquished him; for by contrast his defeat becomes greater, but no one makes the fact of his defeat so clear as the one who overcame him. And yet it is here the victor who must win the vanquished, consequently they must be brought together. Again the situation has a special difficulty. In less important matters it might be handled so that the victor concealed from the vanquished that he was the vanquished, piously deceived him, as if it were he who was right; appeasingly yielded, even to allowing him to be right where he was wrong. We shall not attempt to decide how far this may ever be permissible; but in the relationship of which we are speaking, the lover dared least of all to do this. It would have been weakness, not love, to allow the non-lover to imagine that he had been right in the evil he did; it would not have been reconciliation, but a betrayal, which would confirm him in the evil. No, it is precisely of importance, it belongs to the works of love, that by the help of the lover it should become obvious to the non-lover how unjustifiably he had acted, so that he may deeply feel the wrong he has been guilty of. This the lover must do; and thereby he will also win the vanquished; yet, no, it is not "also," for it is one and the same thing, since he can truly only wish to win him for himself, or to win him for the truth and himself, not to win him for himself by deceiving him. But the more profoundly the vanquished comes to feel his wrong, and also insofar his defeat, the more he must feel repelled from the one who — lovingly inflicts upon him this deathblow. Oh, difficult task: at once to repel from one's self, and to win to one's self; at one and the same time to be as severe as the truth demands, and yet also as gentle as love desires, in order to win the one against whom severity is used! In truth, a miracle, if one succeeds; for it, like everything Christian, contradicts the proverb: that one cannot do two things at the same time. That a vanquished man should attempt to see how he could falsely find the most lenient interpretation is easy to understand; but to win one to one's self by the help of the strict interpretation of the truth — that is difficult.

Reflection is halted by the idea of the task. Consider what might happen if the non-lover came into collision with another non-lover, who had nourished and stimulated all his evil passions. Consider this, as you pause for the purpose of seeing clearly how the lover behaves.

The non-lover is vanquished. But what does this mean, that he is vanquished? It means that he has been overcome by the good, the true. And what is it the lover desires? He wishes to win him to the good and the true. But to be overcome, when this means being won for the good and the true — is this then so humiliating? Look at love and reconciliation. The lover does not let it appear at all, nor does it occur to him that it is he who has conquered, that he is the victor — no, it is the good that has conquered. In order to take the humiliation and injury away, the lover slips a higher one between himself and the non-lover, and thereby removes himself. When there is not a third party between man and man, every such relation becomes a false one, either too passionate, or too resentful. This third, which philosophers would call the Idea, is the true, the good, or, more correctly, the God-relationship; this third is in certain phases of the relationship the cooling, in other instances the appeasing element. Truly, the lover is too loving thus to place himself over against the vanquished, and himself to be the victor who enjoys the victory — while the other is the vanquished; it is precisely unloving thus to wish to dominate another man. By the help of the third party whom the lover brings in between them, they are both humbled: for the lover humbles himself before the good whose humble servant he IS, and, as he himself confesses, in weakness; and the vanquished humbly himself not before the lover, but before the good. But when in a relationship between two, both are humbled, there is nothing humiliating for either of them. How resourceful love can be, what a jack-of-all-trades it is!

Would you rather that I should, as you say, speak more seriously? Oh, you may believe that the lover would rather that I should speak thus; for even in connection with what occupies one with the earnestness of eternity, there is a joy in succeeding which makes one prefer to speak in this way. There is, too, in speaking in this manner, a kind of shyness, and insofar also, a solicitude for the one who was wrong. Alas, a reconcilement in love is perhaps often unsuccessful because one took it too earnestly, that is, because one had not learned from God the art (and one learns it from God) of being earnest enough, but being able to do it so easily, as even the truth can permit. Never believe that earnestness is surly, never believe that that is earnestness, that distorted face which makes one sick to look at it: no one was ever earnest who had not learned from earnestness that one can also appear too earnest. If it has really become second nature with you to wish to win your enemy, you will also have become so familiar with that kind of problems that they will occupy you merely as stopgaps. If there is constantly in you a fresh influx of love, if the source of this supply is in order, then there is also time to be resourceful. But if there is opposition in the man himself, if in contemplating the law's severe command, he must force himself to go to become reconciled with his enemy: then the matter may easily become too earnest, and fail just because of — overmuch earnestness. But this "great earnestness," however respectable it may be, especially in contrast to irreconcilement, is still not that which we should strive for. No, the true lover is very resourceful.

So the lover also conceals something from the vanquished. But not as the weakly indulgent does, who hides the truth: for the lover hides himself. That he may not disturb the vanquished, he is, as it were, only secretly present, while that which really is present is the lofty majesty of the good and the true. If one is only heedful of it, there is also something so elevated present, that the slight difference between man and man readily disappears. And this is the way that love always behaves. The true lover, who cannot find it in his heart, at any price, to allow the beloved maiden to feel embarrassed, conveys the truth to her in such a way that she does not notice that he is teaching her. He elicits the truth from her; he places it upon her lips; and consequently he does not hear himself, but he hears her speaking it; or he promotes the truth, and conceals himself. Is it then humiliating to her to learn the truth in this way?

And so with the vanquished of whom we are speaking. The expression of pain for the past, the dejection over his offense, the prayer for forgiveness: all these in a certain sense the lover accepts, but he immediately pushes them to one side with a sacred horror, as one puts aside that which is not his due; that is, he indicates that this is not due him; he transfers everything to a higher category, ascribes everything to God, as the one to whom it belongs.

That is the way love always behaves. If the maiden, indescribably happy over the joy she finds in union with the beloved, were to thank him for it, would he not then, if he were a true lover, prevent this trepidation, and say, "No, dear, that is a little misunderstanding, and there must be no misunderstanding between us; you must not thank me, but you must thank God, if this means as much to you as you think. If you do this, then you will be sure of not making any mistake, for even supposing your happiness were not as great as you thought, it would still be a great happiness that you had thanked God for it." This is what is inseparable from all true love: the sacred bashfulness. For woman's modesty is beyond the earthly, and in her bashfulness she feels superior, while the converse pains; but the divine bashfulness is caused by the fact that God exists, and in his bashfulness man feels his own humility. As soon as the most remote allusion wishes to recall what modesty is ignorant of, there is bashfulness in the woman; but as soon as a man in relation to another man considers that God exists, then is the divine bashfulness there. One is not bashful before the other man, but before the third who is present; or one is bashful before the other man insofar as one considers what the presence of this third makes the other man. This is true even in human relationships. For when two men are talking together, and the king is present as a third party, but only recognized by one of them, then that one acts somewhat differently, for he is somewhat bashful — before the king. The thought about God's presence makes a man bashful with respect to the other man, for God's presence makes the two essentially equal. As to the rest, whatever difference, humanly speaking, there had been between the two men, even if it were the most glaring: God has it in His power to say: "When I am present no one will presume to be conscious of this difference; for that would be standing and talking with each other before me, as if I were not present."

But when the lover himself is bashful, when he scarcely dares to raise his eyes to look at the vanquished, how can it be so humiliating to be the vanquished? A man is bashful if another looks at him; but if this other, who by looking at him makes him bashful, is himself bashful, then there is no one who looks at him. But if there is no one who looks at him, then there can be nothing humiliating in humbling himself before the good, or before God.

Consequently the lover does not look at the vanquished. This was the first step, in order to prevent humiliation. But in another sense the lover still looks at him. This is the next step.

Oh, that I were able to describe how the lover looks at the vanquished, how the joy shines in his eyes; how his loving glance rests so mildly upon him; how, alluring and beckoning, it seeks to win him! For to the lover it is so indescribably important that nothing disturbing should enter; that no ill-omened word should inadvertently pass between them; that no unpremeditated glance should accidentally be exchanged between them, which might perhaps disturb everything again for a long time. Thus the lover looks at him; as calm as only the eternal can make a man. For the lover truly wishes to win this vanquished, but this, his wish, is too sacred to have the kind of passion a wish ordinarily has. The mere desire of passion very frequently makes a man a little confused; on the contrary, the purity and sacredness of this wish gives the lover an exalted tranquility, which again helps him to win the victory of reconciliation, the most beautiful and the most difficult, for mere strength here is not enough, the strength must be in weakness.

But is there anything humiliating in feeling that one is so important to another man? Is there anything humiliating to the girl that the lover solicits her love? Is there anything humiliating to her that it is so evident how much he is interested in winning her? Is there anything humiliating to her in seeing his gladness in advance, if he succeeds? No, there certainly is not. But the lover who by reconciliation would win the vanquished, he is, in a far higher sense, in precisely the same situation in apprehending the other man's love. And the lover knows only too well how difficult it is to free in this way, to set one free from the evil, to free him from the humiliation of defeat, to free him from thinking dejectedly of the forgiveness which he needs: consequently, in spite of all these difficulties, to win his love.

Yet the lover succeeds in winning the vanquished. Everything confusing, every conceivable object is removed as by an enchantment: while the vanquished lays hold on forgiveness, the lover lays hold on the love of the vanquished. Oh, it is not true: that one always gets an answer if one asks; Christianity has also made this proverb untrue, like all the proverbs of human wisdom. For when the vanquished asks, "Have you now really forgiven me?" the lover answers, "Do you now really love me?" But he does not answer the question asked him. No, he does not answer it, he is too loving to do so, he will not even answer the question about forgiveness; for this word, especially if it were emphasized, might easily make the matter too serious, in a harmful sense. Wonderful conversation! There seems to be no meaning in it. The one asks in the east, and the other answers in the west; and yet they say, moreover love understands it, they both say one and the same thing.

But the lover has the last word. For whenever there is an exchange between them, then so the one says, “Have you really forgiven me?” and the other answers, “Do you now really love me?” Behold, nothing, nothing, can hold out against a lover, not even the one who begs forgiveness. At last he will break himself of asking for forgiveness.

So he, the lover, has conquered, for he has won the vanquished.

IX. THE WORK OF LOVE IN REMEMBERING THE DEAD

IF A MAN FOR ONE REASON or another fears that he will not be able to keep in mind a general survey of some long and complicated matter, then he tries to secure or obtain a brief epitomization of it as a summary. So death is the briefest epitome of life, or it is life carried back to its shortest form. That is why it has always been so important to those who truly reflect on the meaning of human life, to test very frequently by means of the brief epitome what they have understood about life. For no thinker has such a grasp on life as has death, that powerful thinker, who cannot merely think through every illusion, but can think it in part and as a whole, can think it to nothingness. If then all the manifold ways of life, as you survey them, create a confusion of mind, then go out to the dead, "where all ways meet" — there the survey becomes easy. If your head swims from constantly looking at and hearing about the diversities of life, then go out to the dead; there you have power over the differences: between the "kinships of clay" there are no diversities, but only the dose kinship. For the fact that all men are blood-relations, hence of one blood, this kinship is frequently denied in life; but that they are of one clay, this kinship of death, no one can deny.

Moreover, go out once more to the dead, in order there to get a view of life. That is the way a sharpshooter behaves; he looks for a place where the enemy cannot hit him, but from which he can hit the enemy, and where he can have a perfect position for taking aim. Do not choose the evening hour for your visit, for the tranquility created by the evening and by an evening spent among the dead, is frequently not far removed from a certain exaltation of mood which strains and "fills one with unrest," and submits new riddles, instead of explaining those already given. No, go out there in the early morning, when the morning sun peeps between the green leaves with changing lights and shadows, when the beauty and friendliness of the sea, when the whistling of the birds and the multitudinous life everywhere almost enable you to forget that you are among the dead. It will be to you as if you had come into a foreign land, which had remained unfamiliar with the confusions and separations of life; in the state of childhood, consisting for the most part of small families. Out here, namely, we may attain that to which we aspire in vain in life: the equal share. Each family has a little plot of earth for itself, of about equal size. The prospect is about the same for all. The sun may happen to shine equally over all; no building rises so high that it cuts off the rays of the sun or the refreshment of the rain or the fresh gusts of wind or the echo of singing birds, from neighbor or neighbor. No, here the shares are equal. For in life it may certainly happen that at times a family, which has lived in a prosperous abundance, must restrict itself; but in death they are all restricted. A little difference there may be, perhaps the difference of a cubit in the size of the lot, or one family may own a tree, which the other earthly lodger does not have upon his lot. Why do you think this difference is there? Its purpose is, by means of a profound jest, to remind you through its littleness of how great the difference was. So loving is death! For it is precisely love on the part of death, that by the aid of this little difference it reminds you in an elevating jest of how great the difference had been. Death does not say: "There is simply no difference"; it says, "There you can see how great the difference was: a half cubit." If there were not this little difference, then neither would the concept of death be completely reliable. Thus in death life reverts to childishness. In the age of childhood it also made a great difference that one owned a tree, a flower, a stone. And this difference was an anticipation of the differences that would appear in life on quite a different scale. Now life is past, and between the dead a little hint of the difference remains behind which, as in jest, softens the memory of what had been.

Lo, out here is the place to meditate on life; by the aid of the brief epitome, which abbreviates all the complicated extensiveness of the relationship, to get a survey. How then could I, in writing about love, let the opportunity pass to make a test of what love really is? Truly, if you wish to ascertain what love is in yourself or another man, then must you notice how he behaves with respect to the dead. In order to make observations of a man, it is very important, for the sake of the observation, to see him in proportion, to see him by himself. But if a relationship exists between two actual men, so that the two are always seen together, the relationship becomes complicated, and makes the observation of the one alone difficult. This second man, namely, conceals something of the first man, and, furthermore, the second man may have so much influence over the first, that the first man seems to be different from what he actually is. Consequently a twofold appraisal is here necessary; the observer must take into account what influence the second man exercises through his personality, his characteristics, his virtues and his vices, upon the man who is the object of observation. If you should happen to see a man shadow-boxing in earnest, or if you should see a man dancing solo the dance he usually dances with someone else: then you would be able to observe his movements better than if he boxed with another actual man, or if he danced with another actual man. And if in conversation you understand the art of making yourself a cipher, you best get to know what is in the other man.

Oh, but when a man is related to the dead, then in this relationship there is only one, for the dead man is not a reality. No one, no one can so well make himself into “no one” as the dead, for he is “no one.” Hence there can here be no question of any irregularity in the observation; here the living becomes manifest, here he must appear as he absolutely is; for a dead man, aye, he is a subtle man, he has completely withdrawn himself; he has not the slightest influence, either disturbing or abetting, on the living who is related to him. A dead man is no actual object, he is only the occasion which constantly reveals what the living is who is related to him, or which helps to reveal how the living is, who is not related to him.

For we also certainly have duties toward the dead. If we ought to love the men we see, then, too, those we have seen, but see no longer, because death has taken them from us. We should not disturb the dead by lamentations and weeping; we should behave toward the dead as we behave toward one who is sleeping, whom we do not have the heart to awaken, because we hope that he will soon awaken of himself. “Weep then softly over the dead, for he has attained repose,” says Sirach; and I know no better way of signifying true remembrance than by this gentle weeping, which does not begin to sob immediately — and soon ceases. No, one should remember the dead, weeping softly, but weeping long. How long cannot be determined in advance, since no one in remembering knows definitely how long he will be separated from the dead. But the one who affectionately remembers the dead, may use some words from David’s psalm, where, too, there is talk about remembering, in his “If I forget thee, let my right hand forget its cunning; my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I do not remember thee; if I prefer not thee above my chief joy.” — Let him only remember that the task does not consist in saying this at once on the first day, but in continuing faithful to himself and to the dead in this mood, even if one is silent about it, which is usually preferable both for the sake of a certain sense of decency and of assurance.

It is a task; and one need not have seen much of life to have seen enough to assure him that it might well be emphasized that there is a task, a duty to be performed, in remembering the dead: the irresponsibility of supercharged human feelings, taken by itself, perhaps never appears greater than in just this relationship. And yet neither this feeling nor its violent expression is therefore false, that is to say, one believes what one says in the moment of speaking, but one satisfies one's self and the passion of his undisciplined emotions by using expressions which bind him in a peculiar way; that is, there is perhaps seldom one who does not by his later expressions make his first expressions, although they were once true, untrue.

Oh, we speak so often about what a different view of human life we should have if everything was made manifest which life conceals — ah, if death would come out with what it knows about the living: what a terrible contribution to the sum of human knowledge, which at least human love simply does not encourage!

So let us then among the works of love not forget this one, not forget to observe

THE WORK OF LOVE IN REMEMBERING THE DEAD.

The work of love in remembering the dead is a work of the most disinterested love.

If we wish to assure ourselves that love is entirely disinterested, we must remove every possibility of requital. But this is exactly what happens with respect to the dead. If love persists notwithstanding this, then it is in truth disinterested.

Requitals, as regards love, may be very diversified. One may for that matter make it simply a matter of advantage and profit. It is certainly a very general practice, this 'heathenish" "loving those who can make requital." A requital in this significance is somewhat different from love itself, it is the heterogeneous. But there is also a requital homogeneous with love: love reciprocated. And there is still so much of good in the great majority of men that they would as a rule regard this requital of gratitude, discernment, renunciation, in short, the requital of love reciprocated, as the most significant one, even if, in another sense, they would not perhaps admit that it is a requital; therefore they would think that one could not call love selfinterested because it aspires to this requital. — But the dead make no requital in any sense.

There is in this respect a resemblance between lovingly remembering the dead and the love of parents for their children. The parents love the children almost before they are born, and long before they themselves develop consciousness, hence as non-beings. But a dead man is also a non-being. And these are the two greatest benefactions: to give a human being life, and to remember the dead; however, for the first there is a reciprocity of love, a requital. If the parents simply had no hope, no prospect at all, of sometime having joy in their children and reward for their loving solicitude — still there would certainly be many fathers and mothers who would always lovingly do everything for their children. Oh, but it is also certain that there would be many fathers and mothers whose love would become cold. It is not our intention thereby at once to pronounce such a father or mother as too unloving. No, but the love in them would still be so weak or the selfishness so strong, that there would be needed this joyous hope, this encouraging prospect. And with this hope and this prospect, everything would be all right. The parents can say to each other, "Certainly our little child has many years of life ahead of him; but during all these years we shall be enjoying him, and we hope that he will sometime reward our love, will, if he does nothing else, make our old age happy, as a requital for our care."

The dead, on the contrary, make no requital. The one who lovingly remembers may perhaps also say: "I have a long time before me dedicated to remembering, but the prospect is first and last the same; there is in a certain sense nothing to hinder the prospect, for there is no prospect at all." Oh, it is so hopeless in a certain sense, so ungrateful a task in the sense in which the countryman says it, so disheartening an occupation, to remember the dead! For a dead man does not thrive and grow as the child does, to meet the future: a dead man only molders more and more in certain corruption. A dead man does not gladden the one who remembers, as the child gladdens the mother; does not gladden him as the child gladdens her, when in answer to the question whom it loves best, it answers, “Mother.” The dead man loves no one best, he seems to love no one at all. Oh, it is so discouraging that he thus remains quiet down in the grave, while the yearning for him increases; so dispiriting that there can be no thought of any change except that of dissolution, more and more rapid! It is certainly true that he is not difficult as a child may sometimes be; he does not cause sleepless nights, at least not through his difficult behavior — for strangely enough, the good child does not occasion sleepless nights, while, on the contrary, the better the dead man was, the more sleepless nights he occasions. Oh, but even with respect to the difficult child, there is still hope of and a prospect of requital through reciprocated love. But the dead makes no requital at all; whether you are sleepless and expectant on his account, or you absolutely forget him, it seems to be a matter of complete indifference to him.

If you therefore wish to prove whether you love disinterestedly, then sometime pay attention to how you behave toward the dead. Much love, unquestionably the most, if subjected to a sharper testing, would appear to be selfishness. But the fact of the matter is, that in a love-relationship between the living, there is always a hope and a prospect of requital, at least of a reciprocated love; and generally speaking, this is what happens. But this hope, this prospect, together with the requital, produces such an effect that one cannot definitely see what is love and what is selfishness, because one cannot see quite definitely whether requital is expected or not, and in what way. As regards the dead, the observation is so easy. Oh, if men were accustomed to love truly disinterestedly, one would certainly also remember the dead in a different way from what one ordinarily does, after the first, sometimes a fairly short, interval is past, in which one loves the dead with an extravagant wailing and lamentation.

The work of love in remembering the dead is a work of the freest love.

In order really to prove whether love is entirely free, one may remove all that which in any way might force from one the work of love. But this is precisely absent in relation to the dead. If then love, nevertheless, abides, then it is the freest love.

The things which can force the work of love from a man may be very different, and thus cannot be enumerated. The child cries, the poor begs, the widow importunes, regard compels, the wretched brings pressure, and so on. But none of the love in the work which is thus constrained is quite free.

The more insistent the needy are, the less free is the love. We generally take this into consideration concerning the parents' love for the child. If one really desires to describe helplessness, and describe it in its most urgent form, one usually thinks about a tiny babe who lies in all its helplessness, by which it, as it were, compels the love of the parents — seems to compel, for actually it compels only the love of the parents who are not what they ought to be. Hence, the tiny babe in all its helplessness! And yet, when a man first lies in the grave with three cubits of earth above him, then he is more helpless than that child!

But the child cries! If the child could not cry — yes, there are still many fathers and mothers who would nevertheless tend it with loving care! Oh, but there would also be many who would at least many times forget the child. It is not our intention just on that account to call such a father or mother unloving; but the love in them is so weak, so selfish, that they need to be reminded of the child's need.

The dead, on the contrary, does not cry like the child; he does not call himself to memory like the needy; he does not importune like the beggar; he does not compel regard; he does not force you by his evident wretchedness; he does not importune you as the widow did the judge: the dead is silent and says not a single word; he remains quite still, he does not move from his place — and perhaps he does not suffer evil! There is no one who troubles a living man less than the dead, and no one easier for the living to avoid than the dead. You can place your child out among strangers in order not to hear its crying; you can say you are not at home to avoid the beggar's plea; you can disguise yourself so that no one will know you: in short, as regards the living, you may adopt many precautionary expedients, which still perhaps will not be completely able to reassure you; but with respect to the dead you do not need to use the least caution, and yet you are completely certain.

If that is anyone's purpose, if it seems best to him to be quit of the dead, the sooner the better, then he may without any criticism and without being made the object of any lawsuit, become cold almost as soon as the dead man is cold. If it is only from a sense of shame (and then it is not on account of the dead) that he remembers to weep a little in the newspaper on the day of the burial, if he only takes care to show the dead the last honors — for the sake of appearances: then he might as well laugh at the dead in his — no, not before his eyes, for they are now closed. A dead man naturally has no rights at all in life; there is no magistrate who has anything to say about your remembering the dead; no magistrate who mixes into this relationship, as happens sometimes in the relationship between parents and children — and the dead himself certainly takes no step for the purpose of importuning or compelling. — If you therefore wish to prove whether your love is free, then pay attention occasionally as to how, in the course of time, you behave toward the dead.

If it did not seem so much like jesting (which it certainly is not, except for the one who does not know what earnestness is), then I should say we might place as an inscription over the gate to the burial place of the dead, “Here is no compulsion,” or “With us is no compulsion.” And yet I may well say it, I may well also have said it, and I may well maintain having said it; for I have reflected too much over death not to know that he who does not know before the resurrection from the dead, please note, how to make use of all the subtlety, all the profound playfulness that resides in death, simply cannot speak earnestly about it. Death is not earnest in the same way the eternal is. To the earnestness of death belongs exactly that strange awakening, that consonance of a profound mockery, which torn away from the thought of the eternal, is an empty often an impudent jest, but which in conjunction with the thought of the eternal, is precisely what it ought to be, and very different from the vapid earnestness which least of all lays hold on any thought involving such suspense as does the thought of death.

Oh, there is so much said in the world about the fact that love must be free; that one cannot love where there is the least coercion; that with respect to love, there simply must be nothing forced: oh, well, let us see then, when it comes to the point, how it stands with free love — how the dead is remembered in love! for a dead man plainly does not compel. Moreover, at the moment of separation, when one cannot do without the dead, then there is lamentation. Is this the much discussed free love? Is this love for the dead? And then little by little, gradually as the dead molders away, so too the memory crumbles away between the fingers; one does not know what became of it; little by little one becomes free of this — difficult remembering. But to become free in this way, is this the free love, is this love for the dead? The proverb says, “Out of sight, out of mind.” And one can always be certain that a proverb is right about worldly matters. It is another thing that from the Christian standpoint, every proverb is untrue.

If it were true, all this which is said about free love, that is, if it happened, if it were carried into effect, if men were accustomed to love in this way, then men would also love the dead differently from the way they do. But the fact is that with respect to other human love, there is so frequently some compulsion, if no other, then the daily sight and habit, and therefore one cannot definitely see how far it is the love that freely holds its object fast, or how far it is the object which in one way or another, compels assistance. But with respect to the dead, everything is manifest. Here there is nothing, no compulsion at all. On the contrary, the loving memory of the dead has to defend itself against the actuality about one, so that it does not through ever new impressions, get complete power to erase the memory; and it has to defend itself against time: in short, it has to defend its own freedom in remembering against that which wishes to compel one to forget. And the power of time is great. Perhaps one does not notice it in time, for time cunningly steals from one a little at a time; one will not perhaps really realize this before eternity, when one wishes to look around and back to see what one has got together with the help of time and his forty years. Yes, time is a dangerous power; it makes it so easy to begin again from the beginning in time, and so to forget where one left off. When therefore one even merely begins to read a very large book and does not really trust his memory, he places a mark in it: oh, but how often a man forgets throughout his whole life, to place markers so that he will really be able to find his place! And now in the course of years, to be obliged to remember the dead — alas, while he does nothing at all to help one; rather, if he does anything, or by simply doing nothing, he does everything to show one how completely indifferent he is about it! In the meantime the manifold demands of life beckon to one; the living beckon to one and say: “Come to us, we will love you.” The dead, on the contrary, cannot beckon; even if he wished to, he cannot beckon, he can do nothing at all to attract our attention, he cannot move a finger; he lies and molders — how easy for the power of life and of the moment to win over such impotence! Oh, there is no one so helpless as a dead man, while in his helplessness he also has not the slightest compulsion! And therefore there is no other love so free as the work of love which remembers a dead man — for remembering him is somewhat different from at first not being able to forget him.

The work of love in remembering the dead is a work of the most faithful love.

In order really to test whether a man's love is steadfast, one must remove everything whereby the object might in anyway help him to be steadfast. But all this simply does not apply with respect to the dead where there is no actual object. If then love persists, this is the most faithful love.

There is so much said about the lack of faithfulness in the love between men. So then the one places the fault on the other and says: "It was not I who changed, it was he who changed." Well! And what then? Did you then remain unchanged? "No, I naturally resented it, so then I changed." We shall not pause here to explain how meaningless this presumable resentment is, by which it follows as a matter of course that I change because another changes. No, we are speaking about the relation to the dead, and here we cannot say that it was the dead who was changed. If a change enters into this relationship, it must be I who changed. If you therefore wish to prove whether you love faithfully, then give heed to how you behave toward the dead.

But this is how it is: it is truly a difficult task to maintain one's self unchanged in time. And also the truth is that men love to deceive themselves with all kinds of illusions more than they love either the living or the dead. Oh, how many are not firmly convinced, so firmly they are willing to die for it, that if the others had not changed, they too would have remained unchanged. But if that is true, then is anyone living absolutely unchanged as regards the dead? Oh, there is perhaps no relation in which the change is so noticeable, so great, as the one between the living and the dead — while it still continues to be true that the dead man is not the one who changes.

When two persons are limited in love, then the one lays hold on the other, and the union lays hold on both. But with the dead man no union is possible. In the first moment following death, he may perhaps be said to lay hold on one, a consequence of the union, and therefore it is most frequently the case that he is generally remembered at this time. In the course of time, on the contrary, he has no hold upon the living; and the relation ceases unless the living holds to him. But what is faithfulness? Is it steadfastness that another clings to me?

When then death separates the two, the survivor — faithful in the first moment, swears that "he will never forget the dead." Oh, how reckless! For truly, a dead man is a cunning man to talk with, except that his cunning is not like that of the one about whom we say: "One can't always find him where one left him"; for the cunning of the dead consists precisely in the fact that we cannot get him away from the place where we left him. We are often tempted to believe that men have the idea that one can say almost anything one wishes to a dead because he is dead, hears nothing and answers nothing. And yet, yet, be most cautious of all in what you say to the dead. You may perhaps say quite calmly to a living man, "I shall never forget you." And then when some years have passed, then it is to be hoped that you have both fortunately forgotten the whole affair — at least it will be more seldom that you will be unlucky enough to meet a less forgetful man. But be cautious about the dead! For the dead is a man finished and decided; he is not like the rest of us, still in search of adventures, in which we may experience many exciting events, and seventeen times forget what we have said. When you say to a dead man, "I shall never forget you," then it is as if he answered, "Good! Rest assured that I shall never forget that you have said this." And even if all your contemporaries were to assure you that he has forgotten it, you will never hear that from the mouth of the dead. No, he goes to his own place — but he is not changed. You cannot say to a dead man that it was he who had become older, and that this explains your changed relation to him — for a dead man does not become older. Nor can you say to a dead man that it was he who in the course of time became cold — for he is not colder than he was when you were so warm; nor that it was because he had become more ill-favored that you could no longer love him — for he has not essentially become more ill-favored than when he was a handsome corpse, which yet is not regarded as an object of love; nor that it was he who had become interested in others — for a dead man does not associate with others. No, whether you are willing to begin again where you left off or not, a dead man begins with the most punctilious exactness just there where you left off. For a dead man is, although one does not notice it, a strong man: he has the strength of unchangeableness. And a dead man is a proud man. Have you not noticed that a proud man, precisely in relation to the man he despises most, takes the most pains not to betray anything, to appear entirely unchanged, to pretend to be unconscious of everything, in order to allow the despised to sink lower and lower — for the proud man only benevolently calls the attention of the one he loves to his error, in order by so doing to help him to the right! Oh, but a dead man — who is so proudly able as he to betray nothing at all, even if he despises the living who forgets him and the parting words — a dead man even does everything to bring about his own oblivion. The dead does not come to you and remind you; he does not look at you in passing; you never meet him; and if you met him and looked at him, there is no involuntary expression in his face which against his will might betray what he thinks and judges about you; for a dead man has his countenance under control. Truly we should guard against conjuring forth the dead in a poetic way in order to call him to remembrance: the most fearful thing of all is that the dead betrays nothing at all. Fear therefore the dead, fear his shrewdness, fear his determination, fear his strength, fear his pride! But if you love him, then remember him affectionately, and you will have no reason to fear; you will learn from the dead, and precisely from him as the dead, the shrewdness of thought, the definiteness of expression, the strength of unchangeableness, the pride of life, as you could learn it from no man, not even the most richly endowed.

The dead man does not change; there is no thought of any possible excuse through shoving the guilt onto him. Hence he is steadfast. Yes, that is true; but he has no actuality, and he therefore does nothing, simply nothing, to retain his hold on you, except that he does not change. If, then, any change enters into the relation between the living and the dead, then it must be clear that it is the living who has changed. If, on the contrary, no change enters, then it is the living who has truly been faithful, faithful in lovingly remembering him — alas, while he could do nothing to hold you; alas, while he was doing everything as if to pretend that he had entirely forgotten you, and what you said to him. For no one who has actually forgotten what has been said to him, can express more definitely that he has forgotten it, that its entire relation to him, that the whole matter, is forgotten, than the dead man can.

The work of love in remembering the dead is thus a work of the most disinterested, the freest, the most faithful love. So go out, then, and do this; remember the dead, and just by so doing learn to love the living, disinterestedly, freely, faithfully. In your relation to the dead you have a standard by which you can test yourself. The one who employs this standard will easily reduce the extensiveness of the most complicated relationship, and will learn to be repelled by all the mass of excuses actuality usually has immediately at hand for the purpose of showing that it is the other who is selfish, the other who is himself guilty of being forgotten, because he did not call himself to mind, the other who is faithless. Remember the dead; then you have a foretaste of the blessing which is inseparable from this work of love, also the best guidance in rightly understanding life: that it is a duty to love the men we do not see, but likewise those we do see. Our duty to love the men we see cannot cease because death separates them from us, for the duty is eternal; but hence the duty toward the dead cannot so separate our contemporaries from us that these do not become the object of our love.

X. THE WORK OF LOVE IN RECOMMENDING LOVE

"ART CONSISTS IN DEEDS, not words." This is a proverbial remark which is also quite true if one reasonably excludes the accidental circumstance where the art really consists in "saying it." For it would certainly be strange were anyone to deny that the poet's art consists precisely in "saying it," since truly not everyone can say that which the poet says in such a way that he thereby proves himself to be a poet. This is also partly true about the art of speaking.

But in relation to love, it is neither wholly nor partly true that the art consists in saying it, or that to be able to say it in any essential way, is conditioned by the accidental endowment. That is why it is so edifying to speak about love, because one must constantly think and say to one's self: "Everyone can love," or, "Everyone ought to be able to love" — while it would be a strange way of speaking to say that everyone was or could become a poet. Love which overcomes all differences, which loosens all bonds, in order to bind everything together in the bond of love, must naturally take loving heed that here a certain kind of difference does not suddenly and contentiously assert itself.

Because the matter stands thus, because there is no "art" in recommending love, just therefore does loving constitute a work; for "art" is related to the accidental endowment; the work is related to the universal. So the proverb may find its application in a peculiar manner. Thus if one should in a hasty, casual remark, in a hasty proposition (which seems especially acceptable to these times), say, "It would be a good thing if someone were to undertake to recommend love," one would have to answer that, "Saying it is no art, but doing it" — and that although "doing it" in this connection would indicate that saying it, as has been proved with reference to love, is no art, and so consequently it is art and yet not art, but a deed. The proof then consists in working out such a recommendation of love as to require both time and diligence. If it were an art to recommend love, the relationship would not be such. For with respect to a certain kind of art, it is truly not given to everyone to practice it, even if he is willing to spend both time and diligence in acquiring it. Love, on the other hand, oh, it is not like art, jealous of itself, and therefore poured out only on the few. Everyone who wishes to have love, to him it is given, and if he is willing to assume the task of recommending it, he will also succeed.

So let us now consider

THE WORK OF LOVE IN RECOMMENDING LOVE.

It is a work, and naturally a work of love, for it can only be performed in love, more precisely defined, in love of the truth. We shall endeavor to be more explicit as to how this work may be accomplished.

The work of recommending love must be done inwardly in self-denial.

If the recommending of love is to be performed effectually, then one must for a long time stick to thinking one thought, to holding it, spiritually understood, in the strictest continence with respect to everything heterogeneous, alien, irrelevant and disturbing; must stick to it with the most punctilious and obediently exact renunciation of every other thought. But this is very exhausting. That way it is easy enough to disavow the meaning and, in this connection, the understanding of the thought; and that will also be the case if the single thought which occupies one is a particular finite conception, not one infinite thought. But if it is also the one thought which saves and preserves the understanding, it is still very exhausting. Consequently, to think a single thought in inwardness away from all distraction, to advance from month to month in making the hand stronger and stronger which stretches the thread of thought; and then, on the other side, in rising to learn always more obediently, more humbly to make the hand lighter and more supple in guidance, the hand which at any second, if necessary, must relax and ease the tension, consequently with mounting passion to grasp more and more firmly, more and more certainly, and in increasing humility be able, if the moment makes it necessary, to let go more and more easily: that is very exhausting. And yet we cannot conceal from one that this is the one thing needful, nor can we conceal it from one if one does it; for when one thinks but one thought, the direction is inward.

It is one thing to think in such a way that one's attention is always directed outward toward the object, which is something external; it is another thing to have one's thoughts so reversed that one is at every moment conscious of himself, conscious of the effect of the thought, or how the thought affects his own condition. But only the latter is essentially thinking, that is, clarity of thought. The first is unclear thinking, which suffers from the contradiction that the reflection which clarifies another thought is in the final analysis itself confused. Such a thinker explains another by his thinking, and, lo, he does not understand himself. As far as an external object of thought is concerned, he makes a very profound use of his natural abilities, but as regards inwardness, a very superficial use, and therefore all his thinking, however profound it may seem, is still at bottom superficial. But when the object of one's reflection is externally complicated, or when one transforms that of which he is thinking into an erudite object of reflection, or when one leaps from one subject of thought to another, then one does not discover this last irregularity: that at the bottom of all the clarity there lies a lack of clarity, instead of the true clarity alone being brought to light. If, on the contrary, one has but one thought, then there is no external object, then one's thoughts are directed inward in self-absorption, then one must discover his own inner condition; and at first this discovery is very humiliating. The forces of the human spirit do not behave in the same way as do physical forces. If one overstrains his physical strength he is injured, and thereby he gains nothing. But, if one, simply by choosing inwardness, does not exert his spiritual forces, as such, to the limit, he simply does not discover, at least not in the deeper sense, that God exists; and if this is so, then he has lost the thing of greatest importance, or the most important thing has essentially eluded him. In physical strength, as such, there is nothing selfish, but in the human spirit, as such, there lies a selfishness which must be humbled, if the God-relationship is to be gained in truth. This, then, is what the one must experience who concentrates upon a single thought; he must experience the intrusion of interruptions wherein it is as if everything were taken from him; he must encounter the perils of life where it holds good about losing one's life in order to save it. He must go forward on this way, if he is to bring anything deeper to light. If he shies away from this difficulty, then his thought becomes superficial — although in these clever times men have certainly assumed between themselves, although without referring it to God or the eternal, that such an exertion is not necessary, moreover, that it is an eccentricity. Now of course it is not needed in order to lead a comfortable and irresponsible life, or to satisfy his own contemporaries with the admired perfection which to a T absolutely resembles that of everyone else. But nevertheless it is certain that without being tested in this difficulty and without this strenuous exertion, one's thought becomes superficial. For spiritually understood it is true that not until a man has overexerted his spiritual strength as such, can he become an instrument; he will from that moment, if he endures in sincerity and faith, gain his greatest strength; but it is not his own strength, he acquires it in his self-abnegation.

Oh, I do not know to whom I may be speaking concerning this matter, how far there is anyone who is concerned about such things; but this I do know, that such people have lived, and I know this, that just those who have effectually recommended love have been people well-trained and able-bodied in these, for the most part, unfamiliar waters. And to them I can write, comforting myself with the beautiful word "Write!" "For whom?" "For the dead, for those whom you have loved in the past!" — and in loving them I shall also meet together with the dearest among my contemporaries.

If one concentrates upon but one thought, one must in relation to it consider discovering self-denial, and it is the self-denial which discovers that God exists. Just this becomes the contradiction in blessedness and in terror: to have an all-powerful one as one's collaborator. For an all-powerful one cannot be your collaborator, the collaborator of a man, without this signifying that you can do nothing at all. And, on the other hand, if He is your assistant, then you can do everything. The exhaustive thing is that there is at once a contradiction, so that you do not experience the one today, the other tomorrow; and it is exhausting that this contradiction is not something you can be conscious of at intervals, but it is something you must be conscious of at every moment. It is at the very moment when you are able to do everything — and a selfish thought creeps in, as if it were you who had been able to do all this — at that very moment you may lose everything; and at the very moment the selfish thought is surrendered, you may again have everything. But God is not seen; and consequently when God uses this instrument, into which man made himself by his self-denial, then it looks as if it were the instrument which could do everything, and even the instrument is tempted to understand it in this way — until he can again do nothing. It is always difficult to collaborate with another man. Oh, but to collaborate with the Almighty! Moreover, it is easy enough to understand in a certain sense; for what [I] cannot do, I can leave to Him. Consequently the difficulty is just that I must collaborate, if not with another, then through constantly understanding that I can do nothing at all, which is not something which can be understood once for all.

And this is difficult to understand, not difficult to understand at the moment when one can really do nothing, when one is sick or indisposed, but to understand just at the moment when one can apparently do everything. However, there is nothing so swift as thought, and nothing which strikes one with such force as a thought when it comes upon one. And now, out on the sea of thought, on the "70,000 fathoms deep" — before one learns when night comes to be able to sleep tranquilly away from the thoughts, confident that God who is love, has them in abundance, and to be able to awake in full confidence to the thoughts, assured that God has not slept! A mighty oriental emperor had a servant whose duty it was daily to remind him of a certain definite undertaking: but that a humble man should be able to reverse the relation and say to God the Almighty, "Remind me finally of this or that"; and that then God should do it! Is not this enough to make one lose one's reason, that a man should have the right to sleep safely and sweetly if he only says to God, like the emperor to his servant, "Be sure to remind me of this or that!" But then again this Almighty is so jealous for Himself that merely a selfish word in this foolhardy freedom which He allows, and everything is lost; so that God does not only not remember this and that, but it is as if He would never forget the this and that which is deserved. No, then it is far safer to be able to do a little less, and so in a common human wisdom imagine that one is certain one can do it; it is far safer than this exhausting: absolutely and to the letter being able to do nothing, and, on the contrary, in a certain figurative sense, being able to do everything.

Still only in self-denial can a man completely recommend love; for God is love, and only in self-abnegation can a man hold God fast. What a man learns from himself about love is very superficial; he must learn from God to know it more profoundly, that is, he must in his self-abnegation become what every man may become (for self-denial is related to the universal, and thus different from being specially called and chosen), an instrument of God. So every man can get to know everything about love, just as every man can get to know that he, like every other man, is loved by God. The difference is merely that some (which does not seem so surprising to me) find this thought more than sufficient for the longest life, so that even in their seventieth year they do not think they have wondered enough over it; and others, on the contrary (which seems to me very strange and deplorable), find this thought so insignificant, since being loved by God is nothing more than is true of every man — as if it were therefore less important.

Only in self-abnegation can a man completely recommend love. No poet can do it. The poet can sing about love and friendship, which is indeed a rare gift, but "the poet" cannot recommend love. For to the poet his relation to the spirit of inspiration is like a jest, the evocation of its assistance is like a jest (and this might well correspond to the self-denial and the prayer). His natural endowment, on the other hand, is the decisive thing, and the outcome of his relation to the spirit of inspiration is to him the principal thing, it is the poem, the poetical production, which determines the outcome. But for the one who will recommend love (which, since everyone may do this, indicates no superiority), the relation of the self-abnegation to God or the laying hold on God in self-abnegation, ought to be everything, ought to be the earnest thing; the fact of whether the production is finished or not, ought to be a jest, that is, the God-relationship itself ought to be more important to him than the outcome. And in his self-abnegation it is his absolutely earnest conviction that it is God who helps him.

Oh, if a man in his self-abnegation could really put away all the sensual illusion of being able himself to do anything; if he could really understand that of himself he can do nothing at all; that is, if a man could really win the victory of self-denial, and then to that victory add the triumph of self-denial, in sincerity and truth finding his entire happiness in this self being able to do nothing at all: what a wonderful speech such a man would be able to make about love! For in the extreme exertion of self-denial, in all this swooning and fainting of its own strength in being happy, in feeling itself happy, what is this other than loving God in truth? But God is love. Who then is better able to recommend love than the one who truly loves God? — for he lays hold on his object in the only right way: he lays hold on God and on loving Him in truth.

This is the inward condition or way in which love must be recommended. To perform this has naturally its own reward in itself, even if, in addition, it also has as its object the winning of men to it by recommending love as far as it is possible; to make men really attentive to what in reconciliation is granted every man, namely, the Highest. For one who recommends art and science still sows the dissension of endowment and non-endowment between men. But he who recommends love, reconciles all, not in a common poverty, nor in a common mediocrity, but in the loftiest fellowship.

The work of recommending love must be done outwardly in devoted disinterestedness.

Through self-abnegation a man gains the power to become the instrument when he inwardly makes himself into nothing before God; through devoted disinterestedness he makes himself outwardly into nothing, into an unprofitable servant: inwardly he does not become self-important, for he is nothing; nor outwardly does he become self-important, for he is nothing; he is nothing before God — and he does not forget that he is before God, wherever he is. Oh, it may happen that a man fails at the last moment, in that he, truly humble before God, when he approaches men, becomes proud of what he can do. It is then a temptation of comparison which causes his fall. He understood that he could not compare himself with God, before whom he was conscious of being nothing; but in comparison with men he still seems to be something. That is to say, he forgets the self-abnegation, he is ensnared in a delusion, as if he were only at certain hours in the presence of God, just as one at a particular hour has audience with the royal majesty. What a distressing confusion! For with respect to a man it is certainly feasible to speak with him in one way in his presence, and in a quite different way about him in his absence. But could one speak about God — in His absence? This correctly understood is, then, devoted disinterestedness, one and the same thing as the self-abnegation.

It would also be the most terrible contradiction if anyone wished to dominate another — through recommending love — So the devoted disinterestedness is in a certain sense, that is, inwardly understood, a natural consequence of the self-abnegation, or it is one with the self-abnegation.

But outwardly the devoted disinterestedness is necessary if love is to be truly recommended; and this is truly a work of love to wish to recommend love in the love of truth. One can easily enough secure his earthly advantage, and what is most distressing of all, gain the support of men in proclaiming all kinds of deception. But truly this is not loving. For the opposite is loving: in love for the truth and for men to be willing to make every sacrifice in order to proclaim the truth, and conversely not to be willing to make the least sacrifice of the truth.

The true must essentially be regarded as in conflict with this world; the world has never been so good, and will never become so good, that the majority will desire the truth, or have the true conception of it in such a way that its proclamation must consequently immediately gain the support of everyone. No, he who will proclaim some truth in truth, must prepare himself in some other way than by the help of such a foolish expectation; he must be willing essentially to relinquish the immediate. Even an apostle may well say that he strives “to persuade men,” but still with the added phrase, “but before God are we all made manifest.” So there is then least of all in these words any thought of the selfish or cowardly, timorous craving to gain the assistance of men — as if it would be the assistance of men which should decide whether something was true or not. No, before God the apostle is made manifest when he seeks to persuade men; consequently he does not wish to win them for himself, but for the truth. As soon as he sees that he can win them in such a way that they become attached to him, but misunderstand him, misrepresent his teachings, then he wishes immediately to repel them — in order to win them. Consequently he does not wish to have any advantage for himself in winning them, but he wishes at all costs, hence even at the sacrifice of their assistance, to win them to the truth — if he succeeds; it is this he wishes. Therefore the same apostle says in another place, “So we speak, not as wishing to please men, but God. Neither did we use flattering words, nor a cloak of covetousness; nor did we seek honor of men, neither of you nor of others, when we might have been burdensome to you, as apostles of Christ.” How much devotion do not these words conceal! He had not sought any advantage, had not allowed himself to be paid, not even so much as he might rightly have demanded, as an apostle of Christ; he had renounced their respect, their assistance, their devotion. Impoverished he had exposed himself to their misjudgment, their ridicule: and all this he had done — in order to win them. Moreover, it is certainly permissible to do everything in this way, even if it were to be executed, for the sake of winning men; for it is precisely in self-sacrifice and disinterestedness to abandon all immediate means, through which one gains the immediate — and loses the truth. The apostle stands on the solid foundation of the eternal; it is he who will gain men by the forces of the eternal in self-sacrifice. It is not the apostle, who in order himself to endure, needs them, and therefore pounces upon the first that offers the cleverest method, in order to win them — not in order to win them to the truth, for such methods cannot be used for this purpose.

And now in these times; how greatly do we need this disinterestedness; in these times when everything is done to make everything immediate, and the immediate everything! For is not everything done to make the immediate as predominant as possible, predominant over the eternal, over the true? Is not everything done to make the immediate so self-satisfied in an almost superior unconsciousness of God and the eternal; so conceited in a presumed possession of all truth; so arrogant in the idea of being the inventor of truth! How many better men have not submitted to the power of the immediate and thereby made the immediate even worse. For just the one who would be a better man, when he weakly or selfishly gives way, must then in the tumult of the immediate seek oblivion for his failure; he must now work with all his might to make the immediate even more conceited.

Alas, the age of thinkers seems to be past! The quiet patience, the humble and obedient longing, the exalted relinquishment of immediate results, the remoteness of infinity from the immediate, his thought and his God-devoted love, which are needed in order to think one thought alone: these seem to have disappeared, they have become almost a laughingstock to men. "Man is" has again become "the measure of all things," and entirely in the sense of the immediate. All communication must be planned to appear conveniently in a trivial pamphlet, or to be supported by untruth in untruth. Moreover, it is as if finally all communication must be so planned that it may be delivered in an hour at most, to an audience which also wastes half an hour in its expressions of approval or disapproval, and during the other half hour is too excited to concentrate its thoughts. And yet we aim at this as the highest. Children are trained to regard this as best: to be catechized and congratulated in the space of an hour. Thus the standard of what a man ought to be is degraded. There is no more said about the highest, about being acceptable unto God, as the apostle says, or about pleasing those glorious ones who have lived in the past, or about pleasing the few eminent ones who are your contemporaries: no, to satisfy in a single hour a mixed assembly of the outstanding, the best men brought together, who too have not had time or opportunity to reflect on the truth, and who consequently demand superficial half-truths if they are to reward with their assistance: this is their aspiration. That is to say, in order to make it fairly worthwhile aspiring to, we help with a little falsehood; we delude ourselves into thinking that those assembled are truly wise, that every assembly is composed only of the wise. It is exactly as it was in the time of Socrates, according to the accusation brought against him: "Everyone understood how to instruct the young men; there was but one single individual who did not understand it — that was Socrates." So in our time, "all" are wise, there is only a single individual here and there, who is a fool. So near is the world to having achieved perfection that now "all" are wise; if it were not for the individual cranks and fools the world would be absolutely perfect.

Through all this, God sits and waits in heaven. No one longs to be away from the noise and clamor of the moment in order to find the stillness in which God dwells. While man admires man, and admires him — because he is just like everyone else, no one longs for the solitude wherein one worships God. No one disdains this cheap intermission from aiming at the highest, by longing for the standard of the eternal! So important has the immediate itself become. It is for this reason that sacrificial disinterestedness is needed. Oh, that I might in truth present such a disinterested figure! But here is not the place for this, where the speech is really about the task of recommending love — and therefore here is another wish: would that the immediate, if such a figure should be forthcoming, might have time to contemplate him!

But what applies to all love of the truth in relation to the immediate, also applies to what concerns it, the recommending of love in truth. Before one attempts to secure the assistance of the immediate for his recommendation of love, one must first ascertain how far the immediate has a true understanding of love. Has the immediate, as it is now, or can the immediate ever have a true conception of what love is? No, it is impossible. Love in the understanding of the moment, or of the immediate is neither more nor less than selfishness. Consequently it is selfish to speak thus about love, and selfish to gain this assistance. True love is the self-denying love. But what is self-denial? It consists precisely in renouncing the immediate and immediacy. But then is it entirely impossible to gain the assistance of the immediate — through a true discussion of the love, which is precisely the true love, by renouncing the immediate? It is impossible, it is so impossible that the speaker, that is, if the truth is more important to him than the assistance of the immediate, owes it to himself to point out the misunderstanding; insofar he might chance to gain the assistance of the immediate. From this discussion it is also easy to see that the conclusion is by no means correct, which without further ceremony concludes: He who recommends love, must himself be or come to be loved — in a world which crucified the One who was love, in a world which has persecuted and exterminated so many witnesses of love.

And have the circumstances even changed in this respect, even if it is no longer carried to the extreme and decisive limits whereby witnesses of the truth must sacrifice their lives and blood? Essentially the world has not become better, it is only a little less passionate and more petty. Therefore that which the world generally calls being kind, eternity will naturally regard as something reprehensible and culpable. What the world calls a kind man is a man who above all takes care not to take the demand of eternity or of God for an essential and essentially strenuous existence, too literally. The kind man knows all about all possible excuses and evasions and doctrines of prudence; about bargaining and haggling and throwing off; and so he is kind enough to spare a little of his shrewdness to others, by whose help he thereupon arranges his life to his own advantage, easily and comfortably. In the company of the kind man everything is so safe, so pleasing; no occasion ever leads him to consider that anything eternal exists, or what claim this eternal has on the life of every man, or that the eternal lies so near that the claim might concern this very day. This is the kind man. But that man is unkind who, without demanding anything of another, but by seriously and strictly demanding much of himself, nevertheless draws attention to the fact that such a demand exists. In his company the excuses and evasions do not look so good; everything which one lives for is seen in an objectionable light; one cannot really be comfortable in his company; even less does he by means of the worldly or even the comfortably religious indulgence, help one to adjust his comfortable pillow.

But what really is this kindness? It is treachery toward the eternal. That is why the temporal existence likes it so well. And this is why the world is always scandalized by the statement that “love to God is hatred of the world.” If, namely, the claim of eternity is really valid, then it looks as if such a man hated everything which the majority of men live for. How disturbing therefore, how strange, how disagreeable! How agreeable, on the other hand, and how lovable to confirm and assist men in their cherished errors. But is it, then, love to deceive men? Is it therefore certain that it is love because the deceived regard it as love, because they thank the deceiver as if he were their greatest benefactor? Is it love to love in a deception, and to be loved in return in a deception? I thought that love was: being willing to make every personal sacrifice in communicating the truth, but being unwilling to sacrifice the least fragment of the truth.

However, even if we wished to forget actuality, to forget how the world is and poetically transfer the whole relationship into the realm of the imagination: it lies in the very nature of the case that in the relation between man and man, disinterestedness is needed in order truly to recommend love. Let us venture on such a poetic attempt where we have nothing at all to do with the real world, but where merely in the remoteness of thought we survey the thought of recommending love. If, poetically understood, a man should speak quite truly about the true love, then is a reduplication necessary: the speaker must transform himself into the selfish, and the content of the speech must he about loving the unlovable object. But if this is done, it is impossible to have any advantage from recommending love; for one can only gain an advantage when either the speaker is regarded as the lover, or the content of the speech is the ingratiating speech about loving the lovable object. And when there is no advantage to be gained through recommending love, then it is disinterested to do it.

Consider that simple wise man of antiquity who knew best of anyone how to speak of the love that loves the beautiful and the good. He was in fact the ugliest man in the whole country, the ugliest man among the most beautiful people. One would think that this fact might have deterred him from talking about the love which loves the beautiful — one certainly avoids speaking of the noose in the hangman's house, and even the beautiful avoid speaking about beauty in the presence of the exceptionally ugly, to say nothing of the ugly himself talking about it. But, no, Socrates was odd and peculiar enough to find this amusing and inspiring, consequently odd and peculiar enough to put himself in the most disadvantageous position possible. For when he spoke about the beautiful, when in his longing for the beautiful his speech and thought completely carried his hearer away — and then this person happened accidentally to look at him: then he at once became as ugly as he already was, he who was already the ugliest man of all his people. The more he talked, the more beautifully he talked about beauty, the uglier he himself became by contrast. He must have been an eccentric, this wise man; he must not only have been the ugliest but also the most peculiar man among his people. Or what could have determined him to do this? I think if he had had a beautiful nose (which he did not have, strikingly conspicuous among the Greeks who all had beautiful noses), then he would not have wished to say even a single word about loving the beautiful; it would have been impossible for him for fear lest someone might believe that he was speaking about himself, or at least about his beautiful nose. That would have grieved his soul, as if he were defrauding the subject of his speech, beauty, of which he was speaking, by calling some attention to his own beauty. But in his assurance of being the ugliest man, he believed that he could with a good conscience say everything, everything, everything in praise of beauty, without the least advantage to himself from so doing, he who merely became uglier and uglier by contrast.

Still the love which loves the beautiful is not the true love, which is self-denying love. With this in mind the speaker must now, if everything is to be in order and poetically perfected, make himself into the selfish, the self-lover. To recommend the self-denying love and then even to wish to be the lover is, yes, it is a lack of self-abnegation. If the speaker is not selfish, then he easily becomes uncertain or false; he will either be tempted to take advantage of the recommendation, which thus defeats the purpose of the speech, or he will suffer from a kind of embarrassment, so that he will not dare to say everything about how glorious this love is, for fear that someone might believe that he was speaking about himself. But if the speaker is selfish, or, in order to perfect the poetic thought, if he is the most selfish among a people which admiring speakers call a people of love, then, certainly then, he can speak freely about the self-denying love, more happy in having made himself into the most selfish man than that simple wise man was in being the ugliest. Under actual conditions a long preparation would certainly be needed to enable one to speak of the self-denying love. But the preparation would not consist in reading many books, or in being honoured and respected by everyone for his celebrated self-denial (if it is ordinarily possible for one to show self-denial by doing that which everyone understands as being self-denial on his part), but conversely, in changing himself into the selfish, to accomplish it by coming to be regarded as the most selfish. And this would still not be very easy to accomplish. The fact of being distinguished through a test and the fact of acquiring the lowest character, absolutely the lowest, are about equally difficult, so there is really an equally large number of both. This, concerning the speaker.

But the content of the speech should be: about loving the unlovable. Behold that simple wise man of antiquity, who knew how to speak so beautifully about loving the beautiful; he sometimes made a different kind of speech when he talked about loving the ugly. He did not deny that love consists in loving the beautiful, but yet he spoke, in fact it was a kind of joke, about loving the ugly. What then are we to understand by "the beautiful"? "The beautiful" is the immediate and direct object of the immediate love, the choice of inclination and passion. One certainly does not need to command one to love the beautiful. But the ugly! That is not something to offer inclination and passion, which turn away and say, "Is that anything to love!" And then again, what, according to our conception of love, is "the beautiful"? It is the beloved and the friend. For the beloved and the friend are the immediate and simple objects of the immediate love, the choice of inclination and passion. And what is "the ugly"? It is "the neighbor," whom one must love. One must love him; this is something that simple wise man knew nothing about; he did not know that the neighbor existed, and that one ought to love him. The fact that he talked about loving the ugly was merely jesting. The neighbor is the unlovable object, is not something to invite inclination or passion, which turn away from him and say, "Is that anything to love!" But therefore there is no advantage to be gained by speaking about the duty of loving the unlovable. And yet true love is exactly love for the neighbor, or, it is not the fact of finding the lovable object, but the fact of finding the unlovable object lovable. If, then, in order that something absolutely true may be said about the true love, the speaker must have transformed himself into the selfish, and the content of his speech must be about loving the unlovable object: then no advantage or benefit is possible. The speaker does not even have love as a reward, for his selfishness only becomes more manifest by the contrast; and the content of the speech is not adapted to ingratiating itself with men, who really wish to hear about what inclination and passion so easily and readily understand, but who are not willing to listen to that which is in no way acceptable to inclination and passion.

However, this poetic experiment is quite proper, and among other results may perhaps serve to throw light on a deception or misunderstanding which has certainly appeared repeatedly throughout Christendom. A man takes the Christian humility and self-denial in vain because, although no doubt he denies himself in one respect, he does not have the courage to do it decisively, for which reason he takes care to have his humility and self-denial recognized; consequently he becomes respected and honoured for his humility and self-denial — which, after all, is not self-abnegation.

Consequently, in order to be able to recommend love, inward self-abnegation and outward sacrificing disinterestedness are both required. Therefore if one undertakes to recommend love, and the question is asked whether he really does it from love, then the answer must be, that "this is something that no one can definitely decide; it is possible that it is vanity, pride, in short, evil, but it is also possible that it is love."

CONCLUSION

IN THE PRECEDING treatise we have endeavored "many times and in many ways" to recommend love. As we thank God that we have succeeded in finishing the work we wished to do, we shall in our conclusion introduce the apostle John who says: "In love, let us love one another." These words, which consequently have apostolic authority, have also, if you reflect on them, a mediating sound, a mediating mood in relation to the contradictions in love itself, which may be due to the fact that they are spoken by a man who became perfect in love. In these words you do not hear the austerity of duty; the apostle does not say, "You shall love one another"; but neither do you hear poetic passion or the violence of affection. There is something transfigured and blessed in these words, but there is also a sadness which touches upon life and is softened by the eternal. It is as if the apostle said, "Well, what is there after all to prevent your loving? What on the whole do you gain by selfishness! The commandment is that thou shalt love. Oh, but if you wish to understand yourself and life, it ought not to be necessary to be commanded; for the fact of loving men is still the only thing that is worth living for; without this love, you do not really live. And the fact of loving men is the one blessed consolation, both for here and hereafter; and the fact of loving men affords, the only true knowledge of whether you are a Christian" — truly a confession of faith is not enough. Love is from the Christian standpoint commanded; but the commandment of love is the old commandment which is always new. It is not with the commandment of love as with the human commandment which becomes antiquated and disregarded with the lapse of years, or is changed in accordance with what those agree on who must obey it. No, the commandment of love continues new until the last day, equally new, even on the day when it has become the oldest. Consequently the commandment is not changed in the slightest degree, least of all by an apostle. The only change then may be that the lover becomes on more and more intimate terms with the commandment, becomes as one with the commandment he loves: that is why he speaks so gently, so sadly, almost as if he had forgotten that love is a commandment. On the other hand, if you forget that it is the apostle of love who is speaking, then you will not understand him; for such words are not the beginning of a talk about love, but they are its consummation. We do not ourselves presume to speak in this way. What is truth on the lips of a venerable and consecrated apostle might very readily be an affectation in the mouth of a beginner, whereby he would run away from the school of the commandment much too early, and escape the "school yoke." We introduce the apostle who is speaking; we do not make his words our own, but we make ourselves his hearers, "In love, let us love one another!"

And so, only one thing more, remember the Christian like for like, the like for like of eternity. That Christian like for like is such an important and decisive Christian qualification that I could wish to end at least one, if not every work, where to the best of my ability I develop the Christian idea, with this thought.

Christianity is less talked about relatively in these times (I mean compared with those things about which there is so much said). But in the discourses which are heard (for attacks upon it are certainly not speeches about Christianity), the Christian doctrine is frequently presented as a certain soft, almost enervated form of love. After all, there is love and love; you predict for yourself and for your own flesh and blood, good days or happy days without anxiety, for God is love and love — about austerity there must be nothing said; everything must be about the free and easy language and nature of love. Yet thus understood, God's love easily becomes a fabulous and childish conception, the figure of Christ something so insipid and mawkish as to render it impossible that He could have been a stumbling block to the Jews or foolishness to the Greeks: that is, as Christianity was taught in our childhood.

The matter is simple enough. Christianity has abolished the Jewish like for like: “An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth”; but it has, substituted in its place the like for like of eternity. Christianity always directs the attention entirely away from the external, turns it inward, and makes each one of your relationships with other men into a God-relationship: so you will surely in both senses get like for like. From the Christian standpoint a man has ultimately and essentially to do only with God, although he will still remain in the world and in the earthly relationships as they are allotted to him. But the fact of having to do with God (so one is consequently never retarded on the way, or halfway, by information or by human judgment, as if that were decisive) makes at one and the same time for the highest consolation and the greatest exertion, the greatest mildness and the greatest severity. This is man’s education; for the true God-relationship is an education, God is the Teacher. But true education must be just as strict as it is mild, and conversely. And when a human teacher has many children to train at the same time, how does he carry this on? To do all this, there is naturally not time for much talking and reproof and verbosity, and if there were time, that education becomes bad as a matter of course, where there is too much talk. No, the efficient teacher trains preferably by means of the eyes. He takes the individual child’s eyes away from him, that is, he compels the child to look to him for everything. God does just this. He rules the whole world, and He trains these innumerable men by His glance. For what is conscience? In the conscience it is God who looks at a man, so the man must in everything see God. Thus does God educate. But the child who is being educated easily imagines that his relationship to his companions, the tiny world they form, is actuality, whereas the teacher by his glance teaches him that all this is used for the purpose of educating the child.

The older man also thus easily imagines that what he has to do with the world is actuality; but God teaches him to understand that all this is used only for his education. So God is the Teacher; His love combines the greatest mildness with the greatest strictness. It is as it is in nature where heaviness is also lightness. The celestial body floats easily in the infinite — sustained by the force of gravity; but if it leaves its orbit, if it becomes too light, then the lightness becomes heaviness, and it falls heavily — because of its lightness. So is God's strictness mildness in the lover and the humble, but to the hard of heart his mildness is severity. The fact that God has wished to save the world, this mildness is to the one who will not accept salvation the greatest severity, an even greater severity than if God had never wished it, but wished only to judge the world. Lo, this is the synthesis of the severity and the mildness; the fact that in everything you lay hold on God, the greatest mildness and the greatest severity.

If you will therefore listen carefully, you will yourself hear the severity in what must very definitely be called the Gospel. Thus when it was said to the centurion from Capernaum, "Be it unto you according to your faith," no more joyful tidings can be imagined, no gentler, more merciful word! And yet what was it that was said? It was said, "Be it unto you as you have believed." If we wish to apply these words to ourselves, we must say, "It will be to you as you believe; if you have the faith for salvation, then are you saved." How mild, how merciful! But is it now also certain that I have faith? — for the fact that the centurion believed, I still cannot offhand transfer to myself, as if I had faith because the centurion had it. Let us imagine that someone asked Christianity, "Is it now absolutely certain that I have faith?" Then would Christianity answer, "Be it unto you according to your faith" — or I wonder what Christ would have thought of the centurion, if instead of coming to Him in faith, he had come to Him in order thus privately to find out whether he had faith! “Be it unto you according to your faith,” that is to say, it is everlastingly certain that it will be to you as you believe, that Christianity vouches for. But the fact as to whether you, just “you,” have faith, is certainly not a part of the Christian doctrine d preaching, so it should tell you that you have faith.

When the timid, anxious doubts arise, lest you perhaps do not have faith, then Christianity repeats the words unchanged, “Be it unto you according to your faith.” How severe! You learn to know from the story about the centurion that he had faith. That has really nothing to do with you. And then you get to know the Christian fact, that it happened to him according to his faith — but you are not the centurion. Let us imagine that someone should say to Christianity, “It is quite certain that I have been baptized, but is it also absolutely certain that I have faith?” Then would Christianity reply, “It is to you according to your faith.” The centurion, although not baptized, believed; therefore it happened to him according to his faith; only through his faith does the Gospel become a Gospel. Had the centurion, although he did come and ask Christ for help, still been somewhat irresolute in his soul as to how far Christ would be able to help him, and Christ had still said the same words to him, “Be it unto you according to your faith,” then what? Would it then be a Gospel? No, not for the centurion, for it would be a judgment upon him. This “be it unto you” comes so swiftly, but it holds so powerfully this next phrase, “as you believe.” Using these words as a text, one can equally well preach severity or mildness; for there is also severity in these words, the Christian severity which has not hesitated to exclude the timorous from the kingdom of God, or perhaps better, has not hesitated to teach that the timorous exclude themselves, so that, consequently, just as little as one enters into the kingdom of God through defiance, just as little does he cowardly and effeminately whine his way in.

But in these times where concerning political and economic relations, so much is said about security and safety, this is finally carried over into Christianity, and baptism is allowed to be the assurance — which is no doubt right enough, if you really believe the assurance that "it is to you as you believe." If one had the right to make baptism the assurance as a matter of course, then it would certainly be all over with severity. But God is not mocked, nor can He be cheated. He is too highly exalted in heaven for it to occur to Him that a man's exertion should in any way render him deserving. Yet He requires it; and then one thing more, that the man himself shall not presume to believe that it is something meritorious. But God is also too highly exalted in heaven childishly to play the good God with a cowardly and abandoned man. It is everlastingly certain that it will be to you as you believe; but the assurance of faith, or the assurance that you, just you, believe, you must acquire in every moment by the help of God, hence not in any external manner. You must have God's help in order to believe that you are saved through baptism. You must have God's help in order to believe that in the communion your sins are graciously forgiven. For certainly the forgiveness of sins which is promised, is also promised to you, but the preacher has no right to say to you that you have faith, and yet it is promised to you only if you have faith. It is to you according to your faith. But everything in you which is of flesh and blood and connected with the earthly and the fearful, must despair, so that it is not possible for you to get an external certainty, a certainty once for all, and in the easier way. Lo, this is the conflict of faith in which every day may give you the opportunity to be tested. The Gospel is not the law; the Gospel will not save you through severity but through mildness; but this mildness will save you, it will not deceive you, therefore there is severity in it.

And if this like for like holds good even in relation to what most definitely may he called the Gospel, how much more then when Christianity itself proclaims the lam. It is said, “Forgive and you will also be forgiven.” However, one might succeed in misunderstanding these words so that he imagined that it might be possible even for him to get forgiveness although he did not forgive. Truly that is a misunderstanding. The Christian meaning is: forgiveness is forgivingness; your forgiveness is your forgivingness; your forgivingness to another is your own forgiveness; the forgiveness you grant, that you get, not conversely, the forgiveness that you get, that you give. It is as if Christianity would say: “Pray to God humbly and believingly for your own forgiveness, for He is merciful as no man is. But if you wish to make a test of how you forgive, then observe yourself. If you sincerely and with all your heart forgive your enemy (but if you do this, remember that God can see it), then you also dare hope for forgiveness, for it is one and the same thing; God forgives you neither more nor less nor otherwise than as you forgive your debtors. It is only an illusion to imagine that one has forgiveness while one is slow to forgive others. No, there is not a more exact agreement between heaven above and its image in the sea, which is exactly as deep as it is high, than there is between forgiveness and forgivingness. It is also an illusion for a man to believe in his own forgiveness, if he will not forgive; for how could a man in truth believe in forgiveness whose own life is an argument against there being forgiveness! But one imagines that one personally has a God-relationship, and, on the other hand, with reference to another man, that he has a relationship to that other man, instead of seeing a God-relationship in everything. Therefore the fact of accusing another man before God is to accuse himself, like for like. If, humanly speaking, a man actually suffers wrong, then let him notice that he goes too far in accusing the guilty before God. Oh, that a man is so ready to deceive himself, is so ready to delude himself with the idea that a man might personally have, as it were, a private relationship to God. But the relationship with God is like a relationship with a public official. You cannot talk confidentially with a magistrate about that which is his business — but God's business is to be God. If a servant, whom you perhaps feel a regard for, has committed a crime, a theft, for' example, and you do not know what you ought to do about it, then' you do not refer the matter privately to the superior sitting magistrate; for in his private capacity he does not understand anything about a theft; he immediately has the guilty apprehended and the case begins. And thus also, if you wish to pretend that you were quite outside the matter in question, and now privately wish to complain to God about your enemies: then God makes short work of it, and lays a charge against you; for before God you are yourself an offender — the fact of accusing another is an accusation against yourself. You think that God might, as it were, take your part; that God and you together might turn against your enemy, against the one who wronged you. But this is a misunderstanding. God looks impartially upon all and is the whole, while you only wish to make Him a part. If you apply to Him in His capacity as judge — moreover as a favor on His part. He warns you against doing this, for He knows what will follow as a matter of course, how severe it will be for you. But if you do not wish to have this said to you, if you refer to Him in His capacity as judge: then it does not help you because you think it is another He will judge; for you yourself made Him into your judge, and He is, like for like, at the same moment your judge, that is. He judges you also. On the other hand, if you do not undertake to accuse anyone before God, or to make God a judge, then is God the gracious God.

Let me illustrate the above by an incident. There was once a criminal who had stolen some money, among the rest a hundred dollar note. He wished to change this, and therefore he offered it to another criminal who lived in the same house. He accepted the note, went into the next room as if to get change, came out again, innocently greeted the waiting visitor as if he now saw him for the first time: in short, he defrauded him out of the hundred dollar note. The first man became so enraged at this, that in his indignation he reported the matter to the legal authorities, telling how shamefully he had been swindled. The other was naturally arrested, and arraigned as an impostor. Alas, in the trial, the first question the magistrate asked was how the accuser had obtained the money. So there were two cases. Of course the first man was wholly right in thinking that he had been swindled; he would now be the honest man, the good citizen, who reported the matter to the authorities in order to secure his rights. Oh, but the judge does not deal with matters in his private capacity, or with an isolated case one chooses to bring before him; nor does he always give the case the turn which the accuser and informer gives: the magistrate looks deeper into the matter. And so with the God-relationship. As soon as you accuse another man before God, then there are immediately found to be two cases; just when you come to lay information about the other man, God begins to consider how you are connected with the case.

Like for like; in fact Christianity is so strict that it even maintains a rigorous inequality. It is written, "Why do you see the mote in your brother's eye but do not know of the beam in your own eye?" A devout man has piously interpreted these words in this way: The beam in your own eye is neither more nor less than the seeing, the judging the mote in your brother's eye. But the most severe like for like would certainly consist in being able to see the mote in your brother's eye become the beam in your own eye. Still Christianity is even more severe; this mote, or the looking at it judgingly, is a beam. And even if you do not see the beam, and even if no man sees it, nevertheless God sees it. Consequently a mote is a beam! Is not this a severity that transforms a mite into an elephant? Oh, if you consider that from the true Christian standpoint God is always present in everything, that everything revolves solely about Him, then you will no doubt be able to understand this severity; you will understand that seeing the mote in your brother's eye — in God's presence (and God is always present) is lese majesty. No doubt if you could choose a time and place for seeing the mote where God was not present! But in the Christian understanding this is what you must learn to realize, that God is always present; and if He is present He is also looking at you. In the moment that you are truly aware of God's presence you certainly would not think of looking at a mote in your brother's eye, nor would you think of applying this terribly strict standard — you who are yourself guilty. The fact is, that even if every better man for his own sake applies himself to thinking about God's omnipresence as present (and nothing more preposterous could be imagined than to think of God's omnipresence at a distance), then he frequently forgets God's omnipresence in his relationship to other men, forgets that God is present in the relationship, is satisfied with a merely human comparison. So one needs confidence and quiet to discover the mote. What is now the fault? The fact that you yourself forget that God is present (and He is certainly always present) or that you forget yourself in His presence. How imprudent in God's presence to judge as strictly as a mote is judged — like for like; if you will be so severe, then can God overbid you — there is a beam in your own eye! The magistrate may well have regarded it as an impudence on the part of that criminal of whom we have spoken, that he should wish to play the part of an honest man who, pursuant to law and justice, prosecutes a criminal, alas, a criminal who will himself be prosecuted pursuant to law and justice: but God regards it as presumption that a man should wish to play the pure and judge the mote in his brother's eye.

How strict is not this Christian like for like! The Jewish, the worldly, the busy like for like is: as others do to you, see that you finally do the same to them. But the Christian like for like is: as you do to others, so God will do to you. From the Christian standpoint it does not concern you what the others do to you, it does not concern you personally; it is curiosity, an impertinence, a lack of sense to meddle in things which are as entirely irrelevant to you as if you were absent. You need only concern yourself with what you do to others, or with how you discover what others do to you; the direction is inward, essentially you have only to do with yourself before God.

This world of inwardness, this version of what other men call actuality, it is actuality. In this inward world the Christian like for like is native; it turns itself and wishes to turn you away from the external (yet without taking you out of the world), upward or inward. For from the Christian standpoint to love men is to love God, and to love God is to love men: what you do to men you do to God, and therefore what you do to men, that God does to you. If you are indignant at the men who wrong you, you are really indignant at God; for in the last analysis it is God who permits you to be wronged. On the contrary, if you accept with gratitude the injury from God's hand "as a good and perfect gift," then you will not be indignant at men. If you are not willing to forgive, then you really wish to do something else, you wish to make God hardhearted so that He should not forgive: how could this hard-hearted God then forgive you? If you cannot bear men's offenses against you, how should God bear your sins against Him? No, like for like. For God Himself is really this pure like for like, the pure reproduction of what you yourself are. If you are angry, then is God angry at you; if mildness and mercy rule in your heart, then is God merciful to you. The infinite lover shows in that He will on the whole concern Himself with you, and that no one, no one so affectionately discovers even the least love in you as God does. God's relationship to man is at every moment to make more infinite that which at any moment is in man. Echo, as you know, dwells in solitude. It attends exactly, oh, so exactly, to every sound, even the least, and reproduces it exactly, oh, so exactly. If there is a word which you would not like to hear said to you, then guard yourself in saying it, watch that it does not escape you in solitude, for Echo repeats it immediately and says it to "you." If you have never been solitary, then you have never discovered that God exists; but if you truly were solitary, then you also learned that everything you say or do to another man, that God merely repeats. He repeats it with the intensification of infinity: the word of grace or of judgment which you express about another, that God repeats; He says the same word for word, about you: and this same word is for you grace or judgment. But who believes in Echo, when day and night he lives in the tumult of the city? And who believes that such an observer exists, who corresponds so exactly to the like for like? Who believes in it, if from earliest childhood he has been accustomed to live in tumult? If in the confusion he hears something about the Christian way, he is still unable to hear rightly; as the Christianly does not echo in his inner man, he does not discover the echo which is the Christian like for like. Here in the midst of life's alarms he perhaps does not notice eternity's or God's repetition of the spoken word; he imagines that its reproduction would perhaps be in the external and in an outward manner. But the external is too dense a body to be the echo, and the sensual ear is too dull to catch the repetition of eternity. But whether a man discovers it or not, that same word is still said about him that he himself uttered. Such a man lives on then as one who does not know what is said about him. Now perhaps it is just as well if a man is unconscious of what the town says about him; besides it might be untrue. Oh, but how does it help either for the moment or through the years, to be unconscious of what eternity says about him — if it is nevertheless the truth!

No, like for like! We truly do not say that as if we meant that a man ultimately deserved grace. Oh, the fact that you learn from the first to lay hold on God is everything, is just that you simply have no merit. Test this merely by saying to eternity, "I have deserved," then eternity answers, "You have deserved....” If you will have merit and have deserved something, then is it only punishment. If not believing you will appropriate to yourself another’s merit, then you get according to your merit. We do not say this as if we meant that it would be better if anyone day in and day out were to sit in the fear of death in order to listen to the repetition of eternity; we do not even say that it would be better than the pettiness which in these times makes use of the love of God to sell indulgences from every more dangerous and more strenuous conflict. No, but as the well-disciplined child has an unforgettable impression of the strictness, so must also the man who lays hold upon the love of God, if he does not wish effeminately or thoughtlessly to take it in vain, have an unforgettable fear and trembling, although he rests in the love of God. Such a one will certainly avoid speaking to God about another’s wrong to him, about the mote in his brother’s eye. For such a one will prefer to speak to God only about grace, in order that this fateful word “justice” shall not cause him to forfeit everything through what he has himself evoked, the strict like for like.

PREFACE

IN THE CO-OPERATIVE labour of making the works of Kierkegaard available to English readers, I have chosen as my part the task of translating the works written after the profound religious experience of Holy Week 1848, which for the first time made 'direct communication' possible to the author and finally issued in the directest speech that was ever uttered by a Christian against Christendom. I have not included in my task the tremendous attack upon established Christianity which S. K. waged openly in newspapers and pamphlets, and died in the doing of it; for though I admit my sympathy with this attack and believe that it is profitable for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness, I account that it would not be profitable to make it available in English until it has become clearly evident, through the publication of the decisively Christian writings of S. K.'s last years, that (unlike most attacks upon the Church) this was not from without but from within.

It was the last and the most trenchant of his religious writings I translated first, because they seem to me the most important, and because they are the most important to me. But with that I found myself in a dilemma. For not only had I forged ahead of my fellow-workers who might be expected to make S. K.'s earlier works available (especially the pseudonymous or 'aesthetic' works), but I had outstripped myself by translating first the works which ought to be published last — namely, Training in Christianity, For Self-examination, and Judge for Yourselves. Professor Swenson was troubled when he learned that I proposed to publish these works at once. Because I felt the force of his objection I have deferred them. For these last works insist so strongly upon the Christian ideal — which he declines to regard as a counsel of perfection which the average Christian might safely disregard — that they cannot but be terrible to a man who takes them seriously, and it may be that the reader who is unacquainted with the milder tone of the earlier discourses is more likely to be repelled by them than one who has been gradually educated by Kierkegaard. I can only regret that no one has translated the Eighteen Edifying Discourses which 'accompanied' by twos and threes Kierkegaard's pseudonymous works and ultimately were collected in one volume. But Professor Swenson has translated three of them, the Three Edifying Discourses which accompanied the Philosophical Fragments he lately translated. However, they are printed only privately. It is fortunate (it might seem fortuitous) that the most important of the Three Edifying Discourses in Various Spirits was translated at the same time in America by Professor Steere (Purity of Heart, Harpers, 1938) and in England by Messrs Aldworth and Ferrie (Purify your Hearts! Daniel, London, 1937). So of the distinctively religious works nothing remains entirely unaccounted for but The Works of Love.

Of the pseudonymous or 'aesthetic' works there are several which are due to appear before this volume. Mr. Payne's translations of Fear and Trembling and Repetition will be published, I understand, on the same day by the Oxford University Press, and Mr. Jensen tells me that he has found an American publisher for his translation of the first of these books. He has also translated the other. This is an evident proof that the interest in Kierkegaard which developed so recently, I might say, so suddenly, in England and America, is already widespread. In order to complete the publication of the more strictly biographical material initiated by my Kierkegaard and Mr. Dru's Journals, the Oxford University Press will bring out on the same day, and somewhat in advance of this volume, my translation of The Point of View, etc., and Mr. Dru's translation of Two Minor Ethico-Religious Treatises, etc. If his translation of The Concept of Dread and Mr. Payne's translation of The Sickness unto Death are not out before this volume, they will not be tardy in following it. As Mr. Dru is at work on the translation of Either/Or*,* there is no important pseudonymous work except the Stages which remains unaccounted for and that I have undertaken. This incredible accomplishment in so short a time is due chiefly to the wisdom and audacity of the Oxford University Press — more particularly to Mr. Charles Williams.

And now, to redress so far as I am able the embarrassing situation produced by getting the last works ready first, I have hastened to translate the three series of 'discourses' which are now presented in this volume. The others, though they were the first to be translated, must wait a few months longer before they see the light. The discourses contained in this volume, although they were published in 1848 and 1849 (that is to say, at the same time when the more trenchant works were written) are many of them in a tone as mild as Kierkegaard ever used, and since they are as 'poetical' as anything he ever wrote, they express the thought of God's immanence, which in the later writings is obscured by the solemn emphasis upon His transcendence.

In this instance I regret to say (and it is the first time I have to say it) that there is no one to whom I can express obligation for aid in the preparation of this book. If S. K. is here worthily translated, I cannot ascribe it to my proficiency in the Danish language; I would ascribe it to Providence or (to use S. K.'s word) to Governance, being conscious of a strange congeniality with S. K.'s way of thinking, so that I feel as if I knew beforehand what he wants to say, just as he himself was conscious of congeniality with Socrates, and as Hamann boasted of an almost mystical intimacy with Plato, asserting that he 'would have been able to transcribe the half of Plato without having read him.'

I may need to remark expressly that all the notes are mine — not S. K.'s. There can be no confusion here between 'mine and thine', for S. K.

consistently treated his Discourses as delivered addresses, and hence added no footnotes, such as in his other works he used freely. But why add any notes (some one may ask superciliously), seeing that the German translations have none, and the Danish editions have none worth mentioning? To this I make no answer. Yet I hope that ‘the individual’ may be grateful for just these little helps which I felt the need of and sought in vain when I was first struggling to orient myself in this immense field of literature (‘a literature within a literature’) which one man produced. And it is my opinion that it would be profitable to add many more notes, with more precise data of reference, when the time comes that all of S. K.’s works shall have been published in English, and when a man comes who is competent to survey the whole. This would be a legitimate way of co-ordinating S. K.’s thoughts, whereas in the spirit of the polemical Dane I must oppose indignantly the insistence of several critics (all of them of course ‘professors’) that what the age demands is a compendious and systematic presentation of S. K.’s thoughts on all subjects, so that in this pre-digested form (which resolves into ‘direct communication’ even the ‘indirect communication’ of the pseudonyms) the reader may be able to appropriate the ‘results’ of the author’s thought without passing through the same laborious process of thinking. A far more profitable thing than these pretentious compendiums (which have been produced in abundance by men who, as S. K. complained, were ‘eating’ him), but a far more humble task, would be the production of a real index. Such a thing does not exist. The Danish editors, at the expense of the munificent Carlsberg Fund, have published an immense volume called an Index — which is of no use whatever because it deals only with words, without the least selection or discrimination. Even if it were well done, its value would be diminished by half for the fact that it does not include the Journal. S. K. has been shabbily treated in Denmark. The complete edition of his works (at the expense of the Carlsberg Fund) seems to be meant chiefly for public libraries, as if it were inconceivable that any individual might want to possess a few of the books; for the works are lumped in big volumes on a chronological principle, and not even the ordinary facilities for finding the book one wants are provided for the reader — not even the titles of the works appear on the outside of the volumes. But S. K.'s works were most of them small in compass (there being only four exceptions), and they were published separately in handy volumes which could be readily bought as well as easily carried about. Although some of these works are too small for the modern market, it is proposed by the English translators (following the criteria proposed by Mr. Dru) to make S. K.'s works easily available. In this volume, and in others for which I am responsible, several kindred works are published together in one volume; but this is done in part for the convenience of the reader, and only in part to facilitate the task of the publisher.

With the thrift for which my race is notorious I have employed the empty pages which follow the titles, etc., of the Christian Discourses by printing there pertinent entries from the Journal, which otherwise would encumber the Introduction and might not be remembered in the right place.

INTRODUCTION

ABOUT THE YEAR 1848

By the Translator

KIERKEGAARD said of the year 1848, 'It was beyond all comparison the richest and most fruitful year I have experienced as an author.' That is saying a great deal, considering how much he had produced every year since 1841, when (according to his reckoning) he first became an author. But 1848 was also a critical year in S. K.'s life. Externally, it was a year of political change, for after a short war with Germany Denmark lost the provinces of Schleswig and Holstein, and by a bloodless revolution, which was tardily incited by the liberal political ideas of the French Revolution, the absolute power of its monarchy was abolished. Although these changes do not seem very momentous in retrospect, they seemed catastrophic to S. K. and his contemporaries. And internally, S. K. experienced a change which was one of the most momentous of his life. We may think of it as a conversion — it was the third and last which he experienced on the way to 'becoming a Christian'. He did not use this word, but he called it a 'metamorphosis' — which certainly does not indicate a less striking experience. In his Journal, on the date of April 19, 1848, which was Wednesday in Holy Week, he exclaimed, 'My whole nature is changed. I must speak' — meaning that for the first time in his life he could speak, i.e.. employ 'direct communication'. But though in this entry he mentions only the effect, we learn that the deep cause of it was the instantaneous apprehension that God had forgotten his sins — as well as forgiven them.

The result of this metamorphosis is apparent in his writings, which from this time on are characterized by ‘direct communication’. Although he still clung for a while to the use of a pseudonym, Anti-Climacus, this meant anything but a relapse into maieutic or ‘indirect communication’. In 1847 he spent much labour upon a treatise (never completed) on ‘The Dialectic of Ethico-Religious Communication’, in which he elaborated and defended his favourite thesis that such communication must always be indirect. He never completely renounced his attachment to this thesis, but the ‘change’ in his whole nature is demonstrated by the fact he no longer acted in accordance with the theory, and expressly recognized that there comes a time sooner or later when Christian communication must be direct, must be personal ‘witness’— ‘maieutic cannot be the last form’.

The most ostensible sign of his metamorphosis is the ease with which he wrote The Point of View for my work as an Author, which is an exquisitely personal revelation of himself. Only the year before (in 1847) he had attempted in vain to write his ‘Apology’, with the aim of explaining to his contemporaries the purpose and purport of his pseudonymous works, which he had enveloped in so much mystification that no one could be expected to divine their serious religious purpose. An ‘apology’, of course, was the last thing one could expect from S. K.; but, after all, he had the example of ‘The Apology’ of Socrates, and the need of an explanation was pressing. In the year 1847 he even proposed to deliver a course of lectures on ‘The Organizing Tendency in My Writings’ — but that naturally came to nothing. In 1848 The Point of View was written without difficulty in two months — but at the thought of publishing it, of baring himself before the eyes of his contemporaries, he drew back, and the manuscript was left to be published after his death as ‘a report to history’. What had to be done in his lifetime to explain the works, he did more briefly and far less personally in the short work entitled On My Work as an Author, which he wrote in 1849 and published not long before August 7, 1851.

The Sickness unto Death, ‘a Christian psychological exposition for edification and awakening,’ which S. K. regarded as the greatest of his religious works, was produced in 1848 and published on June 30 of the following year.

In 1846 S. K. had become profoundly engrossed with the ‘phenomenon’ of Magister Adler, a priest in the Danish Church who was deposed for the claim he too lightly made and unmade that his books were written at the direct dictation of Jesus Christ. S. K. wrote and rewrote and rewrote again his ‘big book on Adler’ — and in the end felt that it could not be published because, dealing so personally with Adler, it would seem like striking a man when he was down. Perhaps also the multitude of thoughts which the case suggested to S. K. were so personal to him, and in another sense so peculiar, that he was diffident about making them public. And yet they were so important to him that he was continually occupied with them for two more years, and he felt that they ought to be made known. In 1848 he attempted to present a number of these thoughts in a work which was to have been entitled, ‘A Cycle of Ethico-Religious Treatises.’ That was never finished — not to say published — although he was working at it again in 1849. However something did come out of it: Two Minor Ethico-Religious Treatises, which Mr. Dru has lately published. The first of them is entitled ‘Has a man a right to let himself be put to death for the truth?’ The second, ‘On the difference between a genius and an Apostle.’ S. K. could not muster up courage to publish them till May 19, 1849.

To get a notion of the literary activity of this year one must take into account not only the productions which were not produced, but several which were merely planned. In January S. K. was planning a quarterly which was to be sold by subscription, with the title, ‘Edifying Reading’. In July he was thinking of a book to be entitled, ‘Fundamental Cure, or the Forgiveness and Atonement of Sin’. In November he considered publishing in one volume several of the works which he had already completed, and of giving it the title, ‘The Collected Works of Completion.’ By December he had written in a fair copy his appreciation of a celebrated actor who was his neighbour: ‘Herr Pheister, in the role of Captain Scipio.’ In giving an account of S. K.’s literary labours one must not omit to mention the Journal for this year, which as it is now printed occupies 390 large pages. No single book written during this period was so large as that.

It is reasonable enough to remark, as a way of accounting for the amazing mass of S. K.’s literary production, that he had absolutely nothing else to do, had no companionship at home to distract him, and no diversion abroad except his solitary carriage-rides in the country and his social promenades in the street. But it must be remembered that this year he had assumed responsibility for a disciple. In spite of his dictum that ‘the greatest of all misfortunes is a disciple’, he had admitted to this status Rasmus Nielsen, Professor of Philosophy in the University. To this he was moved by the consideration that, were he to die during that year, as he thought likely, there would at least be one who understood the intent of his works. Thus the disciple was in a way a substitute for the ‘Apology’ which he did not feel free to publish. His assumption of Rasmus Nielsen as a disciple was a consequence of the metamorphosis, another instance of ‘direct communication’ prompted by the pressure of the feeling, ‘I must speak.’ But we can easily understand that this involved much time and trouble, and that for a solitary like S. K. it must occasionally have been vexatious.

In the course of this year there were other vexations. In January he had to find a new home, and on April 1, the conventional ‘moving day’, he had to move into it. And in this emergency he was deprived of his faithful servitor Anders, who had been called to the colours. Nor did this represent all he suffered on account of the disastrous war with Germany, for by the fall of securities he lost a great part of the sum he had received for the sale of his father's house, and this accounts in part for the economic anxieties which now began to trouble him. The reader will hardly need to be reminded that what he says in the Christian Discourses about the 'anxieties of the heathen' were addressed in the first place to himself, to comfort and sustain himself — and as a rebuke to himself. His contemporaries thought that he was indifferent to the political revolution in Denmark; but perhaps no one felt it more deeply than this essentially aristocratic and conservative man, who had presaged it, and who better than any one else was able to understand its significance. And yet perhaps the deepest distress he suffered during the course of this year was the dramatic failure of his attempt to approach Councillor Olsen, the father of his one-time fiancée — the Councillor ran away as fast as his legs would carry him.

A little book, The Crisis and a Crisis in the Life of an Actress, was published in the first instance as a feuilleton in a daily paper (July 24 — 7, 1848). It was the last 'aesthetic' work to be published, and S. K. was dubious about publishing it at a time when he had long been engaged exclusively with serious religious writing. As it was written in 1847 it does not belong strictly to the productions of the year we are here dealing with, though his agonizing debate whether or not he ought to publish it involved no inconsiderable activity of mind and spirit. The Christian Discourses with which this volume begins were published on April 26, 1848 (a week after the metamorphosis), but they were of course written before that event; in fact they had been sent to the printer on March 6, and the greater part had been finished in 1847.

An entry in the Journal contains 'instructions' for the second part of this work, 'Joyful Notes in the Strife of Suffering.' In this we have a hint which the contemporary readers did not have — unless they were able to perceive it in the introductory disquisition about the significance of the edifying. It shows how much mystification and 'craftiness' there was in S. K.'s writings before his nature was 'entirely changed'. 'These Discourses are constantly kept tangential to the consciousness of sin and the sufferings of sin. Sin is another matter, and these Discourses just reach that point. While consolation rises lyrically as high as possible above every earthly need and wretchedness, even such as are hardest to bear, the dreadfulness of sin is constantly indicated. Thus there is craftily concealed in these Discourses another theme: Sin is man's ruin.' The very title of these 'Christian Discourses' implies an advance towards 'direct communication' — even before the liberating experience of 1848. For the earlier Discourses could be religiously 'edifying' without stressing the positions most distinctive of Christianity. Hence S. K. was scrupulous not to call them Christian. What is more, he was honest enough not to express in the earlier Discourses positions which he himself had not yet securely attained on his laborious path to 'becoming' a Christian. Moreover, in the title to the third part of the 'Christian Discourses' ('Thoughts which wound from behind... for edification') he contrived slyly to introduce the phrase, 'for edification', which hitherto (with a subtilty of distinction between this and the qualification 'edifying', which is not visible to most of us) he had doggedly maintained was 'not my category'. The reader of these 'Christian Discourses' will doubtless find occasion to observe that thoughts which stab from behind are not confined to Part Three, but emerge disconcertingly in other places.

Just before the entry recording the metamorphosis we find the first suggestion of the Part I. of Training in Christianity. The idea of the third and second parts (in this order) had come to him in the course of the previous year. This book — one of his greatest works — was written in 1848, but qualms about making it public retarded its publication until 1850.

The moment of conversion was evidently richly productive, for three days later (on Easter Even) the Journal records the first idea of the ‘Three Godly Discourses’ about The Lilies and the Birds, which also was written in the course of this year, although it was not published until May 14, 1849. S. K.’s interest in birds may be inferred from the many discourses in which he treats them as an instructive parable. It is confirmed by the fact that, although in his youth he had thought of devoting himself to natural science, in his large library, when after his death it was catalogued for sale, there were found but two books which had any relation to this subject, and one of them was a book about ‘The Birds of Denmark’. The idea of the three Discourses at the Communion on Fridays (‘The High Priest’ etc. etc.), which conclude this volume, was first recorded on September 1.

Until this year S. K. was fairly well content with his description of himself as ‘a poet and thinker’, which combines qualities which are not commonly found together — and besides, as he said, he was a very peculiar sort of thinker and a very passionate one. After the metamorphosis this no longer contented him — he recognized that the poetical must go, but he would give it a festal send off. The Discourses on the Lilies and the Birds were to be a poem to end poetry. He says in his Journal: ‘The purpose of these discourses therefore will be to make evident the conflict between poetry and Christianity, how Christianity, in a certain sense, when compared with poetry (which is wishful, infatuating, benumbing, transforming life’s reality into an oriental dream, as when a young girl could wish to lie all day on a sofa and let herself be enchanted) — how Christianity in comparison with this is prose — and yet is precisely the poetry of eternity. Consequently the lilies and the birds (i.e.. the description of nature) shall on this occasion receive a more poetical colouring and splendour of hue, just to show that the poetical is to be given up. For when poetry really must fall (not before the rant of a glum and sullen parson) it must wear its festal dress.' The reader has an opportunity here to see how this programme was carried out.

One of S. K.'s preoccupations since the middle of the year 1847 was the popular demand for a second edition of Either/Or. It was distasteful to him to fix attention upon this popular 'aesthetic' book at a time when his whole effort was concentrated on the task of propounding 'directly' the most decisive categories of Christianity. Moreover, he was in conflict with the publisher, who offered him 500 Danish dollars, whereas S. K. held out for 700. It was not until 1849 he decided to republish it, and then he was tormented by the problem of selecting from among the many works already finished the one most fit to 'accompany' it. His choice happily fell upon The Lilies and the Birds, and both were published on the same day, May 14, 1849.

In reading the three works published in this volume, the first of which was written before the metamorphosis, and the others after, the reader may be at a loss to detect any great difference with respect to 'direct communication'. But that is not strange, for S. K. constantly affirmed that his 'Discourses, which always were published in his own name, were instances of "direct communication"'. That is quite true in a way — only he had hitherto been reticent about expressing all that he believed — because of the characteristic scruple 'whether a man has a right to let it be known how good he is'. 'Discourse' was the word he elected to use in order to avoid the implication that he claimed the authority which belongs to the 'sermon'. When he gave up 'indirect communication' he naturally clung to the form of the discourse, and everything he wrote from this time on — even the works ascribed to Anti-Climacus — were homoletical, based upon a passage of Scripture as a text which he faithfully commented upon. They are sermons which certainly have a tone of authority.

Nevertheless there is a difference observable even as between the works contained in this volume which were so closely related in time, and still more between the earlier Discourses on the one hand, and the trenchant attacks upon the corruptions of Christianity which are not obscurely veiled in Training in Christianity, For Self-Examination, and Judge for Yourselves, or even in the Discourses which accompanied these — all of which are to be published before long in two volumes. Comparing the works published in this present volume, the reader will easily perceive that in the Discourses on The Lilies and the Birds there is no theme 'craftily concealed', as, according to the hint quoted above, there was in the second part of the Christian Discourses. In the third part, 'Thoughts which wound from behind' (as though a friend were to approach smilingly to embrace you — and you felt his dagger in your loins), there is not much concealment — and for this reason S. K. was reluctant to publish it. But so far as the first part is concerned, S. K. hints plainly enough in the Introduction what a double-edged dagger the word 'heathen' is.

S. K. (God be praised!) remained subtle to the end, but from this period on he was not over-subtle and he resorted to no mystification. That is the reason why I was eager to translate first the last books, in which he makes as clear as day what he is aiming at, so that the reader can decide at once whether he wants to listen to anything more from this author. It is only for prudential ('economic') reasons that the first Discourses of 1848 are now presented first — and I expect that the later works will follow in a few months.

NOTES CULLED FROM THE JOURNAL

THE CHRISTIAN DISCOURSES were published without a preface, but in the Journal we find the first draft of a preface which contains a sharp expression of S. K.'s bitter resentment against Copenhagen, 'the market town', which counts it 'a crime for a man to be more gifted and industrious than the average', and which 'prostrates its spirit in the idolatrous worship of undanish [viz. German] spirit, instead of favouring and encouraging its legitimate children'. Later this was abbreviated by the omission of the more violent protest, and though it still seemed to S. K. too personal to be made public, it is to be found among his Papers in the following form.

'I WOULD BEG the reader in plain terms, as I have never before done, not to lose patience. I myself perceive very clearly how difficult it must be for a contemporary to keep up with me without growing weary, since I grant no repose either to him or to myself. I perceive how difficult it must be to get the right impression. This I myself perceive full well, precisely because, better than any one else perhaps, I understand that only after I am dead and gone will the time come for my works, when they and my life will (as the artists say) be seen to advantage and show off well, because so long as I live it is part of my task to employ about two-thirds of my strength in confusing, in working against myself and weakening the impression — which is precisely what makes me difficult for the contemporaries.'

Nothing could show more plainly the difficulty — and misfortune — of 'indirect communication'. But this blunt statement also shows that in 1847 S. K. was on the point of emancipating himself. To the psychologist this is an interesting instance of the fact that what suddenly emerges in consciousness has been slowly elaborated below the threshold of consciousness. For it was not till Holy Week of the following year that S. K. became suddenly conscious of his liberation — that he 'must', and by implication could, speak out. And when on December 28, 1847, he conceived of the theme of Part III, 'Thoughts which wound from behind,' and early in 1848 embodied it in seven most trenchant discourses, he was already in full swing of 'direct communication'.

'Thoughts which attack from behind' was one of the first suggestions for the title, and 'A Christian Attack' for the sub-title. But before this 'assault of thoughts' (as he called it in one place) was published (although the manuscript had long been in the hands of the printer), Germany had assaulted Denmark, and the Danes were engaged in a very different sort of strife. This total change in the situation prompted in S. K. the misgivings which he expressed in the following entries in the Journal.

‘Perhaps not a soul will read my Christian Discourses — perhaps there will be a tumult in the camp, and I the maltreated sacrifice. Perhaps. Oh, it is hard to support the thought of such a possibility.’

‘What is it after all for one in a confused state of mind to let oneself be killed on the field of battle, arm-in-arm with a thousand others, carried along by public opinion, perhaps in the end without having a single thought, at the most an obscure feeling — what is that in comparison with this slow, consciously arranged advance, with the constant possibility of being able to prevent the decisive engagement!’

FROM THE JOURNAL

March 27, ‘48.

Again I have for a moment taken into consideration my responsibility for letting the Christian Discourses, especially Part III., appear at this time. It is plainly perilous for me to let that which was written in a totally different situation be read in this situation. But I can do no other. It is providence which has arranged the thing thus for me. It is not that I have cast myself into danger. My manuscript was delivered to the printer long before this last thing happened, which doubtless has altered men a great deal. Nothing is more certain than that every word in my Discourses is true; I have nothing to alter. So then, should I now take it back for fear of personal danger? No, that I dare not do. What I am, I am solely and only by believing and obeying God. The moment I catch myself in fleeing cowardly from any danger into which He would lead me, I have avoided sure enough the danger — but to my own destruction. Woe unto me, I collapse into nothing! But along with God I can endure everything — so I hope to God — without Him, nothing.

Perhaps there is also much hypochondria in this fear of mine; but that’s neither here nor there. God knows how I suffer — but God also will help me and my cause.

So here I sit. Outside everything is in movement, nationalism surges high in all, everyone talks of sacrificing life and blood, is perhaps also ready to do it, but supported by the omnipotence of public opinion. And here I sit in a quiet room (doubtless I soon will be in bad repute for indifference to the national cause); I recognize only one danger; the religious danger. But about that no one cares — and no one has a presentiment of what is going on in me. Thus it is with my life, I cannot escape it. Always misunderstanding. Where I suffer I am not understood — and I am hated.

[Marginal note. On a week-day I opened the book and read my sermon by Mynster, as I am accustomed to do only on Sundays; and, behold, it was on Nicodemus. What a warning not to retreat!]

And now that existence entirely corresponds with all I have been expounding, now that providence has helped me by the fact that I had already delivered the manuscript to the printer, there is here no question of taking a step forward, but of taking a cowardly step backward; now that I entirely understood myself in being a solitary man, without relationship to anybody, with deep inward pains, with only one comfort, God who is love, only one friend Whom I crave, the Lord Jesus Christ, with a yearning for a deceased father, being separated by worse than death from the only person now living whom I have loved in a decisive sense — now to retreat... no, no!

If one is to lift a whole generation, verily one must know it. Hence it is that these proclaimers of Christianity who begin straightway with orthodoxy have not much influence, and that only upon the few. For Christendom is very far behind. One must begin with paganism. So it was that I began with Either/Or. Thereby I got the generation to go with me; it did not even dream whither it was going, or where we now are. But people became aware of the problems. They cannot be quit of me, just because they went along with Either/Or so gladly, so gladly. They might now leave me alone, they might put me to death — it avails nothing, they have me for life. If a man begins at once with Christianity, they say, ‘That isn't anything for us,’ so at once they are on the defensive.

But, as the title of my last Discourses suggests, my whole work as an author is one great thought, and that is; to wound from behind.

THE ANXIETIES OF THE HEATHEN CHRISTIAN DISCOURSES by S. KIERKEGAARD

Copenhagen, 1848

FROM THE JOURNAL

THE MAN WHOM in the first Discourse of ‘The Anxieties of the Heathen’ I have represented as talking so crudely about the seriousness of life is not, as one can promptly perceive, what we call a poor man. Ah, it never could occur to me to talk to such a man in such a way. No, it is a journalist of sorts, one of those who live by — and perhaps in luxury and abundance live by — writing on... pauperism.

PRAYER

Father in heaven, when spring is come, everything in nature returns in new freshness and beauty, the lilies and the birds have lost nothing of their charm — oh, that we also might return to the instruction of these teachers! Ah, but if in the time that has elapsed we have lost our health, would that we might regain it by learning again from the lilies of the field and the birds of the air!

The Gospel for the 15th Sunday after Trinity. (Matt. vi. 24-34)

No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one and love the other; or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon. Therefore I say unto you, Be not anxious for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than food, and the body than raiment? Behold the birds of the heaven, that they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; and your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are not ye of much more value than they? And which of you by being anxious can add one cubit unto his stature? And why are ye anxious concerning raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. But if God doth so clothe the grass of the field, which today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Be not therefore anxious, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? For after all these things do the heathen seek; for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first his kingdom and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. Be not therefore anxious for the morrow: for the morrow shall be anxious for itself. Every day has enough in its own worries.

INTRODUCTORY

IT WAS ON the summit of Sinai the Law was given, amidst the thunders of heaven; every beast that approached the holy mountain (alas, innocently and unawares) must be put to death — according to the Law. It is at the foot of the mountain the Sermon on the Mount is preached. Thus it is the Law is related to the Gospel, which is the heavenly come down to earth. It is at the foot of the mountain; so mild is the Gospel, so close is the heavenly which descends, and yet all the more heavenly for that. It is at the foot of the mountain; yea, what is more, the birds and the lilies are in the company — it sounds almost as if it were turning the thing into a jest that they come along... playfully. For although the seriousness becomes all the more sacred just for the reason that the birds and the lilies are in the company, yet the jest continues, and it remains nevertheless a jest that the lilies and the birds are in the company, they are in the company, and what is more they are there to teach; for it is true enough that the Gospel itself is the real teacher, that He is 'the Teacher' — and the Way and the Truth and the Life in the instruction, and yet the birds and the lilies come along as assistant teachers of a sort.

How is this possible? Well, really, the thing is not so difficult. For the fact is that neither the lilies nor the birds are heathen, but neither are the lilies and the birds Christians, and just for this reason they could be especially helpful by way of giving instruction in Christianity. Consider the lilies and the birds, and then thou dost discover how the heathen live, for it is precisely not like the lilies and the birds that they live; if thou dost live like the lilies and the birds, thou art a Christian — which the lilies and the birds neither are nor can become. Paganism stands in opposition to Christianity, but the lilies and the birds stand in no opposition to any of these contending parties; if one may say so, they play apart by themselves, keep shrewdly aloof from all oppositions. So then, the Gospel, in order not to condemn and denounce, uses the lilies and the birds to show what paganism is, but also at the same time to show what is required of Christians. In order to avoid a tone of condemnation the lilies and the birds are thrust in between; for the lilies and the birds condemn nobody — and as for thee, thou shalt not condemn the heathen, thou shalt learn from the lilies and the birds. Yes, it is a difficult task the lilies and the birds have, a difficult position they are in as instructors; there was nobody else could do it, every other teacher would so easily be tempted to accuse and condemn the heathen and praise the Christians (instead of imparting instruction), or mockingly to condemn the so-called Christians who do not live as they ought. But the lilies and the birds, which are engaged solely in teaching and are absorbed in it, do not express any opinions, look neither to the right hand nor to the left, neither commend nor reprove, as teachers generally are wont to do. Like Him, 'the Teacher', of whom it is said, that He 'careth not for any man' (Mark xii. 14), so they care not for any man, or rather they care for themselves. And yet, and yet it is almost an impossibility not to learn something from them, if one considers them. Ah, a man may do all he is capable of doing, and yet it sometimes may be doubtful whether the pupil learns anything from him; but the lilies and the birds do nothing whatever, and yet it is almost an impossibility not to learn something from them. Surely one can learn from them in the very first instance what it is to teach, what it is to teach in a Christian sense, can learn from them the great art of teaching, namely, to be careless about it, to care for oneself, and yet to do this in such an arousing way, so arrestingly, so ingratiatingly, and, so far as expense is concerned, so cheaply, and withal so persuasively, that it is impossible not to learn something from it. For doubtless when a human teacher has done everything and the pupil has learned nothing, he can say,

‘It is not owing to me!’ Oh, but when thou hast learnt so much from the lilies and the birds, is it not as though they said, ‘It is not owing to us’? So benevolent are these teachers towards the pupil, so benevolent, so humane, so worthy of their divine commission. If thou hast forgotten something, they are willing at once to repeat it to thee, and to repeat and repeat, so that at last thou mightest learn it; if thou dost learn nothing from them, they do not reproach thee, but merely continue with rare zeal to go on with the instruction, concerned only with teaching; and if thou dost learn something from them, they attribute it all to thee, act as if they had no part in it, as if it were not to them thou owest it. They despair of no one, however indocile he may be, and they do not require slavish dependence upon them, even of him who has learnt the most. Ah, ye marvellous teachers, if one were to learn from you nothing else; if only he learned to teach, how much he would have learnt! It is already a great thing if a human teacher put into effect some part of his own teaching, since usually one makes much ado and does little — ah, but also this observation about others the lilies and the birds never made! But you marvellous teachers — well in a certain sense you do not do what you say; you do it without saying anything. Yet this laconic silence of yours and this faithfulness towards yourselves, year in and year out, long as the day may be, whether you are appreciated or unappreciated, understood or misunderstood, seen or unseen, doing the same thing — oh, marvellous masters of the art of teaching!

So then, by the aid of the lilies and the birds, we learn to know the anxieties of the heathen, what they are, such, namely, as the lilies and the birds do not have, notwithstanding they have the corresponding needs. One might, however, learn to know these anxieties in another way: by journeying to a heathen land and seeing how men live there, what they are anxious about. And finally in a third way: by journeying — but what am I saying? — why ‘journeying’? we are in fact living on the spot, in a Christian land where all are Christians, so that one might conclude that the anxieties which are not found among us, notwithstanding that the corresponding needs and pressure are present, must be the anxieties of the heathen. So one might conclude — if, alas, another consideration did not take away from us the power of drawing this conclusion by taking away the hypothesis, and we were compelled to conclude in another way: ‘These anxieties are found amongst men in this land, ergo this Christian land is pagan.’ The discourse about the anxieties of the heathen will then sound like sly mockery. Yet we dare not permit ourselves to take such a severe view of Christendom, or to employ this almost cruel mockery, a mockery, be it observed, which would finally fall upon the head of the speaker himself, who doubtless is not by any means such a perfect Christian. But let us not forget that the discourse might as it were have this mockery up its sleeve, that if an angel were to speak, he might thus make sport of us who call ourselves Christians, by giving this turn to his discourse, and instead of rebuking our mediocre Christianity, he might describe the heathen anxieties, adding immediately, ‘but in this land which is Christian there are to be found of course no such anxieties, drawing his conclusion from the consideration that these anxieties are in fact the anxieties of the heathen; or, conversely, proceeding from the assumption that the land is indeed Christian, he might conclude that such anxieties were therefore not justly called heathen; or, by imagining a Christian land where there really were none but Christians, and assuming that this land is our land, he might conclude: ‘Since these anxieties are not to be found there, they must be the anxieties of the heathen.’ Let us not forget this, neither let us forget that the heathen who are to be found in Christendom are the most deeply sunken. Those in the heathen land have not yet been lifted up to Christianity, these have sunk beneath the level of paganism; those belong to the fallen race, these, after having been lifted up, have fallen again, and fallen still deeper.

Thus the edifying address combats in many ways to bring it about that the eternal may be victorious in men, but it does not forget at the right place to soften this combat to a smile. O thou combatant, let thyself be softened! One may forget how to laugh, but God preserve a man from ever forgetting how to smile! A man can forget much without detriment, and in old age one must put up with forgetting much one might wish to remember; but God forbid that up to his last blessed end a man should forget the lilies and the birds!

PART I

I. THE ANXIETY OF POVERTY

Be not therefore anxious, saying, what shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? — after all these things do the heathen seek.

THIS ANXIETY THE bird has not. What does the bird live on — for about the lily we will say nothing, it can get along of course, for it lives on air — but what does the bird live on? The civil magistrate has, as every one knows, much to be anxious about; at one moment he has the anxiety that there are some people who have nothing to live on, but then again at other times he is not satisfied to know that a man has something to live on, he summons him and interrogates him about what he lives on. What then does the bird live on? Surely not on what it gathers into barns, for it does not gather into barns — and really a man never lives on what he has laid up in the barn. But what does the bird live on? The bird cannot give an account of itself; in case it were to be summoned, it would have to answer like the man born blind, who was interrogated about Him who had given him his sight, and said, 'I know not, but this I know, that I, the blind man, see.' So the bird must make answer, 'I know not, but this I know, that I live.' On what does it live? The bird lives on the 'daily bread', this heavenly food which cannot be too long kept, [The allusion here and hereafter is to the manna (Exodus xvi.).] this immense store of provision which is in such good custody that no one can steal it; for only that which is kept over the night can the thief steal, that which is used during the day no one can steal.

So then the daily bread is the bird's living. The daily bread is the most scantily measured supply, it is exactly enough, but not the least bit more, it is that little which poverty needs. But then, indeed, the bird is poor. Instead of answering we will ask, Is the bird poor? No, the bird is not poor. Behold, here it appears that the bird is a teacher: it is in such a situation that, to judge by its outward condition, one must call it poor, and yet it is not poor; it never could occur to any one to call it poor. And what does this mean? It means that its condition is that of poverty, but it has not the anxiety of poverty. If it were to be summoned — there is not the least doubt that the magistrate would find that in the strictest sense it belongs under Poor Relief; but if only one lets it fly away again, it is not poor. True enough, if the Poor Relief were allowed to have its way, the bird would still be poor; for one would torment it with so many questions about its way of gaining a living, that it would observe for itself that it was poor.

Be not therefore anxious, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? — after all these things do the heathen seek; for the Christian does not have this anxiety. Is the Christian then rich? Well, perhaps it may well be that there is a Christian who is rich; but about that in fact we are not talking, we are talking about the Christian who is poor, about the poor Christian. He is poor, but he has not this anxiety, so he is poor and yet not poor. For when in poverty one is without the anxiety of poverty, one is poor and yet not poor, and then one is — if one is not a bird but a man, and yet like a bird... then one is a Christian.

What then does the poor Christian live on? On the daily bread. Therein he resembles the bird. But the bird, which true enough is not a heathen, is yet not a Christian either — for the Christian prays for the daily bread. But then is he not even poorer than the bird, for the fact that he must pray for it, whereas the bird gets it without praying? Yes, so the heathen thinks. The Christian prays for the daily bread, by praying for it he receives it, yet without having anything to keep over night; he prays for it, and by praying for it he keeps away the anxiety at night, while he sleeps soundly, to awaken the next day to the daily bread which he prays for. The Christian therefore does not live on the daily bread like the bird or like a character in a fairy-tale who takes it where he finds it; for the Christian finds it where he seeks it, and he seeks it by praying. But therefore he has also, however poor he may be, something more to live on than the daily bread, which to him has an added flavour, a value, a satisfying quality, which it does not have for the bird; for the Christian indeed prays for it, and so he knows that the daily bread is from God. And in another sphere, does not a trifling gift, a little insignificance, possess infinite value for the lover because he knows that it comes from the beloved? Therefore the Christian does not say merely that the daily bread is enough for him, in so far as it supplies his earthly want and need, but he speaks also of something else (and no bird and no heathen knows what it is he is talking about) when he says, 'For me it is enough, it is from Him', that is, from God. Like the simple wise man [Socrates] who talked constantly about food and drink, yet talked profoundly of the highest things, so does the poor Christian, when he talks about food, talk with simplicity of the highest things; for when he says, 'the daily bread', he is not thinking so much about food as of the fact that he receives it from God's table. So also the bird does not live on the daily bread; it surely does not, like the heathen, live to eat, it eats to live — and yet does it really live?

The Christian lives on the daily bread; there is no question about that, but neither is there any question about what he shall eat or what he shall drink. He knows that in this respect he is understood by the heavenly Father, who knows that he has need of all these things; the poor Christian does not question about all such things as the heathen seek after. On the other hand, there is something else he seeks, and therefore he lives (for indeed it seemed doubtful in how far one can properly say that the bird 'lives') — he lives therefore, or it is for this he lives, and it is for this reason he can say that he lives. He believes that he has a Father in heaven who every day openeth His bountiful hand and filleth all things living (him included) with blessing; yet what he seeks is not the satisfaction of his appetite, it is the heavenly Father. He believes that man is not distinguished from the birds for the fact that he cannot live on so little, but for the fact that he cannot live ‘on bread alone’; he believes that it is the blessing which satisfies; yet what he seeks is not to be satisfied, but the blessing. He believes (what no sparrow knows anything of — and what does it help a sparrow that it is so?) that no sparrow falls to the ground without the will of the heavenly Father. He believes that so long as he has to live here on earth he surely will receive the daily bread, and that then some day he shall live blessedly in the hereafter. Thus it is he explains the saying that ‘the life is more than food’; for no doubt the temporal life is more than food, but an eternal life is surely beyond comparison with food and drink, wherein a man’s life does no more consist than does the kingdom of God! He constantly bears in mind that a life of holiness was led here on earth in poverty, that ‘He’ was hungry in the desert and thirsted upon the cross; so that not only can one live in poverty, but in poverty one can live. — Hence he prays, it is true, for the daily bread, and gives thanks for it, but to pray and give thanks is to him more important than the food, and is indeed his meat, as it was Christ’s ‘meat to do the Father’s will’.

But then indeed the poor Christian is rich? Yes, without doubt he is rich. For the bird which in poverty is without the anxiety of poverty, the poor bird, is to be sure no heathen, and therefore is not really poor; but neither is it a Christian, and hence it is poor nevertheless — the poor bird, ah, indescribably poor! How poor not to be able to pray, how poor not to be able to give thanks, how poor to have to receive everything as with ingratitude, how poor to be as it were non-existent for its Benefactor to whom it owes life! For to be able to pray and to give thanks is precisely to be existent for God, who certainly did not once for all give him earthly riches, ah, no, He every day gives him the daily bread. Every day! Yes, every day the poor Christian has occasion to be aware of his Benefactor, in prayer and thanksgiving. And his riches indeed increase with every time he prays and gives thanks, with every time it becomes clearer that he exists for God and God for him; whereas earthly riches become poorer and poorer with every time the rich man forgets to pray and to give thanks. Ah, how poor to have received thus once for all his provision for the whole of life; what riches on the other hand to receive his provision 'every day'! How dubious a blessing to have occasion almost every day to forget that man has received what he has; how blessed to be reminded of it every day, that is, to be reminded of his Benefactor, that is, of his God, his Creator, his Provider, his Father in heaven, and so of the love for which alone life is worth living, and which alone is worth living for!

But then indeed the poor Christian is rich? Yes, certainly he is rich, and thou shalt recognize him by the fact that he does not wish to talk about his earthly poverty, but rather of his heavenly riches. And hence his talk sometimes sounds so strange. For while everything about him recalls his poverty, he talks of his riches — and hence no one can understand him... except a Christian. It is related of a hermit who for many, many years, dead to the world, had lived in the strict observance of the vows of poverty, that he had won the friendship and devotion of a rich man. Then the rich man died, and that hermit, who now for so long a time had lived on the daily bread, was constituted heir to his whole fortune. But when one came and reported this to the hermit, he replied, 'It must be a mistake. How can he make me his heir, seeing that I am dead long before him!' Ah, what a poor showing riches make by the side of... riches! Earthly riches always make a poor showing in relation to death. But the Christian who in poverty is without the anxiety of poverty is also dead to the world and from the world. Hence he lives. For the bird ceases to live by dying, but the Christian lives by dying. And therefore all the wealth of the world which suffices a man for a whole life makes so poor a showing in comparison with his... poverty, yea, or his riches. That a dead man needs no money, we all know; but the living man who really has no use for it must either be very rich — and then it well may be that he needs much of it — or he must be a poor Christian.

In so far then as the poor Christian is rich he does not resemble the bird. For the bird is poor and yet not poor; but the Christian is poor yet not poor, rich. The bird is not anxious for the lower things which it does not seek, but neither does it seek the higher things; the bird itself is without anxiety, but also, for it, its life is as though it were not the object of anxiety for any one else. The Christian shares as it were with God; he lets God take thought for meat and drink and all such things, while he seeks God's kingdom and His righteousness. The poor bird soars high aloft in the sky without being weighed down by the anxiety of poverty, but the Christian soars still higher; it is as though the bird were seeking God in its flight towards heaven, but the Christian finds Him; it is as though the bird were flying far, far away after God, but the Christian finds Him, and he finds Him (oh, heavenly bliss!), he finds Him upon earth; it is as though the bird were flying into heaven, yet heaven remains closed to it, only for the Christian does heaven open!

Be not therefore anxious, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink — after all these things do the heathen seek. Y*ea, the heathen are anxious about such things.*

The bird is in poverty without the anxiety of poverty — it keeps silent; the Christian is in poverty without the anxiety of poverty, but he does not talk of his poverty, rather of his riches. The heathen has the anxiety of poverty. Instead of being in poverty without anxiety, he is (and the one thing corresponds exactly to the other) 'without God in the world' (Ephes. ii. 12). Behold, for this reason he has anxiety. He does not keep silent like the care-free bird, he does not talk like the Christian, who talks of his riches; he actually has and knows nothing to talk of except poverty and its anxiety. He asks, What shall I eat? and What shall I drink? — today, tomorrow, the day after, the coming winter, the following spring, when I am old, as for me and mine and the whole land, what shall we eat and drink? This question he does not ask only at a moment, alas, of pressing anxiety, then again to regret it however; alas, in a time of distress, then again praying God to forgive it however. No, he is without God in the world and he gives himself importance by asking the question which he calls the real vital question; he becomes self-important with the thought that he concerns himself exclusively with this vital question; he finds it inexcusable of the public authority (for with God he has nothing to do) if he lacks something, he who lives solely for this vital question. Every one who does not concern himself therewith, or it may be with supporting him, he regards as a dreamer; even the highest and the holiest thoughts, in comparison with this deepest vital question, he regards as vain trumpery. He finds it foolish to refer a grown man to birds and lilies; for what might there be there to see, and what could one learn from them! When one is a man like him, a man who has learnt the seriousness of life, when one is a man, a citizen and a father, it is surely a rather insipid joke and a childish conceit to require one to pay attention to the lilies and the birds, as if one had nothing else to attend to. 'If it were not for a sense of propriety and a regard for my children, who after all must be given the customary instruction in religion, I would say quite openly that one finds mighty little in Holy Scripture in answer to the most important question, and on the whole very little that is of practical advantage, with the exception of one single splendid passage. One reads about Christ and the Apostles, but there is not the least contribution to the question which really is the most vital, namely, what they lived on, how they managed to pay every man his due and meet the rent and taxes. To solve the problem of death by a miracle is a very fatuous answer to this question — even if it is true, what does it prove? To have neglected entirely beforehand to think of any expedient, and then when the time-limit was reached and the payment of the tax was demanded, then to have a disciple pull a fish out of the water with a stater in its mouth with which one pays the tax — even if it is true, what does it prove? In general I feel the lack of seriousness in the Holy Scriptures, of a serious reply to a serious question, a serious man does not wish to be taken for a fool, as if one were engaging in a comedy. Let the parsons preachify about such things to women and children; every serious and enlightened man must in his secret heart agree with me, and where serious people come together, as in public meetings, honour is paid only to the shrewdness which has a sense for reality.'

So speaks the heathen. For paganism was without God in the world, but Christianity makes it perfectly clear that paganism is ungodliness. The ungodliness does not consist after all in being anxious, though certainly it is not Christian to be so; the ungodliness consists in not being willing to know anything else, and not being willing to know that this anxiety is sinful, and that for this reason the Scripture says that in exactly the same sense in which a man can 'overcharge' his heart with surfeiting and drunkenness he can overcharge it with the cares of this life (Luke xxi. 34). Everywhere in life there are cross-ways. Every man stands once, in the beginning, at the cross-ways — this is his perfection, not his merit. Where he stands at the conclusion (for at the conclusion it is impossible to stand at the cross-ways) is his choice and his responsibility. For him who is in poverty and thus cannot veer from the path of poverty, the cross-ways is either to turn away from anxiety in a Christian spirit by turning to 'the Way', upward — or to abandon himself to anxiety in an ungodly fashion by deviating into a by-way, downward; for in the eternal understanding of the situation there are never two ways, in spite of the name cross-ways, there is only one way, the other way is a by-way. The deeper he then sinks in anxiety, the farther he removes himself from God and from the Christian position; he is most deeply sunken when he will not know anything higher, but on the contrary wills that this anxiety shall be, not merely the heaviest (which in truth it is not, for the heaviest is the pain of repentance), no, but that it shall be the highest.

But they that desire to be rich fall into manifold temptations and snares; and what is the anxiety of poverty if it is not that of desiring to be rich? Perhaps the anxiety does not at once require riches; compelled by hard necessity, and in the impossibility (of obtaining more), it is perhaps for the time being content with less. Yet this same anxiety, if it gets its present wish fulfilled, if there is opened a prospect of more, will continually covet more and more. It is a delusion to think that the anxiety of poverty, in case it has not been willing to accept godly healing (and in this case the healing may begin with a little less just as well as with a little more), would find any condition in life that contented it short of attaining riches — and with that it would not be content. Oh, what a long road lies before the anxiety of poverty, and the most dreadful part of it is that this road is everywhere intersected by temptations! For we all are in danger wheresoever we go, but he who desires to be rich is everywhere in danger, and it is inevitable that he shall fall into this temptation, into which God has not led him, but into which he has cast himself. He who is in poverty is for this very fact in a difficult position, but not in the least forsaken of God; the salvation is commanded, namely, to be without anxiety — for that the salvation proffered by God is the only true salvation is to be known precisely by the fact that it is ‘commanded’. To be without anxiety, yea, that is a difficult gait to go, almost like walking upon the water; but if thou art able to believe, it can nevertheless be done. It is true of all danger that the principal thing is to get away from the thought of it. Thou canst not get away from poverty, but thou canst get away from the thought of it by thinking constantly of God. So it is the Christian goes his gait; he turns his eyes upward, he looks away from danger, in poverty he is without the anxiety of poverty. But he who desires to be rich — his thought is constantly upon the ground, with his anxiety about earthly things; he walks with bowed head, looking constantly before him, if perchance he might find riches. He looks constantly before him — ah, commonly this is the best means of avoiding temptation, but for him (alas, he know it not), for him this looking before him is precisely the way to walk into the pitfall, the way to discover temptations which are ever greater and greater, and to sink deeper and deeper in them. He already is in temptation's power, for anxiety is temptation's shrewdest servant; and temptation is down upon the earth, where are 'all such things as the heathen seek after'; and temptation is down upon the earth — and the more it gets a man to look down towards it, so much the more certain is his destruction. For what is the temptation, seeing that in itself temptation is the manifold? It is the temptation — not indeed like the glutton to live in order to eat, but (ah, what rebellion against the divine order!) — to live in order to slave; it is the temptation to lose oneself, to lose one's soul, to cease to be a man and to live like a man, instead of being freer than the bird, to slave, godforsaken, more wretched than the beast. Yes, to slave! Instead of labouring for the daily bread, as every man is commanded to do, to slave for it — because one has become the slave of man and of his own anxiety, and has forgotten that it is to God one should pray for it. Instead of being willing to be what one is, a poor man, but at the same time beloved of God, which also one is, never to be happy in oneself, never happy in God, to subject oneself and one's life to the curse of this slavery, in despondent grief day and night, in gloomy and brooding dejection, in spiritless activity, the heart oppressed with care about sustenance — infected with avarice although in poverty!

Think in conclusion of the bird, which has its place in the Gospel, and should have its place in the discourse. In comparison with the ungodly melancholy of the heathen, the bird, which in poverty is without the anxiety of poverty, is care-free; in comparison with the pious faith of the Christian, the care-freeness of the bird is light-mindedness. In comparison with the lightness of the bird, the heathen is as heavily weighted as a stone; in comparison with the freedom of the Christian, the bird too, however, is subjected to the law of gravity. In comparison with the bird, which is alive, the heathen is dead; in comparison with the Christian, however, one cannot properly say that the bird lives. In comparison with the bird, which keeps silent, the heathen is garrulous; in comparison with the Christian, however, the heathen is dumb, he neither prays nor gives thanks, and that in the deepest sense is human language, everything else, everything the heathen says, is related to this as a bird which has learnt to talk is related to a man. The bird is poor and yet not poor; the Christian is poor yet not poor, rich; the heathen is poor, and poor, and poor, and poorer than the poorest bird. Who is that poor man who is so poor that this is the only thing one can say about him, just as it is the only thing he himself can talk about? It is the heathen. According to the teaching of Christianity, no one else, no one is poor, neither the bird nor the Christian. It is a long road — in poverty to desire to be rich. The bird's short cut is the shortest, the Christian's way the most blessed.

II. THE ANXIETY OF ABUNDANCE

BE NOT THEREFORE anxious, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? — after all such things do the heathen seek.

THIS anxiety the bird has not. But is abundance then an anxiety? Perhaps it is merely disingenuous sophistry to talk in like terms of things so different as poverty and abundance, to treat them as equivalent in the way the Gospel does, ah, rather almost as if abundance were simply abundance of anxiety. A person supposes, in fact, that riches and abundance should keep him free from anxieties — also from anxiety for riches I should like to know! For riches and abundance come hypocritically clad in sheep's clothing, pretending to be security against anxieties, and they become then the object of anxiety, of 'the anxiety'; they secure a man against anxieties just about as well as the wolf which is put to tending the sheep secures them... against the wolf.

The bird, however, has not this anxiety. Is the bird poor? No; this we have made clear in the foregoing discourse. Is then the bird rich? Yes, though if it is that, it must not know it, if it is that, it must be ignorant of it. Or where has the bird stored its provision? If every proprietor and every crofter were to stand by his barn and say, 'No, away from here! This is mine', where is the barn that belongs to the bird? So then, the bird has not the anxiety of possessing abundance, it has not the anxiety of abundance, the anxiety that others own more, nor, alas, that others own less or nothing at all.

How then does the bird live? Well, it is God who every day metes out to the bird the definite measure, i.e.. enough; but it never occurs to the bird that it has or might wish to have more than enough. What God gives every day is... enough. But the bird does not desire to have either more or less than enough. The measure which God employs in meting out food to the bird is the same measure, if I may say so, which the bird has in its mouth: He gives the bird ‘enough’, then the bird measures it and says, ‘It is enough.’ If the little bird quenches its thirst on a dew-drop, which is exactly enough, or if it drinks from the largest lake, it takes just as little, it does not require to have all that it sees, not to have the whole lake because it drinks from it, not to take the lake with it so that it may be secured for its whole life; although at the season of harvest the bird has the richest provision, it does not know what abundance is, what it is for more abundant knowledge; although in the forest where the bird builds and dwells with its family there is the greatest possible abundance of everything he and his have need of, yet were it to live never so long, it does not know what abundance is, neither it nor its mate nor its young — but when a person even when he has abundance does not know what abundance is, it is then impossible that abundance should be an occasion for anxiety. When the bird has eaten and drunken it never occurs to it to ask, Where am I to get something the next time? Therefore the poor bird is not poor after all, but it never occurs to it to ask what it shall do with the remainder, with the whole lake, with the immense provision of corn which remains over when the bird has taken the three grains which were ‘enough’ — it has not, it does not possess, abundance, and has not the anxiety of it. And when the season comes and the longing to be off is aroused, it then leaves the house and home which is all that it possesses and has, the nest built with diligence and art, the favourable spot so happily chosen, the like of which perhaps it never will find again: it thinks, Sufficient unto the day is the evil — and so the bird flies away. For the bird is a traveller, even the bird which does not migrate is a traveller, hence it will have nothing to do with abundance, and nothing to do with its anxiety.

So it depends in fact upon the bird that it has not abundance and that it has not the anxiety of abundance. The first barrel of gold, says the capitalist, will be the most difficult to gain; when one has that, the rest comes of itself. But the first farthing, with the knowledge that one is beginning to lay up for abundance, is also earnest-money — the bird will have nothing, not a farthing, in the way of abundance, in order to avoid the rest (which follows of itself): anxiety. With the most punctilious precision it regularly takes each time exactly ‘enough’, not the least bit more, in order not to come into contact in the remotest way with the equivocal knowledge about what abundance is. In poverty the bird is without the anxiety of poverty; against the anxiety of abundance it has prudently secured itself.

How is it now that the bird is a teacher? where is the point of contact in the instruction it imparts? Why! naturally, it teaches us the surest way to avoid the anxiety of riches and abundance, namely, not to lay up riches and abundance — bearing in mind that one is a traveller; and in the second place, it teaches us (what is especially appropriate to this discourse), in abundance to be ignorant of the fact that one has abundance — bearing in mind that one is a traveller. For, like that simple wise man of ancient times, the bird imparts to us instruction in ignorance. Ah, it is difficult, when one is beautiful, not to know it (a thing, however, which both the bird and the lily can do), still more difficult, when one has abundance, not to know it! But in abundance the bird is as ignorant of the fact that it has abundance as if it did not have it.

The Christian has not this anxiety of abundance. Is then the Christian poor? Certainly there are Christians who are poor; but about that we are not talking here, we are talking about the rich Christian who has riches and abundance, and we are saying that nevertheless he has not anxiety. For when one in abundance is without the anxiety of it... through ignorance, he is either a bird, or (in case he is a man and yet like a bird) he is a Christian.

So the rich Christian has abundance but is ignorant of it, and that then is something he must have become. For it requires no art to be ignorant, but to become ignorant, and by becoming so, to be ignorant, that is the art. To this extent the Christian is different from the bird, for the bird is ignorant, but the Christian becomes ignorant; the bird begins with ignorance and ends with it, the Christian ends by being ignorant — and Christianly the question is never raised what a man was, but what he became, not about what sort of a man he was, but what sort he became, not about the beginning, but about the end. But to become ignorant in this wise may take a long time and is a difficult task, before a man succeeds little by little, and until he succeeds thoroughly, in being ignorant of what he knows, and in becoming ignorant in such wise, and continuing to be so, that he does not sink back again, captured in the snare of knowledge. The Christian when he has abundance is as one who has not abundance; and so he is ignorant, and so in fact he has not abundance, if he really is as one who has it not. But primarily the Christian is a man, and as such he is not like this; he becomes such as a Christian, and the more he becomes a Christian, the more he is as one who has not.

For what is it that is able to deprive a man of riches and abundance? That is something need and want is able to do, or the God who gave can also take away. When this occurs the... formerly rich man becomes actually poor. Of this however we are not talking, nor of the consideration that the rich man may give away all his riches and abundance, for then indeed he becomes a formerly rich man. But is there not something that is able so to take away from a man riches and abundance that he is deprived of it without becoming a... formerly rich man, that he is deprived of it and still is the rich man? Indeed there is such a thing. What power then is this? It is thought and the power of thought. Can thought then take abundance away from the rich man in any outward way? No, that is not in the power of thought. In connexion with abundance, thought can take from the rich man the thought of possession, the thought that he owns and possesses this wealth and abundance as his. And yet thought allows him to retain the whole of it in an outward sense; there is no other man who gets his riches and abundance, every one else must say that they belong to the rich man. Thus it is thought goes about it; if it succeeds, if the rich man consents to it, abandons himself and his abundance entirely to the power of thought, then is he who has as one who has not. And this the Christian does.

Yes, it is a cunning power, this power of thought! In such wise no thief can steal, no ruffian can rob, in such wise even God cannot take away from the rich man, even when he takes from him the power of thought and understanding; and yet no thief and no robber can so thoroughly take everything from the rich man as thought can when it is allowed to have its way. How then does this come about? When I do not know what I am to live on tomorrow, I evidently possess nothing. But when I reflect that I might die tonight, 'this very night', then I possess nothing, however rich I may be. To be rich I must possess something until the morrow, etc., must be secured for the morrow; but to be rich I must also be assured of the morrow. Take away riches, and then no longer can I be called rich; but take away the morrow, and then too, alas, I no longer can be called rich. For to be rich I must possess something, but to be rich I must also surely be in existence. And this the rich man does not know, he does not know whether he will be alive on the morrow, or he knows that he does not know it. At bottom every man knows it; but the Christian bears in mind, 'this very day' and every day, that he does not know it, does not know whether perchance he will die 'this very night'. — Moreover, when I possess nothing, and so can lose nothing, I am not rich; but when unfortunately I possess something which can be lost and which every instant can be lost, am I then rich? When I have nothing in my hand, then I hold on to nothing; but when I hold in the hand what runs through the fingers, what is liable to loss, what then do I hold on to? Riches are indeed a possession, but really and essentially to possess that the essential property of which is that it can be lost, liability to loss, is just as impossible as to sit and yet walk — thought at any rate cannot get it through its head that this might be anything but an illusion. But if it is true that liability to loss is an essential attribute of wealth, it is evident that no essential change has been wrought in it when it is lost; it is essentially the same thing; but then it is essentially the same while I possess it: it is lost. For it must be essentially the same every instant. When lost it is essentially the same; when possessed it is essentially the same, i.e.. lost — which means that in a deeper sense it may not be possessed, the notion of possession is an illusion. From all unlawful goods the thought of retributive justice can, after its manner, take away the thought of possession... by harsh means; but from riches and abundance, even if they are lawfully possessed, the thought of eternity takes away the thought of possession... by fair means, without employing any other power than the power of thought, and just in the degree than a man will abandon himself to the power of thought, or wills his own good.

Yes, it is a cunning power, this power of thought; if man were not in so many ways secured, or had... secured himself, against this power, he would acknowledge that it is cunning, but at the same time he would sense that it is in the service of truth it is so cunning. The sharp-sighted eye of the falcon does not so promptly and so surely discover its prey as this saving thought discovers what it shall swoop down upon. It does not sight with false aim at the strife of words about who is to be called wealthy, who prosperous, who well-to-do, etc., it aims at the thought of possession. And the Christian does not seek to screen himself from being thus aimed at, he himself helps to make the healing wound as deep as possible.

Then thought directs its aim also in another way at the thought of possession. If I am to be rich, I must indeed possess something, and that which I possess is accordingly mine. But then when I possess something which is not mine! Behold, here is a contradiction; and this strife of contradiction can be fought out only in the relationship of man to man. In so far as it is not mine I do not properly possess it; and yet there is no other man who possesses it, humanly speaking it is mine; but if it is mine, then I do indeed possess it. But this is meaningless. There must therefore (for the sake of meaning and thought) be a third party which has to be taken into account whenever in these innumerable relationships between man and man there is a question of 'mine', a third party who says, 'It is mine.' It is like the echo: every time a man says, 'Mine', it is heard repeating, 'Mine'. 'It is mine,' thou sayest; 'It is mine,' says He, He who is the third party. 'It is all mine,' says He, 'as everything is.' Really everybody knows well enough that no one has but what was given him — at bottom everybody knows this. But the rich Christian bears in mind that he knows it, and he takes account of his responsibility if he does not know it; this is all a part of his accounting for mine and thine. He bears in mind that he possesses nothing except what has been given him, not to the intent that he should retain it, but as a loan, as a trust. That in the last resort no man can retain the riches he has, that everybody knows substantially; but the rich Christian bears in mind that he has not received them in order to retain them but as a trust. So therefore he administers them in the best way, as accountable to the owner, shuddering at the mere thought that there might be a false entry in the account of mine and thine. But the owner is God. And God does not, as though He were a capitalist, want his fortune to be increased by sagacious investments, but on the contrary, to have it administered in an entirely different way, if He is to be well pleased. This the rich Christian who is a householder understands full well — and hence he cannot understand why interpreters have encountered such great difficulty in explaining the parable of the unjust steward. For, says he, supposing it had been the lawful property of that steward, God has no objection if thou wouldst sit down and write... false acquittances, writing acquittances on receipt of half as much as was due, that is, God has no objection if thou wouldst remit thy creditors half their debt; thou well mayest remit the whole of it, and in that way acquire friends who could receive thee in the hereafter. The unfaithfulness was that the steward dealt thus with the property of another. Therefore it was shrewd, and hence the children of this world, who have understanding of the affairs of this world, extol his shrewdness. If he had not been the steward but the master, and had dealt with his own property as the steward did with his master's, that would have been noble, highminded, Christian — and then the children of this world, not only would not have found it shrewd, but would have found it weak and foolish, and would have derided him. Properly the parable would teach that in this world the noble is regarded as stupidity, evil as shrewdness. For by remitting a debt — to steal from one's own pocket, how stupid! But to steal deftly from another man's pocket, how shrewd! The parable extols nevertheless the nobility of acting as the steward did — but, but with one's own property. Yet what am I saying? One's own property', the rich Christian understands precisely that in the highest sense riches are not his own; property. Are we then back again in the same position as the steward? Oh, no; the proprietor is God, who wishes His property administered exactly in this way. So far from calling the earthly riches 'mine', the rich Christian realizes that they are God's, and that they are to be administered as far as possible in accordance with the proprietor's wish, administered with the proprietor's indifference to money and money value, administered by giving them away at the right time and place.

However, when earthly goods are to be thus administered they are best administered by a traveller — the steward also, so soon as he had done the shrewdest thing, was considering the equally shrewd expedient... of packing up. And we, though certainly we should not resemble the steward, might learn from him. But like the bird, every Christian is a traveller; so too the rich Christian. As a traveller he is a Christian, and as a Christian he is a traveller who knows precisely what he shall take with him and what he shall not take with him, what is his and what is not his. One has perhaps occasionally something in the house which is not one's own property but is kept there for some use; the moment however one thinks of travelling one distinguishes scrupulously between what is one's own and what is another's. And the rich Christian, who every moment is a traveller, thinks and speaks thus every moment about his earthly riches; having quite different things to think about, he does not wish to be reminded precisely now... at the last moment, of what he is to take with him, and what is not his. Perhaps for thee it is rather difficult to understand him? Well, he understands that, and he understands himself; at one time perhaps it was difficult for him to understand it, but now he understands it. [This is evidently autobiographical, for at one time it was difficult for S. K. to understand it. Now when he understands it he is on the point of becoming... 'a formerly rich man'.] Sometimes it is difficult perhaps for the wife and children of the rich man to understand him, they are so much inclined to obtrude upon him a knowledge of his riches, to make him believe that he has abundance; but then he says reprovingly, 'I don't want to have anything to say about such things, and I don't want to hear it from you, especially now, at this last moment.' And so there is no one except a Christian that can understand him, since he neither is sick, nor, so far as the passport office knows, is he about to start tomorrow on a journey. So ignorant is he of his earthly riches — as he became and becomes by becoming aware of something quite different (for by becoming aware of something else one becomes ignorant of what one previously knew), [There is a play on words which cannot be rendered: ‘become aware’ (blive vidende), ‘become ignorant’ (vorder uvidende).] aware, namely, that he might die this very night, that earthly riches cannot essentially be possessed, that they are a trust, that he himself is a traveller; so ignorant is the rich Christian of his earthly riches — even like an absent-minded person.

The rich Christian, being thus ignorant of the abundance he has, cannot possibly have the anxiety of abundance: he has no anxiety with regard to that which, according to a pretty saying, is commonly gathered with disquietude and abandoned with disquietude. He has no anxiety in gathering abundance, for he does not care to gather abundance; he has no anxiety in retaining, for it is easy enough to retain what one has not, and he is as one who has not; he has no anxiety about losing, for he indeed is as one who has not; he has no anxiety for the fact that others possess more, for he is as one who possesses nothing; he knows without anxiety that others possess less, for he is as one who possesses nothing; and he has no anxiety about what he shall leave to his heirs. Thus he has no anxiety because of his abundance, and on the other hand he has the surprise, every time he employs his means to do good therewith, he has such a surprise as when one finds something; for since he who has is as one who has not, he in fact finds what he has not.

But then indeed the rich Christian is essentially just as poor as the poor Christian, is he not? Yes, that he is. But he is rich as a Christian. As ignorant as the poor Christian is of his earthly poverty, just so ignorant is the rich Christian of his earthly riches; as the former does not talk of his earthly poverty, so he too does not talk of his earthly riches; they both talk of one and the same thing, of the heavenly riches, of being in existence for God as one who prays and gives thanks for the daily bread, as one who is God’s steward.

And with this understanding, but only with this understanding, the rich Christian has joy in his earthly riches. But is it not very observable how much quicker it went when starting from poverty and attaining joy, and on the other hand how many difficulties are connected with starting from earthly riches and attaining joy? So then, as a Christian, the Christian has joy in his earthly riches. He believes as a Christian that he has a Father in heaven, and that it is this Father who gives him the earthly riches; yet for him the giver is infinitely more than the gift, he therefore does not seek the gift but the giver. He believes (what every Christian believes, but what for the rich Christian is so necessary) that the riches of a Christian are in heaven; hence his heart tends thither where his treasure is. He keeps constantly in mind that He who possessed all the riches of the world gave up all that He possessed and lived in poverty, that therefore the life of holiness is lived in poverty, and so again in ignorance of all the riches that are possessed. Hence the rich Christian is in a position to have joy in his earthly riches, finding joy whenever he is granted opportunity to do some good with his riches, that he can do another man a service, and by this same act can serve God. Oh, it is accounted a difficult thing to do two things at the same time; but it surely would be difficult to find a more blessed two-fold action to be done at the same time, than to do a service to another man and by the same act to do a service to God! It is accounted difficult to remember two things at once, difficult enough for many a man to remember the word, 'To do good and to communicate forget not', and yet the rich Christian remembers one more word, 'Forget not God when thou doest good and dost communicate.' Hence the rich Christian has a double joy in doing good, because he is at the same time led to think of God. The rich Christian believes (what seems most nearly to concern the receiver, but Christianly concerns quite as much the giver) that every good and perfect gift is from above, so that if the gift he gives is to be good and perfect, it must be God that gives it through him. Hence he has joy in his riches because it gives him occasion to learn to know God, who indeed is the real, the hidden, giver, the rich man being His confidant who is employed on these errands of blessing; and therefore the rich Christian has joy in his earthly riches for the fact that he helps others to thank and praise God, whereas in turn he also makes to himself friends, who indeed cannot make requital, but who nevertheless (ah, this is almost usury!) can in requital receive him in the hereafter.

Thus the rich Christian in abundance is without the anxiety of abundance, as ignorant as the bird, to that extent as poor as the poor Christian, and so has infinite joy in his earthly riches.

He has an advantage over the bird in being rich as a Christian, and, with this understanding, he has in turn the advantage of joy in his earthly riches; he is not merely without anxiety like the bird.

Therefore you are not to ask What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? — after all such things do the heathen seek. For the rich heathen has this anxiety.

The rich heathen is as far as possible from being ignorant of his riches and abundance. For a man can become ignorant of his riches and abundance only by becoming aware of something else; but the rich heathen neither knows nor wishes to know of anything else. Yes, it is difficult for a man who has riches and abundance to be unaware of that which day in and day out, so many times and in so many ways, but always ensnaringly, obtrudes itself upon one. Nevertheless it is a thing that can be done by becoming aware of God. For this knowledge entirely employs the Christian's mind and thought, excludes everything else from his memory, captivates his heart for ever, so that he becomes entirely ignorant. The rich heathen, on the other hand, has also only one thought, that of riches; about that all his thoughts revolve — yet he is anything but a thinker. Not only is he without God in the world, but riches is his god, attracting his every thought. He has need of but one thing, the one thing needful — and so he does not need God. But where one's treasure is, there will one's heart be also, and the rich heathen's heart is with riches, it is on the earth — he is no traveller, he is bound as a serf to the soil. If the rich Christian who has riches is as one who has not, the rich heathen is as one who has nothing else — nothing else to think of, nothing else to put his trust in, nothing else to be glad of, nothing else to be anxious for, nothing else to talk of. He is in a position to be able to look away from everything else, from everything that is lofty and noble and holy and lovely, but to look away from his riches is not possible to him for an instant.

Yes, the rich heathen has indeed knowledge of his riches and abundance, and with the increase of knowledge the increase of anxiety; he is aware of that which causes anxiety, and as this is the only thing he is aware of, he has nothing but anxiety. Thou canst see it in him by looking upon him, upon him the sallow tight-wad who gathers and gathers... anxiety unto himself; him the famished gourmand who is hungry in abundance, who also says, What shall I eat? and, What shall I drink? How will it be possible tomorrow (for today is provided for) to discover a dish so delicate that it could please my palate? him the sleepless niggard whom money, more cruel than the cruellest executioner, keeps more sleepless than the most abominable criminal; him the squinting money-changer who never looks away from his money except to see with envy that another possesses more; him the withered miser who for money starves himself to death — a thing which no one else has ever been heard of doing for money. Behold them — and hear what they say; they all say, and this is the only thing they talk about, they all say substantially, What shall we eat? and, What shall we drink? For the more riches and abundance they get, the more knowledge they acquire also, and this knowledge is anxiety, it does not satisfy hunger, it does not quench thirst; no, it stimulates hunger, it incites thirst.

Verily, they that desire to be rich fall into many temptations and snares which corrupt a man — and what indeed is the temptation of riches but that of desiring to be rich — of desiring to be quite certain of remaining rich, of desiring to be richer? It is a delusion that the anxiety of riches, which is not healed in a godly way (and in such case this may just as well occur whether one possesses a little less or a little more), might find any condition in life wherewith it would be content; as there never has lived any bird which ever took more than 'enough', so there never has lived a rich heathen who had 'enough'. No, there is no hunger so insatiable as the unnatural hunger of abundance, no knowledge so dissatisfied as the defiling knowledge of riches and abundance.

And what then is the temptation which comprises the many temptations? It is, by doing away with God, to cease to be a man; instead of being purer than the innocent bird, to be godforsaken, worse than bestially defiled, to sink lower than the beast; poorer than the poorest slave of the heathen, to serve in the most miserable and senseless thraldom, in abundance to slave for meat and drink, in wealth to slave for money, a curse to oneself, to nature an abhorrence, to the race a defilement.

Let us now in conclusion consider the bird, which indeed has its place in the Gospel and should have a place in the discourse. The bird is — well, if it is rich, it is ignorant that it is rich; the rich Christian became ignorant of it, he is rich, poor, rich; the rich heathen is poor, poor, poor. The bird keeps silent, it can well do that, it keeps silent about what it does not know; the rich Christian does not talk at all of his earthly riches, but only of the riches; the rich heathen knows of nothing to talk about except his mammon. In comparison with the ignorant bird the rich Christian is a wise man in ignorance, but the rich heathen is a fool, exceedingly knowing in the knowledge which is foolishness. The ignorant bird is, in comparison with the Christian, like a little booby; in comparison with the heathen it is like a wise man. The ignorant bird is innocently aware of nothing, the rich heathen is guiltily aware, and only aware, of that which is defiling. The ignorant bird lives like a somnambulist in the power of slumber, it sees nothing; the rich Christian who became ignorant of his earthly riches can, as though in a game, see nothing — because eternity blinds him he cannot see by the earthly light of day; the rich heathen sees dismally only in the dark — he cannot see by the light of eternity. The bird is the light and nimble traveller; the rich Christian who became ignorant travelled for ever farther afield; the rich heathen remained heavy, like a stone, upon the ground, all the heavier by reason of his defilement. When one is rich there is only one way of becoming rich: that of becoming ignorant of one's riches, of becoming poor. The bird's way is the shortest, that of the Christian the most blessed. According to the teaching of Christianity, there is only one rich man, namely, the Christian; every one else is poor, both the poor man and the rich. A man is most healthy when he does not notice at all or know that he has a body, and the rich man is in health when, as healthy as the bird, he knows nothing of his earthly riches; but when he knows of it, when it is the only thing he knows, then he is lost. When the rich Christian became entirely ignorant of his earthly riches he gained more than the bird, he gained heaven; when the rich heathen became entirely and solely conscious of his riches he lost what no bird loses when it falls to the ground, he lost heaven.

III. THE ANXIETY OF LOWLINESS

BE NOT ANXIOUS what ye shall put on — after all such things do the heathen seek.

THE sparrows are divided into grey sparrows and yellow, or if you will, golden sparrows; but this distinction, this division, lowly/superior, does not exist for them, not for any one of them. The bird which flies at the head when they are flocking, or on the right hand, is followed indeed by the others, there is a distinction between the foremost and the hindmost, between right and left, but the distinction lowly/superior does not exist; in the active swing of their flight, as the flock describes free and graceful figures in the air, the positions of first and last, of right and left, are altered. And when the thousands of voices sing in chorus there likely is one which gives the note, this distinction there is, but lowly/superior is a distinction which does not exist, and joy is unrestrained in the interchange of voices. It delights 'the individual' bird indescribably to sing in chorus with the others, yet it does not sing to delight the others, it is delighted by its own song and by the song of the others, hence it breaks off quite arbitrarily, ceases for an instant, until again it feels like joining in... and hearing itself.

So the bird has not this anxiety. How then does this come about? It is due to the fact that the bird is what it is, is itself, content to be itself, delighted with itself; it hardly knows distinctly, or is in its own mind quite clear what it is, and still less what others are. But it is delighted with itself and with what it is... whatever that may be; for it has no time for reflection, or even for making a start at it, so delighted it is with being what it is. In order to be, in order to have joy in being, it does not have to take the long road of learning first to know something about the others in order thereby to learn to know what it is itself. No, it takes the most delightful short cut; it is what it is; for it there is no question about ‘to be or not to be’; by the help of the short cut it easily avoids all those anxieties of difference. Whether a bird’s a bird for a’ that, whether it is ‘just as good a bird’ as the others of the same species; yes, even if it is like its mate — about all such matters it thinks not at all, so impatient is it in its joy at being; no young girl who is on tiptoe to go to a dance can be so impatient to be off as is the bird to get started at being what it is. For it has not an instant to waste if this might delay it born being; the shortest instant would be a distressingly long period, if in that time it might not be what it is; it would die of impatience at the very least objection to being allowed without more ado to... be. It is what it is, but it is; it lets five be an even number... and it is. Such surely is the case with the bird. If thou hast not beheld the proud soaring of the royal bird — if thou seest merely the little bird that sits and swings on a twig and amuses itself by singing — is there the least trace of the anxiety of lowliness? For thou wilt surely not raise the objection (which is precisely the instructive thought) that the bird is ‘high upon a straw’ [a proverbial expression for, ‘in high station’]. And if thou wilt — then take the straw upon which it sits. Although more vivacious than the lily in its joy at being, the bird is yet quite like the lily in its innocent self-contentment. If thou hast never beheld the splendid lily which in its beauty humbly holds its head so high — when thou seest merely the insignificant flower which stands in a ditch and jests with the wind as though it were its peer, if only thou wouldst see it after a storm has done its best to make the flower feel its insignificance, if thou wouldst consider it as it sticks its head out again to see if it might not be fair weather again — does it seem to thee that there is the least trace of the anxiety of lowliness? Or when it stands at the foot of the mighty tree and looks up at it with astonishment, does it seem to thee that there is the least trace of the anxiety of lowliness on the part of the astonished lily? Or dost thou believe that it would feel itself belittled if the tree were half as big again? Is it not rather as if it had the conceit to imagine that everything was for its sake?

So easy it is for the lily and the bird to be, they are so easygoing about this matter of living; the beginning, or making a start at it, strikes them as a thing so natural. For the lily and the bird are fortunately favoured by the fact that it is so easy for them to begin to exist that no sooner have they come into existence than they have at once begun, are at once in the full swing of being, they feel not the least need of anything that is to come before the beginning, and they are not in the least tempted by that trial which amongst men is so much talked about and is described as a difficulty so fraught with peril, the difficulty of beginning.

How then is the bird a teacher, and where is the point of contact in the instruction it gives? Why surely in this, that it makes the circuitous route to reach the beginning, this route which can be so very long — that it makes it as short as possible, in order as quickly as possible to come to itself, to be itself.

This anxiety the lowly Christian has not. Yet he is different from the bird in this respect, that he must be tried in this difficulty of beginning; for he is aware of the distinction lowly/ superior. He knows, and he knows that the others know this same thing of him, that he is a lowly man; and he knows what this means. He knows also what is to be understood by the advantages of worldly station, and that whereas ordinarily they exist to express what the others are who possess these advantages, in his case they serve only to indicate how lowly he is. For with every new advantage the superior person attains, the more superior he becomes, and with every advantage the lowly man must admit he is denied, the more lowly, in one sense, he becomes; that which exists for the sake of indicating how much the superior person is, seems from the other side to exist in order to indicate how little there is to the lowly man. — Oh, how difficult is the beginning of existence or of coming into existence: to exist, thereupon to continue in existence, and only after all that to exist; ah, cunningly hidden snare which is not spread for any bird! For it seems indeed as if, in order to be himself, a man must first be expertly informed about what the others are, and thereby learn to know what he himself is — in order then to be that. However, if he walks into the snare of this optical illusion, he never reaches the point of being himself. He goes then on and on like one who follows a road which the passers-by tell him certainly leads to the city, but neglect to tell him that if he would go to the city, he must turn around; for he is following the road which leads to the city, that he is following it... away from the city.

But the lowly Christian does not walk into this snare of optical illusion, he sees with the eyes of faith, and with the swiftness of the faith which seeks God he is at the beginning, he is himself before God, content with being himself. He has learned to know from the world or from the others that he is a lowly man, but he has not abandoned himself to this knowledge, he does not lose himself in it after a worldly fashion, he does not altogether realize it, by holding on to God with the tenacity of eternity he has become himself. He is like one who has two names, one of them being for all the rest, the other for his dearest ones; in the world, in intercourse with the others, he is the lowly man, he does not give himself out as anything else, and he is not taken for anything else, but before God he is himself. In the contacts of daily intercourse it seems as though he must constantly wait for the others in order to learn to know what he is now, at this moment. But he does not wait; he makes speed by being before God. He is the lowly man as a part of the multitude of men, and what he is as such depends upon his relationship to them; but in being himself he is not dependent upon the multitude, before God he is himself. For from 'the others', naturally, one properly only learns to know what the others are — it is in this way the world would beguile a man from being himself. 'The others', in turn do not know at all what they themselves are, but only what the others are. There is only One who knows what He Himself is, that is God; and He knows also what every man in himself is, for it is precisely by being before God that every man is. The man who is not before God is not himself, for this a man can be only by being before Him who is in and for himself. [What the 'self' is, 'the individual', what it means for a man to be 'before God' — these are the themes which most engrossed S. K. But fortunately he rarely uses in the Discourses the abstract vocabulary of German philosophy: an sich; das an-und-fur-sich-Seiende.] If one is oneself by being in Him who is in and for Himself, one can be in others or before others, but one cannot by being merely before others be oneself.

The lowly Christian is himself before God. In this wise the bird is not itself; for the bird simply is what it is. By the aid of this mode of being it has every instant evaded the difficulty of the beginning, but in this wise it did not attain the glorious end of the difficult beginning, to be doubly itself. The bird is like a single cipher, a man who is himself is more than a decade. The bird luckily evades the difficulty of the beginning and therefore gets no conception how lowly it is; but thus it is incomparably more lowly than one who knows how lowly he is. The conception of lowliness is nonexistent for the bird; but the lowly Christian is not essentially existent for this conception, he will not be essentially existent for it, for essentially he is and wills to be himself before God. The bird therefore is properly the lowly one. The lowly Christian is, in opposition to his lowliness, himself — without for this cause wishing to cease to be the lowly man he is in relation to others; he is in lowliness himself. And thus the lowly Christian is in lowliness without the anxiety of lowliness. Wherein does this lowliness consist? In the relationship to 'the others'. But what is the ground of this anxiety? It lies in existing only before others, in not knowing anything else but the relationship to others. The bird is not aware of the relationship to others, and to that extent it is not lowly, and again to that extent it is without the anxiety of lowliness; but of course it is not aware that it has a higher relationship.

And what then is the lowly Christian who before God is himself? He is a man. In so far as he is a man he is in a certain sense like the bird, which is what it is. But upon this we will not here dwell further.

But at the same time he is a Christian, as is implied in the question which asks what the lowly Christian is. In so far as he is a Christian he is not like the bird, for the bird is what it is. But it is not thus one can be a Christian; if one is a Christian, he must have become such. So the lowly Christian too has become (amounted to) something in the world; alas, the bird cannot become (amount to) anything, it is what it is. In likeness to the bird, the lowly Christian was a man, but then he became a Christian, he became (amounted to) something in the world. And he can constantly become (amount to) more and more, for he can constantly become more and more a Christian. As a man he was not created in the image (pattern) of God, but as a Christian he has God for a pattern! This disquieting thought (a pattern) which incessantly challenges one, the bird does not know; the bird is what it is, nothing whatever disturbs it in that being it has; yes, it is true, nothing disturbs it — not even the blissful thought of having God for its pattern. A pattern is to be sure a challenge... but what bliss! Even in the case of the poet we speak of it as good fortune when we say there is something within him which challenges him to sing; but the pattern is a still stronger challenge, an even stronger stimulus, to every one before whose eyes it is shown, for whom it is existent. The pattern is a promise, no other is so sure, for the pattern is indeed the fulfilment. — For the bird there is no pattern, but for the lowly Christian the pattern is in existence, and he is in existence for his Pattern — he can constantly grow to resemble it more and more.

[Christ as the Pattern is the persistent theme of S. K.'s last works: Training in Christianity and Judge for Yourselves.]

The lowly Christian who is himself before God is as a Christian in existence for his Pattern. He believes that He has lived on earth, that He let Himself be born in poor and lowly circumstances, yes, in dishonour, and thereupon as a child lived with the simple man He called His father and with the despised maiden who was His mother. That thereupon He wandered about in the lowly form of a servant, not to be distinguished from other lowly men even by His extraordinary lowliness, until He ended in the utmost wretchedness, crucified as a criminal — and then, to be sure, left behind Him a Name; but the lowly Christian's request is merely to dare in life and in death to appropriate His Name, or to be named after Him. The lowly Christian believes that, as it is related, He chose for His disciples lowly men of the simplest condition, and sought out for His companions those whom the world repudiated and despised; that throughout the various vicissitudes of His life, when men would highly exalt Him, and when they would abase Him if possible even more than He had abased Himself, He remained faithful to the lowly people to whom He was bound by the closer ties, faithful to the lowly men whom He had bound to Himself, faithful to the despised men whom they had even expelled from the synagogue because He had helped them. The lowly Christian believes that this lowly man, or that His life in lowliness, has showed how much a lowly man matters, and, alas, humanly speaking, what it means to be a superior man, how infinitely much it may mean to be a lowly man, and how infinitely little to be a superior man, if one is nothing else. The lowly man believes that this Pattern exists expressly for him who in fact is a lowly man, struggling perhaps with poverty and narrow circumstances, or, more lowly still, being despised and rejected. He admits indeed that it was not he himself that chose this scorned and despised condition of lowliness, and that to this extent he does not resemble the Pattern; yet he consoles himself with the thought that the Pattern exists for him, this Pattern which by means of lowliness presses itself as it were compassionately upon him, as though it would say to him, 'Lowly man, canst thou not perceive that the Pattern is for thee?' True, he has not himself, with his own eyes, seen the Pattern, but he believes that He existed. There was, in a certain sense, nothing at all to see — except lowliness (for glory is something that must be believed), and of lowliness he is well able to form a conception. He has not with his own eyes seen the Pattern, nor does he make any attempt to have the senses construct such a picture. Yet he often sees the Pattern. For as often as in faith's gladness at the glory of this Pattern he completely forgets his poverty, his lowliness, the contempt in which he is held, he sees the Pattern — and he himself approximately resembles it. For if in such a blissful moment, when he is lost to himself in the Pattern, another man beholds him, this other man sees before his eyes merely a lowly man — precisely so it was in the case of the Pattern, one saw merely a lowly man. He believes and hopes that he shall approach ever more and more to likeness with this Pattern, who only in the beyond will reveal Himself in glory, for here on earth the Pattern can only be in lowliness and can only be seen in lowliness. He believes that this Pattern, if he steadily strives to resemble it, brings him again into kinship with God, and into a still closer kinship, that he not only has God for his Creator, as all creatures have, but has God for his Brother.

But then after all the lowly Christian is something rather exalted? Yes, that he is, to be sure, something so exalted that one quite loses sight of the bird. Like the bird he is lowly without the anxiety of lowliness, though oppressed in a certain sense, as the bird is not, he is nevertheless highly exalted. He does not talk of his lowliness, at least not despondently; it only reminds him of the Pattern, and with that he thinks of His exaltation — and when he does so he is himself approximately a reminder of the Pattern.

The lowly heathen, on the other hand, has this anxiety. The lowly heathen is without God in the world, and moreover he is never essentially himself (which one only is by being before God), nor ever satisfied with being himself, which of course one cannot be if one is not oneself. He is not himself, not content with being himself, not content like the bird with being what it is; he is discontented with what he is, a burden to himself, he sighs and protests against his fate.

What is he then? He is the lowly man, nothing else, that is, he is what the others make of him, and what he makes of himself by only being for others. His anxiety is that he is nothing, yes, nothing whatever. So far is he from being like the bird, which is what it is. And hence again his anxiety is to become something in the world. To exist before God, that, as he thinks, is not to be anything — that makes no showing in the world in contrast or in comparison with others. To be a man, that, as he thinks, is not to be anything — that is in fact to be nothing, for in this there is no distinction from nor advantage over all other men. To be a Christian, as he thinks, is not to be anything — that indeed we all are. But to be Councillor of Justice — that would be something — and by all means he must become something in the world, it is enough to drive one to despair not to be anything at all.

'That is enough to drive one to despair' — he talks as if he were not already in despair; yet he is in despair, and despair is his anxiety. It is assumed indeed that in every state the lowly man is ordinarily exempted from bearing the burdens which the more favoured classes have to bear; but the lowly man who is in despair, i.e.. the heathen, even though he is lowly, is not exempted from bearing the heaviest of all burdens. They talk about the king bearing the weight of the crown, the man in high place bearing the weight of responsibility for government, him to whom much is given the weight of looking out for others, whereas it must also be taken into account that the king after all is the king, the man in high place is highly placed, the man to whom much is given is the man who has much; but the lowly man in despair, the heathen, worries himself to death under the weight of what he is not, he strains himself (yes, the situation is a crazy one) under the weight of a burden he doesn't bear. Whether it is a fact that it is the king who, like the foundation, sustains all the others, or that the others sustain the king as the topmost, we will not investigate here — but the lowly man in despair, the heathen, bears up all the others. This prodigious weight, 'all the others', weighs upon him, and that with the redoubled weight of despair, for it is not through the conception that he is something this weight weighs upon him, no, it weighs upon him through the conception that he is nothing. Verily, so inhumanly has no state or society ever dealt with any man, that by reason of the circumstance that one is nothing one should bear the burden of all; so inhumanly does only the lowly man in despair, the heathen, deal with himself. Deeper and deeper he sinks in the anxiety of despair, but he finds no footing to support the weight — he is in fact nothing, as to his own anguish he becomes convinced of it through the conception of what the others are. More and more ridiculous — oh, no, more and more pitiable, or rather more and more ungodly, more and more inhuman he becomes in his foolish effort to become something after all, something, however little it might be, which according to his notion was worth being.

Thus the lowly man in despair, the heathen, sinks under the prodigious weight of comparison which he lays upon himself. The thing of being a lowly man, which for the lowly Christian is a part of being a Christian, just as the weak and scarcely audible breathing is a part of the audible letter (and thus it is the lowly Christian talks about his lowliness, he talks about it only as a way of expressing the fact that he is a Christian) — this for the heathen is his anxiety day and night, about this his every thought is employed. Without the prospect of eternity, never strengthened by the heavenly hope, never himself, godforsaken, he lives in despair, as if for a punishment he were condemned to live these seventy years, tortured by the thought of being nothing, tortured by the fruitlessness of his effort to be something. For him the bird suggests no thought of self-reliance, heaven has no comfort — and that is only natural, for neither has the earth any comfort for him. It cannot be said of him that he is bound in thraldom to the earth, overcome by the enchantments of earthly life which made him forgetful of heaven; no, it is rather as if the temporal did everything to repel him by bringing him to nothing. And yet he desires to belong to the temporal on the most miserable conditions, he will not let it go, he clings tighter to being nothing, tighter and tighter as he seeks in vain to be something in a worldly sense, he clings despairingly tighter and tighter... to that which to the point of despair he would not be; thus he lives, not upon the earth, but as if he were cast out into the underworld. Behold that king [Tantalus] whom the gods punished, he suffered the dreadful punishment that whenever he was hungry the most delicious fruits appeared, but when he grasped at them they vanished; the lowly man in despair, the heathen, suffers a more anguishing punishment through self-contradiction. For while, tormented by being nothing, he seeks in vain to be something, he is not merely something but much; it is not fruits which withdraw themselves from him, it is he himself that withdraws even from being what he is. For he is not a man — and he cannot become a Christian.

Let us then in conclusion think of the bird; it has its place in the Gospel and should have its place in the discourse. The lowly bird is without the anxiety of lowliness; the lowly Christian is in lowly station without having the anxiety of lowliness, and so... is highly exalted above all earthly highness; the lowly heathen is in his anxiety far below himself, even if he were the lowest of the low. The bird does not look narrowly into what it is, the lowly Christian looks narrowly into what he is as a Christian; the lowly heathen gazes fixedly in desperation upon the fact that he is lowly. 'What!...

lowly...' says the bird, 'let us never think of such things, one flies away from them!'

'What!... lowly,' says the Christian, 'I am a Christian!'

'Alas, lowly!' says the heathen. 'I am what I am,' says the bird; 'What I shall be is not yet revealed,' says the lowly Christian; 'I am nothing, and I come to nothing,' says the lowly heathen. 'I exist,' says the bird; 'In death life begins,' says the lowly Christian; 'I am nothing, and in death I become nothing,' says the lowly heathen. In comparison with the lowly Christian the bird is a child; in comparison with the lowly heathen it is a happy child. Like the free bird as it soars highest in the joy of existing, so does the lowly Christian rise even higher; like the captured bird when in discouragement and anguish it beats itself to death in the net, so does the lowly heathen deprive himself of life still more pitiably in captivity to nothingness. According to the teaching of Christianity there is only one exaltation, that of being a Christian, everything else is lowly, both lowliness and exaltation. When one is lowly there is only one way to exaltation, that of becoming a Christian; this way the bird does not know, it remains what it is; but then there is another way which the bird does not know, that is the way the heathen takes. The bird's way of being is enigmatical, it is not to be found; the Christian's way was found by Him who is the Way; the heathen's way ends in darkness, no one has found his way back by that way. The bird avoids all danger by that byway it has; the lowly Christian does not take the by-way and is saved blissfully in glory; the lowly heathen chooses the by-way and 'goes his own way' to perdition.

IV. THE ANXIETY OF HIGHNESS

Thi*s anxiety the bird, has not.* But is highness then an anxiety? One would think that the higher a man stood, the more he would be exempted from all anxieties, for he has all the more men about him who are anxious and employed about nothing else but to keep all anxieties away from him. Alas, there is no false sarcasm in talking, as the Gospel does, in perfectly equivalent terms of the anxiety of highness and the anxiety of lowliness. For highness and power and honour and prestige tender their... faithful services as myrmidons which are to stand about the man of high estate to protect him from every anxiety, as it were on bended knee they promise... faithful allegiance — oh, but it is just this body-guard with which the man of high estate has not the courage to break, it is just this body-guard, which for safety's sake is so close to his body, just this it is that costs him his night's sleep. A factual situation may serve as a symbol: an emperor who rules over the whole world, surrounded by his faithful body-guard which rules over the emperor; an emperor who makes the whole world tremble, surrounded by his brave body-guard behind which and before which the emperor trembles.

But the bird, notwithstanding it always is on high, has not the anxiety of highness — neither that anxiety which is not in question here, the anxiety which does honour to the man of high station, that of being careful for the welfare of those committed to him (for in this little work we talk only of the anxiety a man may be without, indeed should be without, not of the anxiety without which it is impossible to be a Christian); nor that anxiety which here is in question. It hardly occurs to the bird to be careful of itself, still less that it might be commissioned to take care of others; the bird says in all innocence about its relationship to others, ‘Am I my brother’s keeper?’ It never occurs to any bird, not even to the bird that flies highest, that it might be so high that it should rule over others; but thus it has no anxiety whatever as to whether the others show it due deference or refuse to show it — or whether perhaps they even may be plotting to cast it down from its highness. No bird is so highly placed as that.

And yet every bird is in fact on high; but it is as though essentially every bird were placed equally high. This heavenly equality amongst the birds, or their equal highness under heaven, has something in common with the highness of eternal life — where likewise there is neither high nor low, and yet there is highness. Under the dome of heaven there is abundant room for the bird to soar as high as it will; but also the bird which walks on the ground is on high. The bird has no other way of understanding the thing. If one were to say to it, ‘But then thou art not really exalted if thou art not more exalted than the others,’ the bird would reply, ‘Why, how is that? Am I not on high?’ — and with that the bird flies high, or it remains on the ground, where it is none the less on high and conscious of its highness. Hence it is on high without the anxiety of highness, on high without being exalted over any one — under the dome of heaven there is too much room for that... or there is no room for narrow-mindedness.

Do but regard that solitary bird where it holds itself high aloft in the sky, so calm, so proud, without the least movement, not even the flap of a wing. And if thou perhaps hast attended to thy business and after the lapse of several hours dost return to the same place — look, it remains in the air unaltered, resting proudly upon the outstretched wings which it does not move, while it surveys the earth. It is difficult for the unpractised eye to estimate distance in the air or upon the water, but perhaps it has not altered its position by half a yard. It stands without footing, for it stands upon the air, so tranquil in highness — shall I say, so like a ruler of men? Or was there never a ruler so tranquil? It fears nothing, it beholds no danger, no abyss beneath it, its eye is never dizzy at that height, its sight never confused by the altitude, ah, and yet there never was a man so sharp-sighted, not even one who in lowliness envies highness. But what is it then which keeps it so tranquil on high? It is highness. For in highness in and for itself there is no danger, and beneath it there is no abyss. Only when beneath it there is highness which yet is more lowly than it is, and so on in turn — in short when there is somebody beneath it, then there is something beneath it, and then also there is the abyss beneath it. But for the bird there is no one lowlier, hence it is on high without having the abyss beneath it, and hence without anxiety, which comes with and from the abyss.

The bird is on high without being higher than anybody else, therefore without the anxiety of highness. Thus it is an apt teacher, and here is the point of contact in the instruction. To be on high in that fashion is possible without anxiety. If some one were to say, 'To be on high in that fashion is not to be on high at all, it is merely a play on words to talk of the bird as His Highness' — well, that only proves him an indocile pupil, a naughty boy who will not sit still during the lesson hour, but disturbs the instruction. For it is true enough that if he will not take pains to understand the bird, if instead of learning to reform his notions in conformity with the instruction the bird gives, he would take the bird to task and require it to accept his notions, thus rejecting it as a teacher, then indeed it is impossible to learn anything from the bird — and (be it said to the credit of the bird) this is literally the only way one cannot learn anything from the bird. But he who desires to learn will learn about highness that the only way one who is on high can truly be without anxiety is not to be higher than any one else.

The Christian of high position has not this anxiety. What then is the Christian of high rank? Well, if thou dost ask in a worldly sense whether he be king or emperor, or his highness, or his grace, etc., it is impossible to give an answer which covers the case generally. But if thou dost ask in a Christian sense, the answer is easy. He is a Christian. And as a Christian he knows full well all about shutting the door when he is to talk with God — not lest any one might get to know that he was talking with God, but lest anything or anybody might disturb him; when he talks with God he lays aside all earthly and all spurious pomp and glory, but also all false illusions.

He believes that there is a God in heaven with whom there is no respect of persons, that the man (if such a thing can be imagined) who might rule over the whole human race is not the least bit more important to God than the lowliest man — or than the sparrow which falls to the ground. He understands it therefore as an illusion that because he is so important to all men, or to such a countless number of them, and is plainly important to so many for their very life, that because he enjoys in his lifetime the heightened consciousness of being indispensable, and by anticipation the rich consciousness of being missed after his death, that therefore his life should also be more important to God; for to God he is not more important than the sparrow which falls to the ground — neither he, the mightiest of men, nor the wisest man that ever lived, nor any man whatsoever. He believes (instead of heeding the much talk about the many who could not live without him) that it is he who in order to live has need every instant, yea, every second, of this God, without whose will doubtless no sparrow falls to the ground, but without whom also no sparrow comes into existence and is. If the rest of us have another understanding, thinking that prayers are made for him because we need him, have need of his continuing in life, he for his part has a different understanding with God, recognizing that he, precisely for the fact that his task is incomparably the greatest, has more need than any other man that prayers be made for him. He believes that it is an unchangeable God who dwells in heaven, who will have His way — although all were to rise up against Him, which to Him would signify nothing; an unchangeable God who requires obedience, as well in the greatest matters as in the least, in the least detail of the most comprehensive world-historical achievement as in the most every-day undertaking, as well of the mightiest man that has ever lived as of the lowliest, and of all nature as well, which does not presume to do anything whatever without His will. He understands therefore that it is an illusion if any one would make him believe that because a word of power from him is enough to set in motion thousands of men, yea, almost to transform the face of the earth, because thousands press upon him and court the smile of the mighty, that therefore God should treat him differently than He does every other man, that towards him the unchangeable God should not also be unchangeable, unchangeable as eternity, unchangeable as the rocks — but believes that God might be almightily able to transform everything, more dreadfully than he, both the throne and the legions, both heaven and earth. He believes that before this God he is a sinner, and that this God is just as jealous of sin whoever the sinner may be. He understands therefore that it is an illusion if any one would make him believe that because there is hardly a man who is capable of taking account of his stewardship, of what he wrongly did and of what he left undone, because no man dares to condemn him, that therefore the righteous God (for whom it is not more important that the mightiest sins than that the lowliest does so — however different, humanly speaking, the magnitude of the consequences are — not more forgivable that the mightiest sins than that the lowliest does so), being amazed at human power, might not be able, or might not dare, to judge him with all the severity of the law. He believes that every instant he needs the forgiveness of the gracious God. Therefore he believes that God walked upon earth in lowliness, and thus pronounced all earthly power and might to be nothing. He believes that as no one enters into the kingdom of heaven except by becoming again as a little child, so no one comes to Christ except as a lowly man, as one who by himself and with all that he is by himself is nothing. He believes that even if Christ had not chosen lowly men for His disciples, but men of high station, these must first have become lowly men in order to be His disciples. He believes that before Christ there is no respect of persons, because before Christ there is only lowliness; that as certainly as no hale man can be healed by Christ, just so certainly can no superior man be saved as such, but only as a lowly man. For no one can become or be a Christian except in the character of, or as, a lowly man.

'But then in fact the Christian of high rank is essentially just as lowly as the lowly Christian?' Yes, certainly, that he is. 'But then essentially the Christian of high rank really doesn't know how superior he is?' No, essentially he doesn't know that. 'But then really the discourse has deceived the reader by not talking of earthly highness, of titles, dignities, and of their anxiety!' Well, yes — and yet no, the discourse has not deceived, for the Christian of high rank has not this anxiety — and this is precisely what the discourse is about, that he has not this anxiety. And what discourse is it which most truly expresses this; is it one which protests and protests that he has not this anxiety, or is it one which, by talking of that which properly engages the mind of the Christian of rank, namely, lowliness, lets it tacitly be understood that he has not that anxiety of highness?

One can become or be a Christian only as, or in the character of, a lowly man. The thing of becoming (and so also of being) a Christian is surely a thought, but it is a duplex thought, which consequently has duplex vision. It is therefore one and the same thought which permits the lowly Christian to understand his highness and the Christian of high rank to understand his lowliness. The Christian of rank and position lets the conception (the Christian conception) take from him the power and highness (of the earthly sort), or, in other words, he abandons himself to the power of the conception; therewith he becomes the lowly man which one must be in order to become and to be a Christian. In case an actor were to go out in the street and be a king because he played the part of a king the night before, everybody would laugh at him. In case a child who in a game with children of his own age was ‘the Emperor’ were to approach his elders with the same presumption, we should all laugh at the child. And why? Because the play and the children’s game are unreality. But the thing of being in reality of superior rank is not, Christianly understood, reality; the real is the eternal, the Christian. The true highness is the Christian highness; but in true Christian highness no one is higher than the others. So this thing of rank is unreality in comparison with the true highness. And so, Christianly, it is quite right that the superior Christian himself (for that others should do so has no place nor justification in Christianity, but only in the disgusting impudence of ungodly worldliness) should smile at his earthly highness, at his so-called real highness; for only the Christian highness is the real.

Yet if such is the case, has it not been more difficult for the man of high station to become a Christian (for here we are talking of the Christian of high station) than for the lowly man? To this question the Scripture answers, Yes. It is commonly thought, I know, that it must be equally easy and equally difficult for the lowly man and for the lofty to become a Christian, for it is said that the lowliness here in question is not the outward but the inward thing, a sense of one’s own lowliness, which the man of high station can have just as well as the lowly man; Christianity is far too spiritual a thing to talk about outward lowliness. Well, that is true in a way. However, the Scripture does nevertheless (perhaps as a precaution and with knowledge of the human heart) talk also in another fashion, it talks of being literally a lowly man; and so also does the Pattern, witnessing more potently than any words or phrases, for ‘He’ lived in actual earthly lowliness; accordingly, in resolving to be the Pattern, he did not choose to be a man of rank and yet inwardly the lowly man. No, He was literally the lowly man, and that in a much more serious sense than when a king lays aside momentarily his dignity — and is recognized by the courtiers and then still more applauded... for his humility.

There is something in the spiritual life which corresponds to what spelling is in contrast to continuous reading. One spells, one advances slowly, distinguishing clearly and evidently between details, for fear of finally reducing the whole content of life to ‘resolved moments’ and life itself to much ado about nothing. So it is with the possession of external superiority in connexion with becoming a Christian. Christianity has never taught that to be literally a lowly man is synonymous with being a Christian, nor that from the literal condition of lowliness there is direct transition as a matter of course to becoming a Christian; neither has it taught that if the man of worldly position were to give up all his power, he therefore would be a Christian. But from literal lowliness to the point of becoming a Christian there is however only one step. The position of being literally a lowly man is by no means an unfavourable preparation for becoming a Christian; the position of being in possession of the advantages of outward circumstance is a circuitous path, which for the more scrupulous makes necessary a double preparation. In mathematical science one speaks of a ‘help-line’ and draws the helpline as it is called; the proof of the proposition can be inferred without the help-line, but one draws it — not for the sake of the proof, but to help oneself; it is not the proof which stands in need of the help-line, but we ourselves. So likewise one who has the advantages of outward circumstance helps himself by becoming literally poor, despised and lowly. If he does not do this he must with all the more inward concern watch over himself, wondering if he dare trust himself, and if he knows in his own heart that nothing of all this outward rank and highness has so blinded him that he could not easily endure to be the lowly man of the people.

In this way, undeniably, the thing can be done. Christianity has never required unconditionally of any one that he should literally give up the advantages of outward circumstance, it has proposed to men rather a little precautionary rule. If one thinks one does not need it, as they thought they did in those ages when they scrupulously spelled their way — oh, what a strenuous life, to stand there on high, surrounded by all this seduction, and to be sure of oneself that one could easily endure to be the simple labouring man, because to be a Christian is of such great importance to one that with the strictest self-examination one has convinced oneself naturally that there is nothing whatever in all this which infatuates him in the least degree! What prodigious precaution with fire and light one must take if one lives, in a powder magazine; and what strenuous precautions if one would be a Christian in this environment! Oh, what a difficult life it is to live thus! Thou wilt have only a slight hint of the daily difficulty of this life if thou wilt consider how much easier it proved in the foregoing discourse to advance from lowliness and attain the Christian highness, than it is here from earthly highness, through lowliness, to attain the Christian highness. Yet the Christian of high position lives thus. He has power and honour and public esteem, is in possession of earthly advantages, but he is as one who has not; he sees all this around him, sees how as in an enchantment it only awaits his bidding, only the expression of his wish, but he is as one that sees it not, being under the spell of a still greater enchantment; he hears all this, with its almost constant flattery perhaps, but his ears are closed — for him all this is merely like being the king in a play, and like the child who in his game is ‘the Emperor’ — for he is a Christian.

And as a Christian he is in real highness. For, in the Christian understanding of it, in God's kingdom it is precisely as under the blue sky: there all are on high, but without being higher than anybody else. The bird is on high without being higher than anybody; the Christian of high station, although in earthly highness exalted above others, is on high without being higher than anybody else. Hence he is without the anxiety of highness; for, as has been said, in this way it is possible for one to be a Christian. And when in this way one is on high, if one is not a bird, or if one is a man and yet like a bird, then one is a Christian — it makes no difference if by the by he is in a worldly sense high or low.

The heathen in high place on the other hand has this anxiety. The heathen in high place is without God in the world; if the Christian of high station is in ignorance of his earthly highness, the heathen is ignorant of what true highness is. He knows no other highness than this earthly sort — and to learn to know truly what highness is, is impossible, since he is in himself untruth, vapour, vain imagination, from which no cognition of truth can issue, except that this is what it is. He knows from the bottom up all about high, higher, highest, allerhöchste, but he does not know that at the bottom of all this lies nothing, and that therefore all that he knows is nothing. In this nothingness he has his place. What this is he defines by means of definitions which belong within nothingness. One describes a nightmare as a 'ghost-ride' — the sleeper groans and pants, but he does not budge from the spot. So it is with the heathen man in high station. Now he mounts on high, now he sinks, he exults, he sighs, he pants, he groans, but he does not budge from the spot; now there is another who mounts above him, now one who plunges down from on high — yet nothing, nothing whatsoever, not even this last, can awaken him from sleep, disabuse him of his vain imagination, open his eyes to perceive that the whole thing is nothing. But might this really be nothing? Is there need of any better proof that it is not nothing than merely to look at him, how he struggles and fights and craves and aspires, and never grants himself an instant of repose, how many he holds venally in his service, with how many he keeps on good terms that they may be helpful to him in grasping what he aspires after? Might this nevertheless be nothing, might 'nothing' be able to set things thus in motion? Why, then that busy man also must have been in the wrong when he argues that he had a great deal of business from the fact that he keeps five clerks and himself has no time to eat or drink.

Thus it is the heathen of high estate lives in highness. That there are many beneath him he knows full well; but what he does not know is beneath him, that nevertheless is beneath him — the abyss. For, as has been remarked, when one in highness is above others, or is higher than others, one has also the abyss beneath one, and in earthly highness it is only thus one can be on high. And the heathen of high station, who knows nothing else and has nothing else to think about but his earthly highness, has therefore not present to him the knowledge of the true highness which might keep him suspended aloft in ignorance of the earthly highness. No, he has the abyss beneath him, and from this the anxiety arises, or he sinks into the anxiety.

And what is the anxiety? A longing to become more and more... nothing, for it all indeed is nothing; a longing to rise higher and higher in highness, that is, to sink deeper and deeper into the anxiety of the abyss — for what is the anxiety of earthly highness but anxiety of the abyss? And what is this anxiety? The anxiety is lest any one by guile, by might, by lies, or by the truth, might take this vain imagination from him. Hence he secures himself in every way, since he descries danger everywhere, plots everywhere, envy everywhere, ghosts everywhere — naturally enough, for not in the darkest night is there so much that can afright the imagination of even a nervous person, as there are terrors in a vain imagination.

In the end the anxiety devours its prey. As pithless stumps of rotten trees shine in the darkness, as the will-o'-the-wisp glimmers in dank mists, so is he existent for others in the glimmering light of this earthly highness of his. But his self is nonexistent, his inmost being has become pithless and corroded in the service of nothingness; the thrall of vanity, having no command of himself, in the power of giddy worldliness, godforsaken, he ceases to be a man, in his most inward being he is as dead, but his highness walks ghostlike among us — it lives. It is not with a man thou art talking when thou talkest with him; in his hankering after highness he had become the thing he aspired to — he is a title. Within there is mere emptiness and vanity, yea, there is nothing; but the appearance is there, the vain appearance which wears the distinctive insignia of worldly highness, which the passers-by point out with deference — whereas he bears all this business rather as at his burial the cushions bear the medals and decorations. Oh, it may be dreadful to see a man who is almost unrecognizable in his humbleness and wretchedness, to see such wretchedness that one can hardly distinguish a man; but to see meaningless highness and to perceive that there is no man there, is horrible. It may be dreadful to see a man going about like a shadow of his former highness; but to see worldly highness and within it hardly the shadow of a man, is horrible. Him death does not have to bring to nothing; he does not need to be buried; while he lives one already can say, as is often said at the grave, 'Behold what earthly highness is!'

Let us then in conclusion think of the bird, which had its place in the Gospel and should have a place in the discourse. The bird is on high without the anxiety of highness; the Christian of high station, who in earthly highness is exalted above others, is on high without the anxiety of highness; the heathen of high station belongs with his anxiety to the abyss, he is not really on high but in the abyss. The bird is on high, the Christian of high station is on high, the heathen of high station is in the abyss. The bird's highness is a symbol of the Christian's highness, which in turn is a counterpart of the bird's highness, the one corresponding to the other with perfect understanding, though with endless difference; thou canst understand the bird's highness by understanding that of the Christian, and by understanding the bird's thou canst understand the Christian's; the highness of the heathen is nowhere at home, either in heaven or on earth. The highness of the bird is a shadow, that of the Christian reality, that of the heathen nothingness. The bird has air within it, hence it holds itself aloft; the heathen of high station has emptiness within him, hence his highness is imaginary; the Christian of high station has faith within him, hence he soars above the abyss of earthly highness. The Christian in his highness never forgets the bird, which to him is more than the nautical signal is to the mariner, it is the teacher, and yet, alas, it is in turn a teacher whom the disciple left far behind him as it called out, 'Remember me when thou comest into thy highness'; the heathen of high station never saw the bird. The bird is on high, and yet really is only on the way to highness, and if it could understand this, it must sink; the Christian understands this, and precisely by this understanding attains to highness. There is, however, according to the teaching of Christianity, only one highness, that of being a Christian; and one abyss, heathenism; to that height no bird ever attained, nor ever flew over this abyss. Over this abyss no bird can fly, it must perish on the way; that height no bird can attain, it is only on the way. Thus the bird is happy in its highness, ignorant of the abyss, but also ignorant of blessedness; the Christian is blessed in his highness; the proud heathen is haplessly lost in the abyss.

V. THE ANXIETY OF PRESUMPTION

No one can add a cubit unto his stature — after all such things do the heathen seek.

THIS ANXIETY THE lily and the bird have not; for neither the lily nor the bird is presumptuous. It is not the same with presumptuousness as it was with poverty and abundance, with lowliness and highness. In the former case (to mention only a single instance) poverty was assumed, and the task was to be poor without the anxiety of poverty. But it is not so here, as though it were assumed that a person must be presumptuous, and the task were to be presumptuous without the anxiety of presumption. No, here no situation is posited, the task is, not to be presumptuous; and this is the only way to be without the anxiety of presumption. For poverty and abundance, lowliness and highness, are things in themselves indifferent, innocent things, not what one is entirely responsible for having or for being. Hence the discourse begins with the anxiety, it does not inveigh against poverty or abundance, against lowliness or highness, but against the anxiety. With presumption it is different; no one ever turned out to be presumptuous without being responsible for it, hence the address aims precisely at that, and not so much at the anxiety of presumption. Indeed, if it were possible to accomplish the impossible and remove the anxiety without removing the presumption, the discourse would by no means desire it; hence the anxiety is to be regarded precisely as a curse upon presumptuousness.

The lily and the bird, however, have not this anxiety. Though an individual lily with erect stem shoots up almost to a man's height — it does not crave to add either a cubit or an inch unto its stature, it does not crave anything more; neither is there any presumption in the height it reaches in comparison with other lilies which likewise do not crave this distinction — that indeed would be presumption. That the golden sparrow wears all its finery, whereas the grey sparrow is poorly clad, implies no presumption on the part of the golden sparrow; the grey sparrow does not crave it — that indeed would be presumption. And when the bird casts itself down from the dizzy height, there is in that no presumption, nor is it tempting God — there is One that bears it up more securely than if all angels were bearing it up lest it dash its foot against a stone. And even though the bird sees so distinctly that it sees the grass grow, there is no presumption in that, it does not with its sharp sight pry into forbidden knowledge; nor when it sees clearly in the darkness of the night, for it employs no unlawful means. And though the bird is ignorant of God, there is no presumption in that; for it is innocently ignorant, not spiritlessly ignorant.

So then, neither the bird nor the lily is guilty of any presumption, and therefore self-evidently they are without the anxiety of presumption. How does this come about? It comes from the fact that the bird and the lily constantly will as God wills and constantly do as God wills. Because the bird constantly wills as God wills, therefore it enjoys without anxiety all its freedom. And so, when it is flying in the air at its best, and gets a notion that it would like to sit down, down it sits on a branch, and this (yes, here comes the strange part) — this is precisely what God would have it do. And then when one morning it wakes and makes up its mind, 'Today thou must travel,' it accordingly travels many, many hundreds of miles, and (yes, here comes the strange part) — this is precisely what God would have it do. Heavy as the stork is, it travels the long road thither and the long road back, it never takes it differently than precisely as it does now; it knows no other road than precisely this one on which it travels now; it takes no observations of the road for the sake of the next journey, no note of time for the sake of the next journey; it engages in no deliberation before, and in none afterwards. But then, when one morning it wakes, that same morning it journeys, and this then was precisely what God would have it do. A man usually needs long deliberation and preparation for a journey, and yet perhaps rarely has any one ever undertaken a journey with such assurance that it is God's will, as the bird when it journeys. Good luck to thee then, thou hasty traveller, if thou hast any need of our good wishes! Men have envied thee, they have envied thine easy conveyance through the air — if I were to envy thee, I should envy the sureness with which thou dost always do so precisely that which is God's will for thee! With regard to subsistence, it is true that thou hast it only from hand to mouth; ah, but then again thou hast a still shorter way from thought to execution, from resolution to the decisive act! Hence thine inexplicable sureness! Thou art happily hindered from being able to be presumptuous. — Because the lily constantly wills as God wills and constantly does as God wills, therefore it enjoys its happy existence without anxiety, being beautiful without the knowledge which desecrates beauty. And then when it thinks it has been standing long enough looking like a dunce, it one day throws off all its outer garments and stands forth in all its beauty, and this (yes, here comes the strange part) — this is precisely what God would have it do. It never occurs to the lily to wish to wear its finery at any other season or day than precisely when God wills. — And because it is thus with the lily and the bird, it is as if God, were He to speak about them, would say, 'After all, the lilies and the birds are the children in whom I have most joy, they are the easiest to bring up, they are thoroughly good natured and never naughty; they constantly will what I will and constantly do what I will; in them I have nothing but pleasure.' And He has no need to add, as parents commonly do, 'I hope it will continue thus.'

But how then are the lilies and the birds teachers? This surely is easy to perceive. It is perfectly certain that neither the lilies nor the birds permit themselves the least act of presumption — so be thou like the lilies and the birds. For in their relationship to God the lilies and the birds are like a child in its tender years when it still is practically one with the mother. But when the child has become bigger, although it is in the house of its parents, as close to them as can be, never out of their sight, there is nevertheless an endless distance between it and the parents, and in this distance lies the possibility of being able to be presumptuous. Though the mother grasps the child, though she folds it in her arms in order by her closeness to insure it completely against every danger, nevertheless, in the possibility of being able to be presumptuous, it is endlessly far away from her. It is an immense distance, an immense remoteness. For surely he too lives remote who lives in the old familiar place but remote from his only wish — so also the child, although in the home of its parents, is remote by reason of this possibility of being able to act presumptuously.

And so also the man, in the possibility of being able to act presumptuously, is endlessly remote from God, in whom nevertheless he lives and moves and has his being. But if again he comes, from this remoteness and in this remoteness, anything like so near as the bird and the lily, then he has become a Christian.

The Christian has not this anxiety. Yet what is presumptuousness? — for it is about this we are talking, about not being presumptuous. What presumptuousness is, that is to say, what the particular expressions of it are, we shall learn to recognize better when we are speaking about the heathen, who have in fact this anxiety. But here we have to know provisionally what presumptuousness is in order to see that the Christian is not presumptuous, or that precisely by never being presumptuous in the least degree he is a Christian. Presumption essentially has to do with a man's relationship to God, and hence it is indifferent whether a man is presumptuous in the smallest matter or in the greatest, for even the least presumption is the greatest, being against God. Presumption is essentially against God, and from this is derived the secondary but correct use of the word when we say that a child acts presumptuously towards the parents, a subject towards the king, a pupil towards the teacher. Between God and man there is the everlasting and essential difference of eternity; and when this distinction is in any way encroached upon, we have presumption. Presumption therefore is either, in a forbidden, in a rebellious, in an ungodly way, to want to have God's help, or in a forbidden, in a rebellious, in an ungodly way, to want to dispense with God's help.

Therefore, first and foremost, it is presumptuous to be spiritlessly ignorant of how much a man needs God's help every instant, and that without God he is nothing. So perhaps it is that many men are living, lost in worldliness and sensuality. They think they understand life and themselves, and yet they have left out God entirely; but they are only too self-assured, they are just like the others — they are in fact, if one may say so, false reprints; for every man as he comes from God's hand is an original edition. If then one were to reproach them for acting presumptuously towards God, they would surely reply, 'That really is a thing that never occurred to us.' But precisely this is the presumption, that it never occurred to them... to think of God; or if once in their youth they had been required to think of the Creator, this then is the presumption, that they have subsequently forgotten Him entirely — worse than the beast, for the beast has nothing to forget.

But the Christian knows that a sense of the need of God is man's perfection. Thus the Christian is once for all aware of God and is saved from the presumption which might be called ungodly unawareness. The Christian is not aware of God once in a while during his life, on the occasion of great events and such like; no, with daily attentiveness he is aware that he cannot do without God for an instant. Thus the Christian is awake, as neither the innocent bird is, nor the man who is spiritlessly ignorant; he is awake, awakened to God. The Christian is awake, and he is incessantly awake to God's will, he craves only to be satisfied with God's grace, he does not ask that he may help himself, but prays for God's grace, nor does he ask that God should help him otherwise than as God wills, he prays only to be satisfied with God's grace. The Christian has no self-will, he surrenders unconditionally. But again in relation to God's grace he has no self-will, he is satisfied with God's grace. He accepts everything by God's grace... even the grace itself; he understands that he cannot do without God's grace even in praying for His grace. So weakened is the Christian in respect to self-will that in relation to God's grace he is weaker than is the bird in relation to instinct which holds it entirely in its power, is weaker than the bird is strong in relation to instinct, which is its power.

But then at bottom the Christian is farther from presumption towards God than the bird is? Yes, that he is too, in spite of the fact that in the possibility of being able to act presumptuously he was infinitely nearer to it than the bird. But to this end the Christian must learn slowly, as the bird is under no necessity of doing, since it finds it easy enough only to will as God wills. The Christian must learn to be satisfied with God's grace, to which end sometimes an angel of Satan may be necessary to smite him upon the mouth lest he exalt himself. For first he must learn to be satisfied with God's grace; but when he is in the course of learning this there comes the last difficulty. Namely, the discovery that to be satisfied with God's grace, which at first sight appears so poor and humiliating a thing, is in reality the highest and most blessed thing — is there in fact any higher good than God's grace? Hence he must learn not to exalt himself, not to be presumptuous... at being satisfied with God's grace.

So the Christian, being schooled thus from the ground up, is far more remote from presumption towards God than the bird is — how might it be possible to be presumptuous towards Him whose will is grace? But only the Christian knows that God's will is grace, the bird knows at the most that its will is His will. The Christian is far more remote from presumption, and precisely for this cause far nearer to God than the bird is. That there is a God in heaven without whose will no sparrow falls to the ground, concerns also the sparrow; but that there is a gracious God in heaven concerns only the Christian. The bird keeps close to God by willing as He wills; but the Christian keeps still closer to Him by keeping hold of His grace — just as the older but obedient child who desires to please his parents has in a more heartfelt sense the love of the parents and an existence for them than has the tender babe which is one with the mother. The bird with its need is as close as it can be, it can by no means do without Him; the Christian needs Him even more, he knows that he cannot do without Him; the Christian is still closer, he cannot do without... His grace. God encompasses the bird on every side, but holds Himself back; for the Christian He opens Himself, and His grace encompasses the Christian on every side who in nothing is presumptuous, who desires nothing but His grace and never desires anything but His grace. Thus God's grace encompasses the Christian blessedly and closely, and keeps far from him the least expression of presumption. 'His grace prevents the Christian' (Ps. lix. 10), so that he may will to be satisfied with God's grace, and follows him, so that he may not have willed in vain, and that in his bliss he may never regret that he was satisfied with God's grace.

The heathen on the contrary has this anxiety; for in reality the heathen is presumptuous and rebellious against God.

First and foremost we mention the presumption of spiritlessness in being ignorant of God, a presumption which strictly speaking only occurs in Christendom. It is quite possible that such a heathen, lost in worldliness and sensuality, supposes that he is without anxieties, especially the many useless anxieties with which the God-fearing man plagues himself. But this is not true. It may well be true that he is without these anxieties with which the God-fearing man plagues himself, and that this is an advantage to him both in this life and in that which is to come; but it is not true that the heathen in his torpid security is without anxiety. On the contrary, he precisely is under the dominion of anguishing dread, dreading to live — and dreading to die. Whenever some event or the expectation of it wrenches him out of his brute-transformation, dread which dwells deeply within him awakens and casts him into despair, in which essentially he was.

So presumption is dull ignorance of God. To such a heathen aptly applies what is related in the parable about the husbandmen who appropriated the vineyard and behaved as if the owner were not in existence; and in so far as he is instructed in Christianity, that also applies to him where it is related that they said, 'Let us kill the son, and then the vineyard will be ours.' The life of every man is God's property, man is His bondservant. To kill God, however, is what man cannot do, what he can do is to kill the thought of Him, as they say, and the man who is dully unconscious of God has at one time been conscious of Him, and so, as one says with special emphasis, he has got rid of this thought, slain it. So when one has succeeded in killing the thought of God, suppressing every feeling and mood which as His messenger would remind man of Him, one lives on as if one were one's own master, were the artificer of his own fortune, whether he be one who actually has to provide for himself, or one to whom everything comes as his due — thus cheating God of His due. Is not this also a way of desiring to add a cubit unto one's stature — by getting the proprietor killed, or the thought of him, so as to become oneself the master instead of the bondservant? In dull ignorance of God and in vain knowledge of the world the heathen thus sinks below the beast. To murder God is the most horrible form of suicide, entirely to forget God is man's deepest fall, no beast ever fell so deep as that.

The other form of presumption is that which in a forbidden, a rebellious, and ungodly way, would do without God. This is unbelief. Unbelief is not dull ignorance, unbelief would positively deny God, so in a way it has to deal with God.

It may well be that such a heathen declares that he is without anxiety. But it is not so, as in general it is indeed impossible to be presumptuous without having the anxiety of presumption. However he may harden himself, he vet carries in his inmost heart the token that God is the strongest, the token that he wills to have God against him. If the God-fearing man 'halts upon his thigh' after having striven with God, truly the unbeliever is inwardly annihilated. And, precisely, his anxiety is to add a cubit unto his stature; for it would be adding an immense cubit unto his stature if a man face to face with God were able to deny God, or if it might even be so that perhaps it is God who stands in need of man (as the wisdom of this age has understood it — if such a thing can be understood)... in order to understand Himself. But it is certain that no blessing goes with stolen goods and that no prescriptive right can be acquired over them, and so the presumptuous man has the anxiety, and has it every instant, that God may take everything from him. And if it is easy to labour when one has God for a helper, verily the hardest labour one can impose upon oneself is the labour of doing without God.

Hence the heathen is really under the dominion of dread; for really he never rightly knows under whose dominion he is — is not this a dreadful anguish? Although an unbeliever, he scarcely knows whether he is under the sway of incredulity or of credulity — and verily it is exceedingly difficult for another man to know this Forsaken of God whom he would deny, overwhelmed by God whom he would dispense with, he is without resource either in God or in himself (for in oneself one has no resource without God's concourse), under the domination of the power of evil, the domination of incredulity and credulity. In such wise no bird is tossed about even in the most terrible tempest.

Finally, this too is a form of presumption: in a forbidden, a rebellious, and ungodly way, to desire to have God's aid. This is superstition.

In this way the presumptuous heathen would senselessly add a cubit unto his stature, would senselessly will what he denies, in blind confidence would risk a foolhardy act and cast himself down from the pinnacle of the Temple — and what is more presumptuous still, he expects God to help him in it; abandoning himself more and more to this hapless game, he would by illicit means penetrate forbidden places, discover hidden things, behold the future, perhaps, like that Simon of whom the Scripture tells, he would purchase the Holy Ghost with money, or would make money by means of the Holy Ghost, he would be importunate with God, would importune His aid and assistance, he the uncalled would make himself what only God's call can make a man. For the unbeliever would presumptuously dispense with God, is unwilling to let himself be helped by God, and would presumptuously let God know it; but the superstitious man would have God serve him. What else does it mean but that, even though the superstitious man says that it is God's help he would have — when he arbitrarily will have it, what else is this but to will that God shall serve him? Truly that would be adding a cubit to one's stature if a man were to reach the point of being so extraordinary as to have God for a servant. But God will not be mocked. Where therefore is anxiety and dread and pallid fear and the apprehensive shudder more at home than in the mumbling realm of superstition? This dread no bird has known, not even the bird that is startled anxiously in alarm.

So it is with the presumptuous heathen. He does not will as God wills (like the bird); still less is he willing to be satisfied with God's grace (like the Christian); 'on him abideth the wrath of God'. If the bird has not God's grace, which only the Christian has, neither has it, verily, God's wrath, which only the heathen has. However far the bird flies it never loses its relation to God; but how far should the heathen have to fly! and fly as far as he may, he would fly in vain to escape God's wrath — fly as far as he may, unless he were fleeing to grace. And if there is to be retribution and anguish upon every soul of man that worketh evil, then first and foremost upon the presumptuous man. For as grace comes by God upon every man who approaches Him as a Christian, so anguish comes by itself upon every one who presumptuously departs from God or presumptuously approaches Him.

Let us in conclusion think of the bird, which had its place in the Gospel and should have a place in the discourse. Let there be joy upon earth over the lilies and the birds which will as God wills and do as God wills; in heaven there is joy over the Christian who is satisfied with God's grace; but there is anguish both here and hereafter upon the heathen who is presumptuous. The nearer the bird is to the Christian, so much farther than the bird is the heathen from God. The greatest distance, greater than that of the farthest star from the earth, greater than human art can depict, is the distance from God's grace to God's wrath, from the Christian to the heathen, from being saved in bliss by God's grace to 'eternal destruction from the face of the Lord', from looking to God... to seeing from the abyss that one has lost God. It would be a meaningless jest were one seriously to make use of the situation of the bird in order to depict that distance. Solely in comparison with the bird can the Christian use this situation as a landmark, but if the distance is Christian — heathen, the bird serves to determine nothing; for here it is not poverty and abundance that is in question, nor lowliness and highness, but presumption.

VI. THE ANXIETY OF SELF-TORMENT

BE NOT THEREFORE anxious for the morrow — after all such things do the heathen seek.

THIS anxiety the bird has not. From whatever height the bird surveyed the whole world, and whatever it saw, it never saw 'the next day'; whatever it saw on its long journeys, it never saw 'the next day'. And though we say of the lily, 'it today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven' — oh, this noble and simple sage, the lily, is as one whom this does not concern, however much and however closely it concerns it; it is solely preoccupied with that which after all concerns it more closely, that it is today! However many days the bird saw dawn and come to a close, it never saw 'the next day'. For the bird sees no apparitions — but the next day is to be seen only 'in the spirit'; and the bird is not troubled by dreams — but the next day is a persistent dream which constantly returns; and the bird is never disquieted — but the next day is the disquietude of every day. And when the bird makes the long flight to the distant clime, it is the very bird which arrived that same day at its destination, the self-same day it departed from home. One travels so swiftly by railway that one arrives at a distant place the same day; but the bird is nimbler and swifter, it travels for many, many days and arrives the same day. By railway one cannot travel so quickly as that if one is to travel equally far. No, there is none can make time fly so swiftly as the bird, and none that in so short a time can get so far as the bird. There is no yesterday and no tomorrow for the bird, it lives but one day, and the lily blooms but one day.

Consequently the bird has no anxiety for the next day. But anxiety for the next day is precisely what self-torment is, and hence the bird is without the anxiety of self-torment. For what is self-torment? It is the worry which today (having enough worry of its own) does not have. And what is it to be a self-tormentor? It is to cause oneself this worry? For the bird also has worry the one day it lives, the day may have for it too enough worry of its own; but the worry of the next day the bird does not have — because it lives but one day, which we might express also in another way, by saying that it has no self. Worry and today are in correspondence with one another; self-torment and the next day are also a pair.

But how then is the bird a teacher? Quite simply. That the bird has no next day is sure enough — so then, be thou like the bird, get rid of the next day, and thus thou art without the anxiety of self-torment; and this must be practicable, precisely for the reason that the next day is derived from the self. On the other hand, if we let today disappear almost entirely in comparison with the next day's worry, we are deepest in self-torment. The whole difference is that of only one day — and yet what an immense difference! It is easy enough for the bird to be quit of the next — but to become quit of it! Oh, of all the enemies which assail a man by might or by cunning, none perhaps is so obstinately intrusive as this next day, which always is the same next day. It is said that to conquer one's spirit is greater than to take a city; but if one is to conquer his spirit, he must begin by becoming quit of the next day. The next day — it is like a goblin which is able to assume every form, it looks so exceedingly different, but for all that it is... the next day.

The Christian has not this anxiety. Anxiety for the next day is commonly associated with anxiety for subsistence. This is a very superficial view. All earthly and worldly anxiety is at bottom anxiety for the next day. Earthly and worldly anxiety is rendered possible by the fact that man, compounded of the temporal and the eternal, became a self; but in becoming a self the next day became existent for him. And here it is fundamentally that the battle is fought. Ah, worldly and earthly anxiety! — at the mere mention of that word what an immense miscellany is suggested, what a motley crowd of passions, what a mixture of opposites! And yet it is all only one battle, the battle with the next day. And the next day — a little hamlet as it were, which yet became famous and remains so; for it was and is at this point that the greatest battle is fought and the most decisive, here the decision is made between time and eternity. The next day — it is the grappling-hook by which the prodigious hulk of anxiety gets a hold upon 'the individual's' light craft. If it succeeds, then he is under the domination of that power. The next day is the first link of the chain which fetters a man in a gang with thousands to that superfluous anxiety which is of the evil one. The next day — it is strange indeed, for ordinarily when one is sentenced for life the sentence reads, 'for life', but he who sentences himself to anxiety 'for the next day', sentences himself for life. Behold therefore if in heaven there might not be found salvation from the next day, for on earth it is not to be found; not even by dying the next day dost thou avoid it, for it was until that day thou didst live. But if for thee there is no next day, then all earthly anxiety is annihilated — and not only the anxiety about subsistence, for everything earthly and worldly is desirable only for the sake of the next day... and is uncertain by reason of the next day; the next day it loses its enchantment and its anxious uncertainty. And if for thee there is no next day, thou art either a dying man, or one who by dying to the temporal hast grasped the eternal, either one who really is dying or one who really lives.

The Gospel says that 'every day has enough worries of its own'. But is this a gospel? It seems rather as if it were from a book of lamentations, in fact it makes the whole of life sheer worry, or admits that it is such, if every day has worry enough. One would think indeed that the Gospel must proclaim that every day was free from worry, or that there were individual unlucky days. Nevertheless it is a gospel, and verily it does not strain out a gnat to swallow a camel; for it is levelled against the monster of self-torment, and it assumes that with the daily worries a man can manage to get along. It says therefore in effect, every day shall have its worries. It is true, this word does not stand in the Gospel; but this stands there: 'for the morrow shall be anxious for itself'; but if it shall be anxious for itself, thou shalt be without anxiety for it and let it take care of itself. So, as far as worry is concerned, thou shalt have enough in that which each day has, since thou shalt let the next day take care of itself. Is not this so? When the teacher says to the pupil, 'Thou shalt leave thy neighbour in peace. Let him take care of himself,' he says in effect, 'Thou hast enough to do to look after thyself, and this shall be enough for thee.' Every day shall have its worry, that is to say, take care to be free from the next day's worry, accept tranquilly and gratefully the worry of today, thou dost get off easily with that... by becoming free from the next day's worry. Be thou therefore content, have godliness with contentment; for every day has enough of its own worries. In this respect also God provides: He measures out the amount of worry which is enough for every day, so take no more than what is measured out, which is exactly enough; to be anxious for the next day is covetousness.

The most important thing in life is to be in the correct position, to assume the correct position. This the Christian assumes in relation to the next day; for to him it is non-existent. — It is well known that in front of the actor, blinded as he is by the footlights, there is the deepest darkness, the blackest night. One might think that this would discompose him, render him uneasy. But no, ask him, and thou shalt hear him admit that this is precisely what gives him support, makes him calm, keeps him in the enchantment of deception. On the other hand, it would discompose him if he could see any single individual, catch a glimpse of an auditor. So it is with the next day. One sometimes complains and finds it tragic that the future is so dark before one. Ah, the misfortune is just this, that it is not dark enough when fear and presentiment and expectation and earthly impatience glimpse the next day! One who rows a boat turns his back to the goal towards which he labours. So it is with the next day. When by the help of eternity a man lives absorbed in today, he turns his back to the next day. The more he is eternally absorbed in today, the more decisively does he turn his back upon the next day, so that he does not see it at all. If he turns around, eternity is confused before his eyes, it becomes the next day. But if for the sake of labouring more effectually towards the goal (eternity) he turns his back, he does not see the next day at all, whereas by the help of eternity he sees quite clearly today and its task. But if a man is to labour effectually today, he must be in this position. It always involves delay and distraction to want to look impatiently every instant towards the goal, to see if one is coming a little nearer, and now a little nearer. No, be eternally and seriously resolved, then thou dost turn completely to the labour... and turn the back to the goal. Such is one's position in rowing a boat, but such is also the position when one believes. One might think that the believer would be very far from the eternal when he turns his back to it and lives today, while the glimpser stands and looks towards it. And yet it is the believer who is nearest the eternal, while the apocalyptic visionary is farthest from the eternal. Faith turns its back to the eternal in order precisely to have this with him today. But if a man turns, especially with earthly passion, towards the future, then he is farthest from the eternal, and then the next day becomes a prodigious confused figure such as fairy-tales describe. Just as those demons of whom we read in the Book of Genesis begat children by earthly women, so is the future the monstrous demon which of men's womanish imagination begets the next day.

But the Christian believes, therefore he is quit of the next day. The Christian assumes exactly the opposite position to that of the self-tormentors; for these forget today entirely by reason of their anxiety and preoccupation with the next day. The believer is present, and at the same time is, as this word also denotes in Latin, mighty. The self-tormentor is an absentee, and an enfeebled person. The wish is often heard in the world to be contemporary with one or another great event or great man, with the notion that contemporaneousness might develop a man and make him something great. Perhaps! But might it not be worth more than a wish to be contemporary with oneself? For how rare it is for a man to be contemporary with himself. Most men, in feeling, in imagination, in purpose, in resolution, in wish, in longing, in apocalyptic vision, in theatrical make-believe, are a hundred thousand miles in advance of themselves, or several human generations in advance of themselves. But the believer (being present) is in the highest sense contemporary with himself. And to be by the help of eternity entirely contemporary with oneself is at the same time the thing that most educates and develops, it is the 'great gain' of eternity. Therefore the Christian extols a saying of Sirach (xxx. 23), as one of the severest of the Church Fathers does, not as a rule of shrewdness but as an expression of godliness: 'Love thy soul, and comfort thy heart, and drive care far from thee.' Who indeed is so cruel as the selftormentor is towards himself! But all his pangs, all these cruelly invented and cruelly employed instruments of agonizing torture are comprised in this one word: the next day. And now for the cure of it! It is related that in a library in Spain there was found a book bearing this inscription on the cover: 'The Best Cure for Heretics'. One opened it, or rather tried to; and, lo, it was not a book, it was a case containing a scourge. If one were to write a book entitled 'The Best Cure for Self-Torment', it could be written briefly: 'Let every day have enough in its own worries.' Hence when the Christian works, or when he prays, he talks only of today: he prays for the daily bread 'today', for a blessing upon his work 'today', that he may avoid the snares of the evil one

‘today’, that he may come nearer to God’s kingdom ‘today’. For if a man who had become acquainted with this terror were to pray thus in the passion of his soul, ‘Save me, O God, from myself and from the next day’, he would not be praying Christianly, and the next day would already have acquired too much power over him. For the Christian prays, ‘Save me today from the evil.’ This is the surest salvation from the next day, with the understanding that one will pray thus every day; if for one day this is forgotten, the next day comes at once into view. But the Christian does not forget to pray every day, hence he saves himself throughout his life, faith saves his courage, his joy, his hope. The dreadful enemy is on hand the next day, but the Christian does not paint the devil on the wall, does not conjure up evil and temptation, he does not talk at all of the next day, but only of today, and of this he talks with God.

To live thus, to cram today with eternity and not with the next day, the Christian has learnt and continues to learn (for the Christian is always learning) from the Pattern. How did He manage to live without anxiety for the next day — He who from the first instant of His public life when He stepped forward as a teacher knew how His life would end, that the next day was His crucifixion, knew this while the people exultantly hailed Him as King (ah, bitter knowledge to have at precisely that moment!), knew when they were crying, ‘Hosanna!’, at His entry into Jerusalem that they would cry, ‘Crucify him!’, and that it was to this end He made His entry; He who bore every day the prodigious weight of this superhuman knowledge — how did He manage to live without anxiety for the next day? He who did not suffer as the man suffers upon whom hardships and adversity suddenly fall but who has before him every instant the possibility that everything nevertheless might be redressed — for He knew that it was inevitable; He who knew that with every new sacrifice He made in behalf of the truth He was hastening His persecution and destruction, so that He had control of

His fate, could ensure for Himself the splendour of royal power and the devout admiration of the race if He would let go of the truth, but knew also with even greater certainty that He would ensure His destruction, if (oh, eternally certain way to destruction!) He were in any respect to desert the truth — how did He manage to live without anxiety for the next day? — He who was not unacquainted with the suffering attendant upon this anxiety any more than with every other human suffering, He who in an access of pain uttered the sigh, that His hour was not yet come. In military language they talk of 'covering' the commander of an army, of covering him so that no one may fall upon him in the rear — how did He manage to cover Himself, while He was living today, from the enemy which would fall upon Him in the rear, namely, the next day? For just because, in quite a different way from any man, He had eternity with Him in the day that is called today, just for this reason He turned His back on the next day. How did He manage it? Far be it from us to endeavour to win human admiration by fathoming what is not to be fathomed; we do not believe that He came to this earth to propose to us themes for a learned investigation. But He came to this earth to prescribe the task, to leave behind Him a foot-print, so that we might learn from Him. We have therefore let the answer transpire in the question, have recalled how it was he managed to do what we should learn to do: He had Eternity with Him in the day that is called today, hence the next day had no power over Him, it had no existence for Him. It had no power over Him before it came, and when it came and was the day that is called today it had no other power over Him than that which was the Father's will, to which He had consented with eternal freedom, and to which He obediently bowed.

The heathen, on the other hand, has this anxiety; for heathenism is precisely self-torment. Instead of casting all his care upon God, the heathen has all the worries; he is without God, and hence he is the worried man, the self-tormentor. For since he is without God, it cannot in any sense be God that imposes worry upon him. The situation is not this: without God — no worry, with God — with worry; but it is this: with God — no worry, without God — with worry.

'Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die.' But then indeed the heathen is without anxiety for the next day, in fact he says himself that there is no next day! No — verily he does not deceive Christianity, neither does he succeed in deceiving himself. For just this sort of talk is vibrant with the dread of the next day, the day of annihilation, an anguishing dread which, although it is a shriek from the abyss, is madly meant to indicate joy. He is so much in dread of the next day that he casts himself into wild befuddlement in order to forget it... and to forget how much in dread he is. Is this what it means to be without anxiety for the next day? If there is anything this is 'without', it is without understanding, it means to be insane. And 'tomorrow' is thus the refrain of the day's joy, the verse regularly ends with, 'for tomorrow'. One speaks, it is true, of a joie de vivre which, because it has no next day, lives, so it is said, entirely for today. But this is a delusion, for this precisely is the way a man is rendered unable to live in the day that is called today, not to speak of living in it entirely. A man has the eternal within him, and therefore he cannot possibly be entirely in the purely momentary. The more effort he makes to do without the eternal, so much the farther he is from living in the day that is called today. Whether the heathen is to die tomorrow, we may leave undetermined, certain it is that he does not live today.

'But tomorrow!' For as the Christian constantly talks of today, so the heathen talks only of tomorrow. In reality it is of no consequence to him what today is; whether it be joyful or sorrowful, lucky or unlucky, he cannot reach the point of either enjoying it or employing it, for he cannot get away from the invisible writing on the wall: Tomorrow. Tomorrow I shall perhaps hunger, even if I did not today; tomorrow a thief will perhaps steal my riches, or a slanderer my honour, corruption my beauty, the envy of fate my good fortune — tomorrow, tomorrow! Today I stand upon the pinnacle of fortune — ah, recount to me while it is still today a misfortune — quickly, quickly! — else tomorrow everything will be lost irrevocably. What is dread? It is the next day. And why was the heathen most in dread when he was most fortunate? Because adversity and misfortune might have served in a way to quench the fire of his earthly anxiety. For earthly anxiety, as the begetter, brings forth dread, which in turn, as the nourisher, brings forth anxieties. For to bring embers to a flame a draught is necessary. But desire (the earthly) and uncertainty (the earthly) — these two currents — constitute precisely the draught which inflames the fire of passion in which dread lurks.

With whom is it then the heathen strives in dread? With himself, with an imagination; for the next day is an impotent nothing if thou dost not thyself give it thy strength. And in case thou dost give it all thy strength, then, like the heathen, thou dost get to know in a terrible way how strong thou art — for what a prodigious power this next day is! The next day, which the heathen with terror in his heart advances to meet, resisting like one who is dragged to the place of execution, vainly striving like one who from a wreck stretches out his arms in desperation to the land, inconsolable like one who from the land sees his whole fortune sink into the sea!

Thus it is the heathen consumes himself, or the next day consumes him. Alas, there a human soul went out, he lost his self. No one knows how it happened; there was no neediness, nor misfortune, nor adversity, no one beheld the terrible power which consumed the man, but he was consumed. Like a hapless spirit which found no repose in the grave, so he lives as a ghost, that is to say, he does not live. As one speaks of intemperately turning night into day, so he in despair would turn today into the next day. ‘He will not live till the next day’, we say of the sick man whom the physician has given up; but at least the sick man lives today. The self-tormentor, on the other hand, in a still more precise sense will not live till the next day, he is given up, since he gave up God, he does not even live today, in spite of being alive, and still less until tomorrow, for in order to live till tomorrow one must surely be alive today. Like the bird which flies to a painted landscape on the wall in order to perch upon one of the trees, and exhausts itself, perhaps kills itself by wanting to perch upon one of these trees — so the self-tormentor renders himself inanimate by wanting today to live the next day. Like the bird which grew weary on its way over the great ocean and sinks with a feeble flap of its wings to the sea, and now can neither live nor die — so it is with the self-tormentor, who grows weary on his way across the distance between today and the next day. To live is to be in existence today; when one is dead there is no longer a today. But the self-tormentor lives — only not today, he lives not till tomorrow, yet he lives day after day. Upon him the good Lord cannot shed light, for all remains equally dark about him and equally hopeless, whether he be living or dead, who neither lives nor dies, and yet lives... as in a hell.

Let us in conclusion think of the bird, which had its place in the Gospel and should have a place in the discourse. The bird arrives the same day at its far-off destination; the Christian is the same day, ‘this very day’, in heaven where his life is; the heathen never budges from the spot. The bird is an egoist in a good sense, reasonably loving itself, hence it is no self-tormentor; the Christian loves God, hence he is no self-tormentor; the heathen (which God forbid and does indeed forbid) hates himself, he is a self-tormentor. The bird lives only one day, so the next day does not exist for it; the Christian lives eternally, so the next day does not exist for him; the heathen never lives, is always by the next day prevented from living. The bird is exempt from all dread; benediction upon the Christian saves him from all dread; the anxiety of the heathen is his punishment: self-torment — no sin so punishes itself as self-torment.

VI. THE ANXIETY OF IRRESOLUTION, FICKLENESS AND DISCONSOLATENESS

NO MAN CAN serve two masters — after all such things do the heathen seek.

T*HAT anxiety the bird has not.* If the angels are God's messengers who obey His every behest, if He makes use of the winds as His angels — the bird and the lily are just as obedient, although God does not employ them as His messengers and it is as if He had no use for them. The lily and the bird have no occasion to become self-important in view of the use that is made of them, they feel humiliated, as though they were superfluous. Yet they are not less dear to God on this account, nor is it the lowliest fortune to be superfluous. In man's busy life it is no rare occurrence that precisely the unusually talented person is more or less superfluous because he is not apt to fit into any of all the situations to which the bustle of business would assign him, with which it would occupy him and employ him — and yet precisely his superfluousness does more to magnify the Creator's honour than does all the self-importance of bustle; just as Mary did Christ more honour by sitting at His feet than did the activity of busy Martha — thus the lilies and the birds are a superfluity of beauty and joy which God has lavished upon creation. But just because they are thus superfluous there is required of them also the most perfect obedience. True, all that is is of grace; but he who owes everything to grace in such a degree that he understands he is superfluous must be all the more obedient. True, all that exists is nothing in the hands of the Almighty who created it out of nothing; but that which by coming into existence attains nothing more than to be superfluous must understand most profoundly that it is nothing. When parents give an entertainment for their own children they expect joyful obedience, or the joy which is obedience; but when they give an entertainment for poor children, doing everything for them just as if they were their own children, they expect still more decisively the joy whose secret is unconditional obedience.

But precisely thus are the lilies and the birds situated, serving only one Master, without a thought of any other, and without a single thought which is not directed to Him, more obedient in His hand than the pliable plant in the hands of the gardener, more obedient to His every behest than the tamed dove to its master. Everything that is called bird and lily belongs to one Master, but every bird and every lily serves only this one Master.

Hence the bird is never irresolute. It is not a sign of irresolution that the bird flies hither and thither; exactly the opposite is the case, for it is perfectly certain that it is for joy; it is not the uncertain flight of irresoluteness, it is the light soaring flight of complete obedience. True, the bird is soon weary of its place of residence and flies far away, but this is not fickleness, it is exactly the opposite, it is the fixed and firm resolution of perfect obedience; rarely perhaps was any man's resolution so fixed and stood so firm. True, one sometimes sees the bird sitting dejectedly, it must have care and sorrow, but this is not disconsolateness, never is the obedient bird without consolation, and essentially its life is care-free, just because it serves only one master, and this is what is of most service both to bird and man, it serves to free them from sorrowing disconsolately.

How is it then that the birds and the lilies are teachers? Quite simply. The birds and the lilies serve only one Master, and, what is the same thing, they serve Him wholly — so be thou like the lilies and the birds, serve thou also only one Master, serve Him with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy strength, and so thou too art without anxiety. More noble than the birds and the lilies, thou art akin to that Master (the lilies and the birds are like the poor children), but none the less thou dost obediently serve the same Master, if like the lilies and the birds thou dost serve Him wholly.

The Christian has not this anxiety. ‘No man can serve two masters,’ or there is only one master whom a man can serve wholly. For in the choice between two masters it is not true that if only a man chooses one of the two and then serves him, no matter which, he is thus serving only one master. No, there is only One who in such wise is Master, is the Lord, that in serving Him one serves one master; and so it is clear enough that, if ‘there is one Lord’ only, one does not serve one master if one does not serve Him! It is not true therefore that one who has chosen to serve mammon wholly, serves only one master; against his will he is none the less in the service of the other master, in the Lord’s service. If a man chooses another master than God, he must hate God, for ‘either he will love the one and hate the other’, that is, if he loves the one he must hate the other; but however much he may hate God, he nevertheless does not escape His service, and so he is not serving one master after all. A man’s relationship to God in service is not the relationship of a man and his manservant who can run away from his service, and so far away that his former master cannot catch him, or may even take refuge in a relationship so altered that the former master must relinquish his claim upon him. No, a man who has chosen to serve another master than ‘the Master’, however desperate and determined his will may be, remains nevertheless in the service of two masters. And just this self-contradiction is his punishment, the contradiction of willing the impossible — for it is impossible to serve two masters. But only then is it possible to serve one master when one has chosen wholly to serve ‘the Master’ (the Lord). It looks almost like trying to impose upon one, it is almost as if the Gospel were disposed to behave with human high-handedness when it says: ‘One of the two thou must choose.’ Oh, but just here is the terrible seriousness of eternity in sticking to its position; for only the one canst thou choose in such a way that in serving Him thou dost serve only one master. Hence it is not true that he who comes to an agreement with himself to doubt serves only one master, doubt; for to doubt, as the origin of the word signifies, is to be in disagreement with oneself, to be divided between two. Neither is it true that one who (abhorrent as this may be) came to an agreement with himself to wish to be a villain serves only one master; for as there is no agreement in a den of robbers, so there is as little in the heart which is a den of robbers. But how might it be possible in disagreement to serve only one master?

The Christian serves only one Master; and he not merely serves Him but loves Him, he loves the Lord his God with all his heart and with all his strength. Just for this reason he serves Him wholly; for only love unites wholly, unites the most diverse parties in love, and in this instance unites man to God who is love. Love is the firmest of all bonds, for it makes the lover one with the beloved; more firmly no bond can bind, or so firmly can no bond bind. And the love which loves God is the bond of perfectness, which in perfect obedience makes man one with the God he loves. And the love which loves God is the most beneficial bond, which by keeping a man wholly in God's service saves him from anxieties. This love unifies a man, it makes him eternally in agreement with himself and with the Master who is one; and it unifies a man in likeness to God. Ah, blissful service, thus to serve God alone! Hence it sounds so solemn when we express it in one word, for this service is indeed 'divine service', the life of the Christian is nothing but divine service. The bird never attained such a height that one could call its life divine service, never did the bird become so perfect in obedience, although it was just as obedient.

But then in fact the Christian is even more obedient than the bird? Yes, that he is too. For the bird has no other will than God's will, but the Christian has another will which he constantly sacrifices in obedience to God — so much more obedient is he. A hard sacrifice, but well-pleasing to God, and hence so blissful! Ah, one speaks of so many various things which a man may love most dearly: a woman, his child, his father, his mother, his fatherland, his art, his science; but what every individual loves most, more than his only child, the child of promise, more than his only beloved on earth and in heaven — is his own will. Not for this shalt thou lay thy hand upon this child of thine — God is not cruel; nor forsake thy beloved — God is not hardhearted. There is something else, something far deeper within thee, for thine own salvation it is taken from thee, and yet to thine own hurt there is nothing thou holdest to so tightly, and nothing that holds so tightly to thee (for the child would more readily submit to being sacrificed, and the maiden to being sacrificed) — it is thine own will. See how promptly the bird is at hand to do God's will; but a long way off, in a certain sense, comes the Christian, who yet is more obedient than the bird! Which is the greater promptitude, his who stands at thy side and that very instant responds, or his who from afar off is yet that very instant on the spot? The bird comes as promptly as it can when God calls — all honour to it, this is a joy to behold; but the Christian comes with infinitely greater promptitude, for he comes just as promptly from... giving up his own will.

Hence the Christian also is free from anxiety, never irresolute — he is believing; never fickle — he is eternally resolved; never disconsolate — he is always joyful, always giving thanks. That obedience is the way to this end he has learnt and learns from Him who is the Way, from Him who Himself learned obedience and was obedient, obedient in all things, obedient in giving up all (the glory He had before the foundations of the earth were laid), obedience in doing without all (even that upon which He might lay His head), obedient in taking all upon Himself (the sin of the race), obedient in submitting to everything in life, obedient unto death.

Thus it is the Christian serves with perfect obedience only one Master. As the bird sings without ceasing to the glory of the Creator, such also is the Christian's life, or at least he understands and admits that it should be such; and already this understanding, this admission, ascribes honour to God. So the life of the Christian is a hymn in honour of the Lord, because this life obeys God more willingly and with more blissful accord than do the spheres. This life is a hymn of praise; for only by obedience can a man praise God, and best of all by perfect obedience. But the tone of this hymn is so lofty and so profoundly touching because humble and joyful obedience does not praise what a man understands but what he does not understand. And the instrument which accompanies this hymn is not that toy-trumpet of the human understanding, but it is the heavenly trombone of faith. The Christian's song of praise celebrates one thing, and celebrates that by obedience: that God does all, and that all God does is sheer grace and wisdom. And properly considered it is a kind of pertness and self-will, such as the Christian never could permit himself to display, when one thanks God somehow as a matter of course because that comes about which a man thinks he is able to understand as profitable or joyful. If such things are experienced by a Christian, he does to be sure give thanks, since he is always giving thanks; but precisely in this case he is doubtful, and dubious of himself, he beseeches God for forgiveness if he might be giving thanks too impetuously — too impetuously because, according to his childish notion, that which happened seemed to him profitable or joyful. For this properly is the hymn of praise, the paean, the song of songs: by joyful and unconditional obedience to praise God when one cannot understand Him. To praise Him upon the day when all goes against thee, when it becomes dark before thine eyes, when others perhaps could easily prove to thee that no God exists — then instead of assuming an air of importance by proving that there is a God, humbly to prove that thou dost believe that God exists, to prove it by joyful and unconditional obedience — that is the hymn of praise. The hymn is not something higher than obedience, but obedience is the only true hymn of praise; in obedience the hymn consists, and if the hymn is truth, it is obedience. With respect to a man, it is possible for thee to injure thyself by conforming to his will, though the injury is never great, seeing that there is a benediction upon sacrificing oneself for the sake of another. But might it also be possible that by obeying God's will I could in any wise injure myself — when His will is my only true good? But if this is not so, should not obedience always be joyful, might it hesitate a single instant to be joyful? It is in sooth solely and only my own good that is required of me.

All creatures praise God by obeying His behest; the life of the Christian praises Him by a still more perfect obedience, even when the Christian understands that he does not understand God. Why should the door be left open and the postern gate unguarded, by which irresolution or fickleness, not to speak of disconsolateness, might be able to sneak into the Christian soul? No, there is no fortress so secure as that of faith. Every other fortress — even if the enemy were to find no door open, no path built up the mountain, and no possibility of making it, nevertheless, by cutting it off entirely from all connexion with the surrounding world, from all supplies, he will be able at last to reduce it to starvation and compel it to surrender. But the more thou dost cut off faith from all supplies from the surrounding world (the supplies of irresolution, of fickleness, of disconsolateness — there is nothing else indeed corresponding to the supplies a fortress needs from the surrounding world), all the safer is the fortress; thou art at fault in thinking that in this way thou art attacking it, thou art fortifying it. It is only a splendid untruth to call a fortress a world in itself. But the fortress of faith is a world in itself; and it has power over life; and what it least needs — yea, alas, what is most injurious to it — is supplies of any sort from the surrounding world. Cut off faith from all connexion with the surrounding world, starve it out — just so much the more impregnable it becomes, just so much the richer is its life. And along with faith in the fortress dwells obedience.

The heathen, on the contrary, has this anxiety. For heathenism, precisely understood, is doubleness, the two wills, masterlessness, or, what is the same thing, thraldom. Heathenism is a kingdom which is divided against itself, a kingdom in constant rebellion, where the one tyrant succeeds the other, but where for all that there is never any master. Heathenism is a mind in rebellion; by the devil's help the devil of the moment is driven out, and there enter in seven others that are worse. Heathenism, in whatever various ways it may express itself, is in the last resort disobedience, the impotent, self-contradictory attempt to wish to serve two masters. But hence the punishment pronounced upon it: 'Woe unto the sinner that goeth two ways!' One can see this in a congregation where for many years there has been 'no priest', in spite of the fact that there have been many priests. So also it can be seen in the heathen, that there are many lords, or that there have been many lords, but no Lord ruled over this mind. There is one respect in which all heathen resemble one another, namely, disobedience to 'the Lord'; and there is one thing no heathen does, he does not serve one master. In all other ways he tries perhaps to serve one master, who yet is not master, or would wish to be without a master, or would wish to serve many masters — and the more he makes trial of all this, the more his last end becomes worse than his first.

His first is irresolution. So long as he is irresolute it appears as if there were no blame attached to it, as if the possibility of choosing the one master were still open to him, as if he were without anxiety and his irresoluteness were serious deliberation. Perhaps it is thought that the longer a man continues to deliberate, the more serious his resolution is. Perhaps... if it ever comes to that! And above all do not forget that there are certainly some cases where no deliberation is necessary. So it is in relation to a trifling decision; in that case a long deliberation would surely be a very suspicious sign. There are many such trifling decisions in life; but there still remains a something with regard to which it is a very suspicious sign to need long deliberation — that is God, or the choice of God. The trifle stands in no proportion to long deliberation; but God's sublimity is also in no proportion to long deliberation and hesitation. Long deliberation is in this case so far from being seriousness that it proves precisely the lack of seriousness, and proves this by showing itself to be irresolution. For it is very far from being true that the longer a man deliberates and deliberates, the nearer he comes to God; on the contrary, the truth is that the longer the deliberation becomes while the choice is postponed, the farther he removes himself from God. To choose God is certainly the most decisive and the highest choice; but 'alas' for him who needs long deliberation, and 'woe' unto him the longer he needs it. For it is precisely faith's impatient quickness of judgement, the infinite sense of need which will hear of nothing else, that is not merely nearest to the choice but best prepared to choose. He who was guilty of the ungodliness of wanting to propose quite calmly whether he shall now choose God or another master is certainly irresolute, and presumably to such a degree that he never gets out of it. What a strange thing — in the case of a poor family one speaks of their being ashamed of making both ends meet; but he who in irresolution became rich in deliberation has still greater difficulty in getting out of it. For God is not something one buys in the shop, nor like a property which one has shrewdly and cautiously examined for a long time, and after measuring and appraising it has finally convinced himself that it is worth buying. The ungodly calmness with which the irresolute man would begin in the case of God (for he would begin with doubt), precisely this is insubordination; for thereby God is deposed from the throne, from being the Lord. And when one has done this, one really has already chosen another master, wilfulness, and thus becomes the thrall of irresoluteness.

Then when irresoluteness has ruled long enough, fickleness (Luke xii. 29) assumes the government. For a long while it seemed perhaps as if irresoluteness concealed in itself the elasticity of choice, or its possibility. That is now consumed, if ever it was there, the soul of the heathen is unstrung, it becomes evident what irresoluteness really conceals in itself. In irresoluteness there still is a power of holding out against thoughts, irresolution still makes an effort to be master in the house and to put thoughts in their place. But now masterlessness over the thoughts, or the whim of the moment, has assumed the government, whim rules — even with respect to the question whether to choose God. As a momentary whim it appears then to the heathen that it would be a good thing to choose God, and then again something else as second, and after that a third. But these movements, which signify nothing, have no significance, leave behind no trace, except the increased sluggishness and enervation. As in the sluggishness of stagnant water a bubble slowly rises up and bursts emptily, so does fickleness bubble in the whim, and bubbles yet again.

And then when fickleness has ruled long enough, and of course like all ungodly rulers has sucked the blood and enfeebled the body, disconsolateness assumes the government. First the heathen desired to be entirely rid of the thought of God; he desires now to sink down in the inanity of worldliness, there to seek forgetfulness, forgetfulness of the most dangerous thought, because it is the most uplifting of all thoughts, the thought of being remembered by God, the thought of existing before God. For what indeed is more dangerous, if one will sink, than everything that would uplift one! Yet he has overcome, as he thinks, his pain, has dispelled all illusions, learned to console himself. Ah! Really! — yes, pretty much as when one deeply sunken, as a way of consoling himself (oh, dreadful disconsolateness!), says to a man by the sight of whom he is reminded of something higher, ‘Let me count for what I am.’ Then the light of the spirit goes out, a drowsy mist hangs before his eyes, he cares for nothing, but yet he wishes not to die, he is alive after a sort. Oh, what a horrible dissolution, worse than that of death, to rot while he is alive, without strength for even so much as to despair of himself and of his situation! But the light of the spirit has gone out, and the disconsolate man becomes crazily busy about all sorts of things, lest anything might remind him of God; he slaves from morning till night, makes money, lays by, engages in financial transactions — yea, if thou wert to talk with him, thou wouldst hear him constantly talk of the seriousness of life. Ah, horrible seriousness, it would have been better to lose one’s senses!

What is disconsolateness? The wildest shriek of pain or the presumption of despair — this is not precisely disconsolateness. But this agreement with oneself arrived at in the stillness of extinction, that everything higher is lost, whereas nevertheless one is able to go on living if only nothing reminds him of this — this is disconsolateness. Not even sorrowing disconsolately, but completely ceasing to sorrow, being able to lose God in such a way that one became therewith entirely indifferent and did not even find life unsupportable — this is disconsolateness, and at the same time it is the most dreadful sort of disobedience, more dreadful than any defiance. To hate God and to curse Him is not so dreadful as to lose Him in this way, or, what comes to the same thing, to lose oneself. To lose a trifle in such a way that one has no mind to pick it up — well, perhaps that is natural; but to lose one’s own self (to lose God) in such a way that one has not even an inclination to stoop and pick it up, or in such a way that the loss is not noticed — oh, what a dreadful loss! For not only is there an infinite difference between what one loses and what one loses, but also between how one loses. To lose God in such a way that repentance hastens at once in contrition to recover what was lost; to lose God in such a way that one is offended in Him, rebels against Him, or sighs against Him; to lose God in such a way that one despairs at it — but to lose God as if He were nothing, and as if the loss were nothing!

Let us in conclusion think of the birds, which had their place in the Gospel and should have their place in the discourse. The bird so obeys God that this is the same thing as being wilful; the Christian so denies himself that this is the same thing as obeying God; the heathen is so wilful that it is eternally apparent that he does not obey God. The bird has no self-will to give up; the Christian gives up his own will; the heathen gives up God. The bird neither won nor lost God; the Christian won God and accounted it as everything; the heathen lost God and accounted it as nothing. The bird serves only one Master whom it does not know; the Christian serves only one Master whom he loves; the heathen serves the master who is the enemy of God. The bird obeys promptly when God calls, the Christian even more promptly; God cannot even call to the heathen, for it is as if there were no one to call upon. The obedience of the bird serves to the honour of God, the Christian's more perfect obedience still more so; the disobedience of the heathen refuses to honour God, he serves for nothing but to be cast out as salt which has lost its savour.

PART II

Before this book was finished S. K. had it in mind to publish another, with the title, ‘Some Joyful Thoughts’, containing four Discourses:

No. 1. Tribulation worketh Patience.

No. 2. Patience worketh Probation.

No. 3. Probation Hope.

No. 4. Hope maketh not Ashamed.

In a marginal note he reflected that the subject of hope might better be included in ‘The Gospel of Sufferings’, which was the title he first proposed to apply to Part III of the Christian Discourses.

In another place in the Journal he notes that three of the themes he had in mind for this part were eventually discarded for the sake of keeping the number down to seven. The discarded themes were: No. 1. How joyful — that if in temptation the believer is not able to hold the anchor, the anchor is able to hold the believer; No. 2. [about tribulation, patience, hope]; No. 3. How joyful — that it is for joy one cannot venture to trust the most blessed news. So in Acts xii. 14, the maid Rhoda, who ought to have opened for Peter, on hearing Peter’s voice, ‘she opened not the gate for joy’ — for joy she let him stand outside.

Thou believest it not — but only take courage, for really the reason only is that it is too joyful, take courage, for it is joy that prevents thee — is not this joyful? It is said of the disciples (Luke xxiv. 41) that ‘for joy they disbelieved’.

It appears that S. K. had at his disposal a superabundance of joyful thoughts, of the thoughts which cheer and comfort — a far greater abundance of them than of the thoughts which wound and dismay.

He provided no preface for ‘Notes in the Strife of Suffering’, but he says in the Journal that if any had been used, it would have been to the following effect:

‘The bravest nation of antiquity (the Lacedemonians) prepared themselves for warfare by music: so these are notes (Stemninger) of triumphant joy which tune [stemme] to warfare, and so far from dejecting [forstemme] one, will make one well disposed [velstemt] for the contest.’

It is just as well this preface was not used, for it contains little but a play on words, yet it helps us to understand how the title is to be understood and translated.

JOYFUL NOTES IN THE STRIFE OF SUFFERING
CHRISTIAN DISCOURSES by S. KIERKEGAARD

'I WILL INCLINE mine ear to the parable, and propound my dark sayings upon the harp' (Psalm 49. 4).

Copenhagen 1848

I. THE JOY OF IT — THAT WE SUFFER ONLY ONCE, BUT TRIUMPH ETERNALLY

HE WHO WILLS the end must will the means. But this involves, does it not, the assumption or admission that a man knows what he wills. This being assumed, we bring him to a halt by the 'means', by saying, 'Then thou must also will the means'. Sometimes, however, it may be necessary to go back a step farther and say, 'He who wills something must first of all know what it is he wills, must have an understanding of what he wills'. The impatient person who would attain his end at once finds that even this thing about the means retards him terribly — oh, but how awfully tiresome the slowness of having to begin so far back: 'he who wills something must also know what he wills, must have an understanding of what he wills'.

So it is now with regard to what is indeed the aim of the edifying discourse, namely, to edify, or rather the aim of edifying. Perhaps there was a man who would be edified, is desirous of being edified, one who, if he were to take time to understand what he wants, or take time to have it explained to him, would be more than eager to wish himself exempted from being edified. Such misunderstanding occurs often in life. A man may vehemently, passionately, yea, persistently, desire something the exact nature of which he has no idea of — and, alas, the exact nature of which is perhaps the exact opposite of that which the wisher supposed it to be. So it is with the edifying, which verily is the Good in-and-for-itself, and precisely for this reason must require that the individual who would be edified has understood himself, lest light-mindedly, in a worldly spirit, thoughtlessly wishful, he take the edifying in vain, and then will say, I beg to be excused, when he gets to know more exactly what it is.

For what is the edifying? The first answer to this tells what the edifying first is: it is the dismaying. The edifying is not for the healthy-minded but for the sick; to the supposedly healthy and strong it must therefore in the first instance appear as the dismaying. The sick person understands as a matter of course that he is subjected to the treatment of the physician; but for a person in sound health it would be dismaying to discover that he had fallen into the hands of a physician who without more ado was treating him as a sick man. So it is with the edifying, which first is the dismaying — for the non-contrite it is a means to contrition. Where there is nothing at all dismaying and no dismay, there is nothing at all edifying and no edification. There is forgiveness for sin, that is edifying, the dismaying thing is that there is sin; and the degree of the dismay in the inwardness of sin-consciousness corresponds to the degree of edification. There is healing for all pain, victory in all conflict, salvation from all danger — that is edifying; the dismaying thing is that there is pain, conflict, danger; and the degree of the dismaying and of the dismay corresponds to the edifying and to the edification.

So deep lies the edifying. Finding the edifying is like boring an artesian well, where one must sink the shaft many, many fathoms — and all the better, for then the jet is higher. First one must look well to find the dismaying. For the dismaying is related to the edifying as the dowsing-rod is to the spring — when the rod bends down, there in the depths is a spring; and where the dismaying is, there in the vicinity, at the bottom, is the edifying. Thereupon, after one has looked well to find the dismaying, and then looks well again, he finds the edifying.

So sure of itself is the edifying, so reliable in itself. One should not be terrified by the dismay, as though it might stand in the way of edification, nor keep it timorously at a distance, in the hope of making the edification acceptable; for with the fear of dismay the edification vanishes. But on the other hand it is precisely in dismay that edification lies. So triumphant is the edifying that the very thing which at the first glance might seem to be its enemy is turned into a presupposition, into a servant, into a friend. If the art of the physician triumphantly overcomes the difficulty of transforming poison into a medicine, still more gloriously is dismay transformed into the edifying, for edification.

So it is now with the subject of this discourse. We suffer but once. This is said so glibly that it sounds almost frivolous, just as in the world one often hears the frivolous saying, ‘Enjoy life, we live but once.’ But to find the edifying one must first find the dismaying, and so in this case one must take time to understand that in this saying is implied the gloomiest conception of life. We live but once — that is as if it were to be said of a man that he was sick only once in his life, only once unhappy — that is, all his life long. Now it is that the edification is about to begin. But earthly shrewdness and impatience, and worldly anxiety, which in a worldly way are in search of healing, must not expect the impossible, that one might be able to speak to them for edification, if one is to speak Christianly. For the Christian experience properly begins just there, or the proper Christian experience begins just there, where human impatience will find whatever actual sufferings it has to complain of endlessly increased... by the consolation, yea, by the consolation which drives to despair; for in a worldly sense Christian consolation is more apt to drive to despair than are the heaviest earthly sufferings and the greatest temporal misfortunes. There edification begins, the Christian edification which is named after Him, our Lord and Saviour, for He too suffered only once... but His whole life was suffering.

So let us speak about

THE JOY OF IT — THAT WE SUFFER ONLY ONCE, BUT TRIUMPH ETERNALLY.

We suffer only once, but we triumph eternally. So far as that goes, we triumph also only once. Quite true. But the difference is infinite: that the once of suffering is the instant, that of triumph, eternity; the "once' of suffering, therefore, when it is past, is no time, the 'once' of triumph is, in another sense, no time, for it is never past; the once of suffering is a transition, or a thing we pass through, that of triumph, an eternally enduring triumph.

The once of suffering is the instant, or we suffer only once. Though suffering lasts seventy years, that is only once; though the 'once' is the seventy times ten of the seventy years, that is only once, it is still only one time. For time itself in its totality is the instant; eternally understood, the temporal is the instant, and the instant eternally understood is only 'once'. In vain would the temporal assume an air of importance, count the instants, and add them all together — if eternity has any say in the matter, the temporal never gets farther than, never comes to more than, the 'once'. For eternity is the opposite; it is not the opposite to a single instant (this is meaningless), it is the opposite to the temporal as a whole, and it opposes itself with the power of eternity against the temporal amounting to more than that. As God said to the waters, 'Hitherto, and no farther', so says eternity to time, 'Hitherto, and no farther; however long thou mayest last, thou art the instant, neither more nor less; this I vouch for, I that am Eternity, or this I bring about by compulsion, I that am Eternity.' No more than does a parasitical plant, however long it may continue to grow, and however widely it may spread upon the ground, ever grow in height, no more does the temporal, however long it may last, ever become more than the instant and the 'once' — if eternity has anything to say. Therefore the youth who stands at the beginning of life says with the same justification as does the old man who stands at the end of it and looks back over the distance travelled: 'We live only once.' With the same justification, that is to say, by virtue of eternity, but not with the same truth, although the saying is equally true. For the young man says what is true, but the old man has verified it, has made that true which yet is eternally true. The only difference here is that which in these times has been overlooked, when with all this proving and proving it has been forgotten that the highest thing a man is capable of is to make an eternal truth true, to make it true, to make it true that it is true... by doing it, by being himself the proof, by a life which also perhaps will be able to convince others. Did Christ ever undertake to prove some truth or another, or to prove the truth? No, but He made the truth true, or He made it true that He is the Truth.

We suffer only once. But just as that parasitical plant which slinks along the ground betrays every instant, if thou wilt observe it, an inclination to grow to a height, and in case it encounters in its path anything upon which it can twine itself, it sneaks up to a height, or arrogates to itself loftiness — so also the temporal, when in its sneaking gate it finds something to which it can cling, would sneak up in order to come to some importance — by foreign assistance. Yes, by foreign assistance — and yet no, not by foreign assistance, for if this comes about, if the temporal comes to some importance, it comes about by the assistance of that man to whose misfortune it comes about. If man does not derive his strength from the eternal and in solidarity with the eternal obtain strength to hold down the temporal, it steals his strength from him and thus becomes something prodigious, it becomes the man's impatience, his despair, perhaps his ruin. Pride slays its own master; but the temporal is just as ungrateful, it comes to something by stealing the strength of eternity from a man, and by way of requital it then remains with him and makes him its slave. Alas, in this way man gets to know a great deal about the instant; bigger and bigger become the figures he calculates with — ah, and this calculation amounts only to 'one times one', if eternity has any say in the matter. Now one day of suffering is long, one month awfully long, one year terribly long, unendurably long, enough to drive one to despair; now one can recall that time, and that time, and that time, and at last so many times that no one knows the beginning or the end of the many times of suffering. But was not the lord of the vineyard in the right when according to the agreement he let the labourers be paid an equally big wage although they were called to the work at different hours, eternally understood was he not in the right, inasmuch as, eternally understood, they had only laboured 'once'? The labourers who complained as though an injustice were done them must have learned to know something about the temporal which is not eternally true, and it is precisely this that accounts for their mistake, and it was they who were in the wrong, not the lord of the vineyard. The lord of the vineyard is eternity, for whom diversity of time does not exist, for whom the temporal is only 'once'; and again the equal reward is eternity. Therefore they had no ground for complaint; for with respect to eternity only one agreement is possible, that which is equal for all men; and with respect to receiving the reward of eternity, the one has not laboured longer because he was called at the third hour than the other who was called at the eleventh.

O thou sufferer, every evening indeed thou dost hear the cry of the night-watchman, 'Be cautious with candles and fire!' Thou dost sometimes hear also perhaps the cry, 'Make use of time! Employ the hour!' I would rather cry out to thee and to myself, 'Take care above all things to deal cautiously with time, more cautiously than with candles and fire, so that it never may become to thee more than the 'once'! Never begin the dreadful calculation which no one who ever began got through with, to want to count instants and times! Take care above all to cancel the fractions continually by the aid of eternity, in which all instants are equated, and in such a way that they only come to 'once'! By this defend thyself from ever in thy life getting to the point of suffering more than 'once'! For if it be 'for once', oh, well, that is something a man can bear after all; but if he has to suffer twice — then impatience is aroused. Was it not in fact impatience which taught him that it was the second time? By the aid of eternity a man suffers but once. Therefore when evening comes let the day's sufferings be forgotten, so that when the same sufferings begin the next day thou dost still suffer only once! And then when the year is at an end let this year's sufferings be forgotten, so that when the same sufferings begin next year thou dost still suffer only once! And then when thy last hour is come let this life's sufferings be forgotten — yea, it is true, is it not, they are then forgotten, thou dost suffer only once! O thou sufferer, whosoever thou art, however thou dost feel thyself imprisoned in the life-long confinement of suffering, alas, like a captive beast in its cage — see how the captive goes around and around its cage, how it measures the length of its chain to give itself exercise — so do thou measure the length of the chain by going as far as the thought of death and eternity, thus thou wilt get exercise in order to be able to hold out, and thou wilt get the zest of living! Suffer patiently! But everything that can be said about suffering patiently is essentially and substantially comprehended in this one word: Let eternity help thee to be able to suffer but once.

The 'one time' of suffering is no time. As the proverb says, Once is no habit' (literally, one time is no time). Whether this is true in the situation to which the proverb applies, I leave undecided; it is quite possible that the proverb is not true, and yet what the proverb says is true — a proverb in fact is anything but an eternal truth, it talks only of the temporal. But when the contrast is that between time and eternity, it is eternally certain that one time is no time, and in no other case is its truth so clearly and decisively evident. What indeed is seventy years compared with eternity! And in eternity it will be made evident that all this suffering, this 'one time', is no time. One will not be able to observe in the blessed ones that they have suffered, how they have suffered, will not be able to observe it by the slightest signs; every tear shall be wiped away from the eyes which now glisten with radiant joy, every want shall be appeased in the heart which now blissfully possesses all things, and possesses them there (oh, blessed security of ownership!) where nothing can take away the joy of it, there where the hallowed ones say blissfully, Once is no time.'

Sin alone is man's destruction, sin alone has the power to set such a mark upon a man that it is not obliterated at once, or entirely, or perhaps never to all eternity. Of all temporal sufferings it is true that once is no time.

The 'once' of suffering is a transition, a passage-way. Thou must go through it, and though it were to last as long as life, and though it were as hard as a sword which transfixes thy heart, it is yet only a passage-way. It is not true that it is the suffering which goes through thee, it is thou that goest through it — in the eternal understanding of the case, entirely unharmed. In time and in the sense of the temporal it seems so dreadful, as though suffering went piercingly through thee, so that thou perished in it. That is an illusion. It is as when one of the actors in the play kills another; it seems exactly as if he pierced him through, but we all know that in fact he did not hurt a hair of his head. But not more unharmed does the murdered actor go again to his home, and not more unharmed did Daniel go from the lions' den, and not more unharmed did the Three Children go into the fiery furnace — than the soul of a believer goes into eternity, unharmed by all the sufferings of the temporal, unharmed by death. For all the sufferings of the temporal are illusion, and death itself, eternally understood, is a comedian! As little as moth and rust can consume the treasure of eternity (and what indeed is more impossible!), as little as a thievish hand can steal it, so little is all temporal suffering, however long it may last, capable in the remotest degree of injuring the soul. This neither sickness can do, nor want, nor distress, nor heat and cold — much as they can consume; this neither

The 'once' of suffering is passage-way which leaves no trace at all upon the soul, or, still more gloriously, it is a passage-way which purifies the soul by sanctifying it, so that purity remains as the trace left by the passage-way. For as gold is purified in the fire, so is the soul in suffering. But of what does the fire bereave the gold? Yea, it is a strange mode of speech to call it 'bereaving', it bereaves the gold of all the base constituents. What then does gold lose in the fire? Yea, it is a strange mode of speech to call it 'losing', gold loses in the fire all the base elements, that is, gold gains in the fire. So it is with all temporal suffering; in itself impotent, it is not able to take anything; and, if the sufferer allows eternity to have a say, it takes away the impure elements, that is, it gives purity.

Sin is man's destruction. Only the rust of sin can consume the soul — or eternally destroy it. For here indeed is the remarkable thing from which already that simple wise man of olden time derived a proof of the immortality of the soul, that the sickness of the soul (sin) is not like bodily sickness which kills the body. Sin is not a passage-way which a man has to pass through once, for from it one shall flee; sin is not (like suffering) the instant, but an eternal fall from the eternal, hence it is not 'once', and it cannot possibly be that its 'once' is no time. No, just as between that rich man in hell and Lazarus in Abraham's bosom there was a yawning gulf fixed, so is there also a yawning distinction between suffering and sin. Let us not confuse it, lest talk about suffering might become less frank-hearted, because it had also sin in mind, and this less frank-hearted talk might be boldly impudent inasmuch as it was talking in this way about sin. This precisely is the Christian position, that there is this infinite distinction between evil and evil, as they are confusingly named; this precisely is the Christian characteristic, to talk of temporal sufferings ever more and more

We suffer only once, but triumph eternally. Let me make this distinction vivid to thee. In a church somewhere here in the country there is a painting behind the altar which depicts two angels holding out to Christ the cup of suffering. When thou dost contemplate the picture, it makes upon thee at once the impression the artist aimed to produce; thou art absorbed in this impression, for such indeed was the situation, the cup of suffering was held out to Him! But in case thou wert to remain a whole day sitting before the altar and looking at this picture, or in case thou wert to contemplate it every Sunday, year in and year out — ah, it surely is true that, however piously thou wert ever mindful of His suffering, praying Him, moreover, to remind thee constantly of it, surely it is true that there will come an instant when everything is for thee infinitely changed, when the picture will blessedly turn itself around, when thou wilt say to thyself, 'No, after all, it did not last so long, the angels did not keep on holding out to Him the cup; in fact He took it willingly from the hands of the angels, obediently from the hand of God — He has drained it, this cup of suffering, for what He suffered, He suffered once, but He triumphs eternally!' — On the other hand, consider Him in His triumph; yea, if any artist were able to depict this, is it possible — however long thou wert to remain sitting, or though every Sunday thou wert to contemplate this picture — is it possible that the moment would ever come when thou wouldest say to thyself, 'But this lasts too long; why, it never comes to an end!' No, God be praised, it never comes to an end! And yet this triumph also is only once; but the 'once' of triumph is eternity, the 'once' of suffering was the instant. It may, no doubt, be impatience which cannot endure to look at the picture where the cup is held out to Him; but it may also be faith, which consequently does not turn

O thou sufferer, whosoever thou art; as thou dost begin every day with God, praying Him to give thee patience to suffer that day, so pray Him also every day to remind thee that a man only suffers once! In Our Father' the Christian prays for the daily bread today. With this one is likely to think more especially of the poor, whose task is to get along with the daily bread of poverty. But thou who with respect to sufferings hast been, perhaps from the very beginning of thy life and for thy whole life, so richly endowed with sufferings in abundance, for thee also this prayer was invented, for thee the task is the opposite and yet the same: to get along with the daily supply of suffering, so that at thy life's end, as the poor man says, 'I made a go of it all the same, and got the daily wherewithal', so thou then mightest be able to say, 'I made a go of it all the same, and got the daily wherewithal.' The poor man makes a go of it, defends himself against poverty, finds the daily wherewithal. It is perhaps more difficult with the abundance of suffering to make a go of it, but that is the task. Lay this also which follows well to heart. Reflect that though a man were to have lived his whole life in the undisturbed enjoyment of all earthly goods, reflect that at the instant of death he has nothing at all to remember, nothing at all with which to go forth to encounter the boundless future of remembrance. For enjoyment is agreeable in the instant, but like the vacuous instant it is not material for remembrance, and for an eternal remembrance it simply does not exist. On the other hand, there is no remembrance more blessed, and nothing more blessed to remember, than suffering overcome in solidarity with God; this is the mystery of suffering. So then: either seventy years passed in every possible enjoyment, and nothing, nothing for an eternity (most appalling of all deficiencies, as it is indeed the most long-lasting!); or seventy years past in suffering, and then an eternity for blessed remembrance. Blessed remembrance of sufferings overcome in alliance with God! Most blessed surely the remembrance of undeserved sufferings in a good cause, as indeed the Lord says, ‘When men shall reproach you and say all manner of evil against you falsely, blessed are ye!’ Yea, blessed it is to suffer thus, the most blessed remembrance! But this applies as well to every suffering which is endured in alliance with God, it is blessed to remember it in eternity. We suffer only once, but we triumph eternally. Strange how the situation is inverted! For long protracted duration, which seems to belong to the temporal, the seventy years, is — if the temporal is held down in subjection — no more than ‘once’; but then it comes again in eternity, where at length it becomes perpetually blessed to remember this ‘once’.

II. THE JOY OF IT — THAT AFFLICTION DOES NOT BEREAVE OF HOPE, BUT RECRUITS HOPE

WHAT A STRANGE business proposition — to acquire hope in a way like that! Is it not as strange as though a merchant were to become rich by having nobody enter his shop, or that a traveller reached his destination because somebody showed him the wrong way? Ah, people often complain that life is so unimportant, so meaningless, so totally lacking in entertainment — it seems to me that in this one thought there is entertainment enough for an eternity! People often complain that life is so empty, so monotonous, leaves one so unstrung — it seems to me that in this one thought there is tension enough for an eternity! Poets often depict in their tales a character enigmatically masked who at the decisive moment turns out to be something quite different from what he appeared — to me it seems that the inventions of the poets in this line, all of them taken together, are mere child's-play in comparison with this disguise invented by eternity, that it is affliction which undertakes to create hope for a man! Or is there in any fairy-tale, in any poem, a character passing for evil (but yet at bottom good) which looks so terrifying as affliction? And to think that it should be affliction which recruits hope! Can any robber be more sure of the result of his thrust when it is aimed directly at the heart than the aim of affliction seems to be surely directed at the life of hope? And yet it is affliction which recruits hope! Marvellous! It does not give hope, it recruits hope. So it is not at one decisive moment it throws aside its disguise and says, 'I only wanted to terrify thee, here is the hope.' So all the while it stood there, this is what it was labouring for, labouring slowly for this one and only end, to provide the sufferer with hope.

Yes, let us wonder at it right heartily! If there is anything people in these times have forgotten, it is this thing of wondering — therefore also the thing of believing and hoping and loving. The very highest thing is proclaimed, the most marvellous, but no one wonders. It is proclaimed that there is forgiveness of sins, but no one says, 'It is impossible.' Hardly does any one turn away offended and say, 'It is impossible'; still less does any one say it in wonder, or as he says it who is so fain to wish that it might be true but dare not believe it, will not let go of the saying but is as an unhappy lover and cannot believe; still less is it said by him, precisely by him who believes in it, he whose repentance was softened into a quiet sorrow which never was transformed into a blessed joy, he therefore who in expressing to God his inexpressible thanks refreshes his soul by repeating, 'It is impossible!' Oh, blessed refreshment, that he who was brought so close to despair because it was impossible now believes it, blissfully believes it, but in the wonderment of his soul continues to say, 'It is impossible!' We all know well what is related of a man who had heard a story at which all laughed, but which nobody laughed at when he told it... because, as we know, he had forgotten the point. But think of an Apostle in these times, an Apostle who of course knew well how to tell the story of the marvellous, think of his grief, or of the grief of the Holy Spirit within him, when he had to say, 'There is no one that wonders; they listen to it as indifferently as though it were of the utmost indifference, as though there were nobody whom it concerns, nobody to whom it is of importance, of immense importance, whether it is possible or not possible, whether it is so or not so, whether it is true or a lie!'

So as an introduction let us wonder at the fact that affliction recruits hope, let the soul be tuned to wonder, let us shout as the Psalmist shouts to his soul, 'Awake psaltery and harp!' And so let us talk about

THE JOY OF IT — THAT AFFLICTION DOES NOT BEREAVE OF HOPE, BUT RECRUITS HOPE

If with one word we were to indicate what is characteristic of child-life and youth-life, one must surely say that it is a dream-life. And so indeed we do speak. How often (to mention only this example) this sad phrase is repeated by an older person: ‘They vanished, these dreams of childhood and youth.’ They vanished — presumably because the dreamer vanished, was lost; for how should there be dreams when there is no dreamer! But what right have we to call it a dream-life, when by that we characterize the child and the youth as sleepers, as sleep-walkers? In another sense the child is awake, in a degree that none of its elders are, its senses are open to every impression, the child being sheer life and movement, alert attention all the day long; and the youth is awake as seldom an older person is, his mind is without rest early and late, he is so stirred by passion that often he hardly can sleep. And yet child-life and youth-life is dream-life, for the innermost thing, that which in the deepest sense is man, slumbers. The child is completely turned outward, its inwardness is extraversion, and to that extent the child is wide awake. But for a man, to be awake means to be eternally turned inward in inwardness, and so the child is dreaming, it dreams itself sensuously at one with everything, almost to the extent of confounding itself with the sense-impression. In comparison with the child, the youth is more turned inward, but in imagination; he dreams, or it is as though everything about him were dreaming. On the other hand, he who in the sense of eternity is turned inward perceives only what is of the spirit, and for the rest he is like a sleeper, an absentee, a dead man, with respect to the perceptions of flesh and blood, of the temporal, of the imaginative — in him the spirit is awake, the lower functions sleep; hence he is awake. Dream-life is so denominated with a view to the nobler part — in the waking man the spirit wakes, whereas there is doubtless something which sleeps, namely, the lower part.

In the child and in the youth it is the spirit that sleeps, the lower part is awake; nevertheless, as it is the determining characteristic of spirit to be awake, this life is called a dream-life.

But he who dreams must be awakened, and the deeper the man is who slumbers, or the deeper he slumbers, the more important it is that he be awakened, and the more powerfully must he be awakened. In case there is nothing that awakens the youth, this dream-life is continued in manhood. The man doubtless thinks that he is dreaming no more, and in a sense he is not; perhaps he scorns and despises the dreams of youth, but precisely this shows that his life is a failure. In a sense he is awake, yet he is not in an eternal sense and in the deepest sense awake. And so his life is something far less significant than that of the youth, and it is his life rather which deserves to be despised; for he has become an unfruitful tree, or like a tree which has died, whereas the life of youth verily is not to be despised. The dream-life of childhood and youth is the time of blossoming. But in the case of a tree which is to bear fruit, the time of blossoming is a time of immaturity. It may indeed seem like retrogression when the tree which once stood naked and then burst into bloom, now casts off its blossoms; but it also may be progress. Fair is the time of blossoms, and fair is the blossoming hope in the child and in the youth; and yet it is immaturity.

Then comes affliction to awaken the dreamer, affliction which like a storm tears off the blossoms, affliction which nevertheless does not bereave of hope, but recruits hope.

Where then is hope? Is hope in the rushing wind of the storm? Oh, no, not more than God's voice was in the rushing wind, but in the gentle breeze, like a whisper in man's inmost parts, all too easily ignored. But what is it then that affliction would accomplish? It would have that whisper heard in the inmost parts. But does not then affliction counteract itself, must not its tempestuous wind drown out this voice? No, affliction is able to drown out every earthly voice, that is precisely what it has to do, but the voice of eternity within a man it cannot drown. Or conversely: it is the voice of eternity within which demands to be heard, and to make a hearing for itself it makes use of the loud voice of affliction. Then when by the aid of affliction all irrelevant voices are brought to silence, it can be heard, this voice within.

O thou sufferer, whosoever thou art, if only thou wilt listen! People generally think that it is the world, the environment, external relationships, which stand in one's way, in the way of one's good fortune and peace and joy. And at bottom it is always man himself that stands in his own way, man himself, who is too closely attached to the world, to the environment, to circumstances, to external relationships, so that he is not able to come to himself, come to rest, to have hope, he is constantly too much turned outward, instead of being turned inward, hence everything he says is true only as an illusion of the senses. Man himself maintains communication with the enemy, and the medium of communication is... the hope of youth.

But affliction bereaves of hope. Yea, that thou hast thyself experienced to the full, even if thou hast not as yet abandoned the league with this ambiguous experience. Thou didst hope that if thou wert not successful the first time, well then another time, and if not then, at least another time; thou didst hope that as compensation for thy many failures a little redress might be due thee the next time; thou didst hope that it still might be possible for an unexpected help to come, as it came to him who for thirty and eight years had lain paralysed, with salvation so near that it was always just one other that stepped down into the pool before him; after having relinquished all other friends thou didst at last set thy hopes upon that Friend — but the affliction endured.

For affliction recruits hope. It does not bestow hope, but it recruits it. It is man himself who acquires it, this hope of eternity which is deposited in him, hidden in his inner man; but affliction recruits it. For affliction prevents him mercilessly (yes, in the child's view of it, mercilessly) from obtaining any other help or relief whatsoever; affliction compels him mercilessly (yes, in the youth's view of it, mercilessly) to let go of everything else; affliction schools him mercilessly (yes, in immaturity's view of it, mercilessly), schools him thoroughly, that he may learn to grasp the eternal and to hold on to the eternal. Affliction does not help directly, it is not affliction that acquires or purchases hope and makes a present of it to a man; it helps repellently, and can do no otherwise, because hope is in man himself. Affliction preaches awakening. For, alas, men are unfortunately only too hardy, so that there is little to be accomplished by the terror of mighty thoughts — affliction knows better how to make itself understood, its eloquence is striking, not only once like a witticism, but as one says of a stick, 'There are blows in that; striking is a permanent attribute it possesses.' Man would prefer to have the direct form of communication, by way of assurance and assurance; but this is so comfortable that it avails nothing. Affliction, on the other hand, does not jest. When affliction begins this work of recruiting hope, it seems for an instant as crazy as if one were to assault a beggar, hold a pistol to his heart, and say, 'Your money!' For, ah, the sufferer is just about to despair of hope (the hope of youth that is), which he is more than fain to hold fast, as he says — and then affliction assaults him and demands... his hope (the hope of eternity, that is). Affliction is no congratulatory caller who comes bearing hope in his hand as a present. Affliction is the villain who cruelly (yes, in the child's view, cruelly) says to the sufferer, 'I shall recruit hope for thee all right.' But as it always is in life, that he who has to play the villain is never appreciated, that nobody takes the time to put himself in the villain's place and to recognize how admirably he plays his part and conforms to his role, how admirably, without letting himself be moved by any sighs or tears or ingratiating prayers — so it is also with affliction, it always has to hear itself spoken ill of. But just as little as it troubles the physician that the sick man in his pain scolds and clamours, or even kicks at him, just so little is affliction put out at this; God be praised, it is not put out — it recruits hope. Just as Christianity, precisely by all that unappreciation and persecution and injustice which the truth must suffer, proves that righteousness must exist (oh, marvellous inference!), so there is in the extremity of affliction, when it presses hardest, this inference, this ergo: Ergo there is an eternity to set one's hope upon.

Imagine hidden in a simpler exterior a secret receptacle wherein the most precious treasure is deposited — there is a spring which has to be pressed, but the spring is hidden, and the pressure must have a certain strength, so that an accidental pressure would not be sufficient — so likewise is the hope of eternity hidden in man's inmost parts, and affliction is the pressure. When it presses the hidden spring, and strongly enough, then the contents appear in all their glory.

Imagine a grain of corn deposited in the earth — if it is to grow, what does it need? First of all room, it must have room, and then pressure, there must in addition be pressure — to germinate is precisely to make room through an opposing substance. So likewise is the hope of eternity deposited in man's inward parts. But affliction makes room by making away with all else, all the provisional and temporal which it reduces to despair, so that the pressure of affliction is what elicits the treasure.

Imagine an animal which (as actually is the case) has a weapon for its protection which it uses only in mortal danger — such is the hope of eternity in man's bosom, affliction is the mortal danger!

Imagine a creeping creature which nevertheless has wings which it can use when it is reduced to extremities, but for daily use thinks it not worth while to employ them — such likewise is the hope of eternity in man's bosom; he has wings, but he must be reduced to extremities before he discovers them, or before he obtains them, or before he employs them!

Imagine a hardened criminal whom justice can neither by craft nor by fair means induce to confess, but out of whom it forces an admission by means of the rack — so likewise is the hope of eternity in man’s bosom. The natural man goes reluctantly, oh, so reluctantly, to confession. In the sense of childhood and youth, he is ready enough to hope. But to hope, in the sense of eternity, is contingent upon a prodigiously painful effort to which the natural man will never be brought by fair means to subject himself; for with pain man is born, but he is reborn to the eternal with perhaps even greater pain — the cry, however, signifies equally little in either case, since it is auxiliary to the act. So affliction must supervene to compel the admission, the admission of hope. Or imagine a stiff-necked witness who will not give testimony (and every man is to be a witness for the eternal and to present evidence for it) — affliction does not let him go because he refuses to give testimony; day after day it imposes upon him heavier and heavier fines for contempt of court, until he gives testimony. Or imagine, as one reads in the poets, an evil woman who knows the word of good counsel but out of malice constantly counsels wrong — when she is brought to the stake the word comes out. Such is the hope of eternity in the natural man’s bosom. But he does not will his own good, therefore he will not come out with the right word, will hardly listen to it when it is said by another, let alone by himself, until affliction saves him by constraining him to it.

Thus it is that affliction recruits hope. — But is affliction then to cease, is the whole thing a painful operation which is then over with? No, it does not have to be over. When once affliction has attained what eternity wants of it, the situation adjusts itself properly; for, though the pressure remains, it constantly makes itself known conversely as hope, converts itself into hope.

This is contained in the thought itself: a pressure may press down, but it may also signify to lift. Thou seest the jet of water, how it rises high in the air, thou dost not see the pressure, or that this is pressure and by pressure. There is a pressure which depresses, but there is also the pressure which uplifts. Him only can affliction depress who will not be helped eternally; him who wills this, affliction presses upward. Him only can affliction bereave of hope who will not have the hope of eternity; for him who will have this hope affliction recruits it.

Thus it is with affliction. In life there is only one danger which decisively brings with it destruction, that is sin; for sin is man’s ruin. Affliction — yea, though it were more terrible than any man ever has experienced — affliction recruits hope.

III. THE JOY OF IT — THAT THE POORER THOU DOST BECOME, THE RICHER THOU CANST MAKE OTHERS

THERE ARE MANY roads to riches. And whether a man succeeds in becoming rich by following one of these roads, or whether he does not succeed, there is always a great deal of talk in the world and ample knowledge about these many roads. But this road to riches — and yet it is verily the highest attainment of riches to be able to make others rich — this road to riches by becoming poor oneself, this road which nevertheless is 'the way' one rarely hears talked about, rarely sees trodden, is rarely recommended; alas, in the world it is almost as if it did not exist, in the world they have no conception at all that riches is precisely this, not to become or to be rich oneself, but to be able to make others rich.

And yet this marvellous road to riches does actually exist. But it is understandable when one reads in the tales of the poets how the man who has ventured into the hiding-place of robbers must be fearful of every step he takes lest there should be concealed a secret trap-door through which he may plunge into the abyss; it is understandable when incredulity and apprehensiveness preach their doctrine about the insecurity of life — for people are only too prone to believe in the possibility of ruin. But that life, that existence, is blessedly secured by the help of eternity, that precisely in danger there is concealed a trap-door... to restitution — this is what they do not believe. Precisely when a man is nearest to despair, there he has a place on which to tread (and in despair he is brought as near as possible to treading upon it), and therewith everything is infinitely changed. He follows then the same road, but in the opposite direction. Instead of sighing anxiously at having to walk in the path of poverty, of lowliness, of unappreciation, of persecution, he walks in that same path joyfully; for he believes, and as a believer he understands that the poorer he becomes, the richer he can make others.

So if no one else will talk about this road to riches, then we will talk about it, about

THE JOY OF IT — THAT THE POORER THOU DOST BECOME, THE RICHER THOU CANST MAKE OTHERS

The difference is the inward one which changes everything infinitely, depending upon whether the sufferer will anxiously keep his gaze fixed upon how poor he has become, how insignificant, how unappreciated, or whether one who is bereaved of all earthly things will look away from this and then see his situation on its beautiful, its blessed side. Oh, if even for the artist it is a matter of course that when he has to paint a one-eyed man he depicts the side where he has an eye, should not then a man in bitter suffering look away from the bitterness in order to see the blessedness? In an outward sense there is to be sure no change; the sufferer remains where he was, in the same condition, and yet there is a change, a marvellous change, the miracle of faith. Viewed from the one side it is the poor man who becomes poorer and poorer; viewed from the other side it is the poor man who, the poorer he becomes, the richer he makes others — yet in an outward sense the same man.

Let us now proceed with the discourse as follows: let us first make clear to ourselves the difference between riches and riches — earthly/spiritual — and what consequences this has for the possessor, so as to understand that one must actually be poor in order to make others rich, and that the poorer one becomes, the richer one can make others.

All earthly and worldly goods are in themselves selfish, invidious, the possession of them, being invidious or envious, must of necessity make others poorer: what I have, another cannot have; the more I have, the less another has. The unrighteous mammon (and this term might well be applied to all earthly goods, including worldly honour, power, etc.) is itself unrighteous, does injustice (irrespective of whether it is unlawfully acquired or possessed), cannot in and for itself be acquired or possessed equally, for if one is to have much, there must necessarily be another who gets only a little, and what the one has, the other cannot possibly have; moreover, all the time and diligence, all the care and anxiety, expended for the acquisition or possession of earthly goods is selfish, invidious, or, the man who is so employed is selfish, in every such instant he has no thought for others, in every such instant he labours selfishly for himself or for some few others, but equally for himself and for every other. Even though a man may be willing to communicate in his earthly goods — yet every instant when he is employed in acquiring them or is dwelling upon the possession of them he is selfish, as that thing is which he possesses or acquires.

It is otherwise with the goods of the spirit. The goods of the spirit are, according to the very concept, communication, the possession of them is merciful, in and for itself it is communication. If a man has faith, truly he has not thereby deprived others of anything (without even taking into account what he does directly to communicate it to others), he has laboured for all others. The entire race, indeed, and every individual in the race is a sharer in the fact that he has faith. By having faith he expresses the purely human, or that which is the essential possibility of every man. His possession of faith truly does not envy others anything, the rich man's possession of money being a kind of envy which has taken this money from the poor, who perhaps in their turn envy the rich for it; for there is envy in both situations, because earthly riches is itself envy. No, the believer has taken nothing from anybody, in faith he possesses nothing invidious; and no one will envy him that, rather should every one rejoice with him because of it. For the believer possesses only what every man can possess; and just in proportion as his faith is the greater it is possible to see all the more clearly the gloriousness and blessedness of this possession which in the possibility is common to all men. — If a man has love — shall I add, yea, even if he had it beyond all measure? No, it would be amiss to talk so extravagantly. It might seem that in the same high degree in which he has this possession of love, the more obvious must it be that he had deprived others of something; yet exactly the contrary is the case: the higher the degree in which he has love, just so much the farther he is from having deprived others of anything. So then, if a man has love beyond all measure, he has not therefore deprived others of anything, on the contrary, he has thereby been labouring for all — without considering for a moment what he actually has done for others out of love. All the time he was labouring for his own sake to acquire love, he has been labouring for all others. Although for an instant we very scrupulously exclude consideration of the use he makes of love, he has it not merely as a possession for himself, but the whole race and every individual in the race is a sharer in the fact that he has love. — If a man has hope, the hope of eternity, beyond all measure, he has not thereby in the very least deprived any one of anything, on the contrary, he has thereby laboured for all. For that one man has hope, or that there is one man who has hope, is for all other men far more joyful news, just because it is far more reassuring, than it is for all the other sailors who are steering for the same goal to learn that another has reached it. For in the case of the sailors, accidental circumstances may decide success for each one, and 'the other' sailors are not by an essential possibility sharers in the good luck of the one sailor. But that there is one man that has hope, or whenever there is one man that has hope, the thing is decisive for all, that they could have it. Here the rule is: one is all, and all one.

Thus the goods of the spirit are in and for themselves essentially communication, the possession of them is in and for itself a benefaction to all. He who strives after or possesses these goods does not therefore do good to himself merely, but bestows a benefaction upon all, labours for all, his effort to acquire these goods does in and for itself enrich others immediately; in him the others behold themselves, just as the spectators at the play behold themselves in the hero of the piece. This is the humanity of spiritual goods, in contrast to the inhumanity of earthly goods. For what is humanity? Human likeness or equality. Even at the moment when it most seems as if in acquiring these goods one is labouring for oneself alone, one is communicating; it is inherent in the goods themselves, in their very nature, that the possession of them is communication. In acquiring hope thou dost not acquire it merely for thyself but in acquiring it (oh, blessed acquisition!) thou art a communicator, for even in an immediate way the hope of eternity is a communication. Thou dost not merely possess hope, but even in the fact that thou dost possess it (oh, blessed possession!) thou art a communicator, thou art bestowing a benefaction upon others.

And how richly does heaven's blessing accompany these goods of the spirit — for 'to repeat the same thing, to me is not grievous', and it seems to me that the thought is so blessed that it cannot be repeated often enough; it would not even then be too often if a man's life were every day a repetition of this thought. Whereas the earthly goods are in themselves invidious, and therefore (oh, what great scope for fortuitous possibilities, what insecurity!) it must depend upon whether at a given instant they are possessed by one who will do good with them, and, alas, whereas they too often tempt the possessor to be just as invidious as are the goods themselves — the goods of the spirit are to such a degree a blessing that the mere possession of them (without talking now in any way of the use the possessor makes of them) is a blessing to others, is communication. As it is impossible to prevent the air from entering in through even the thickest walls, just so impossible it is to possess these goods in a selfish sense. This is inherent — and precisely here is the eternally reassuring fact — it is inherent, if I may so say, not in the possessor even, it is inherent in the goods themselves, which are communication, although it follows of itself that, if the possessor does not correspond to them, he does not possess at all the goods of the spirit. As the precious perfume diffuses a sweet odour not only when it is poured out, but to such a degree contains odour in itself, is essentially odour, that it penetrates the vessel in which it is contained, and even... in concealment diffuses sweet odour — so are the goods of the spirit to such a degree communication that possession is communication, that even to acquire them is to enrich others.

Hence it follows that all the time thou dost employ in acquiring these goods, every instant thou dost rejoice in the possession of them, thou art so far from being selfishly employed with thyself that thou art communicating directly.

Thus it is in truth with the true goods of the spirit, which at the same time have the reassuring quality, the hall-mark of the truth, that they can be possessed only in truth. If any man would possess them selfishly, possess them as his own in a selfish sense, he does not possess them at all. However, in contrast with the merely earthly goods, there are also spiritual goods of a less perfect sort. For example, insight, knowledge, talent, aptitudes, etc., are spiritual goods. But it holds true nevertheless of the less perfect spiritual goods that the decisive thing is the possessor, or what sort of a man the possessor is, whether he is benevolent and communicative, or whether he is selfish; for these goods in themselves are not yet communication. If then he who possesses these less perfect spiritual goods is selfish, it results that with him the goods themselves also become invidious and make others poorer. The possessor then confines himself with these goods of his, all the while he is labouring to acquire them or to possess them he is selfishly confined, has neither time nor opportunity to trouble himself about others, nor has thought for others. So the shrewd man becomes shrewder and shrewder, but in an invidious sense, in such a sense that for his own advantage he would like to have the others become simpler and simpler in comparison with his increasing shrewdness, would like to have these more simple others... inhumanly in his power. The learned man becomes more and more learned, but in an invidious sense, and at last so learned that no one can understand him, so learned that he cannot communicate himself. In this way, by being possessed in untruth, these less perfect spiritual goods are transformed into worldly and earthly goods, the characteristic of which is that in one way or another the possession of them makes others poorer. But so far as the true goods of the spirit are concerned, it is true that they can only be possessed in truth, that one who does not possess them in truth really does not possess them.

So these then are the facts about riches and riches, and these thoughts must lie at the base of and determine the thought of enriching others. On the one hand are the earthly goods (or the less perfect spiritual goods), the possession of which in itself is envy, the acquisition of which in itself is envy, and hence every hour, every thought which is employed in possessing or acquiring them is invidious; on the other hand are the true goods of the spirit, the acquisition of which is itself communication, and hence every hour, every thought which is employed in possessing or acquiring them is enriching to others.

How then can the one man make the other rich? Well, he who has the earthly goods can communicate them. All right, let us assume that he does so, and let us not forget for an instant that the earthly goods are after all not the true riches. So he communicates and does good with what he has of earthly goods. That can be done very expeditiously, he may do it once a month or one hour every day, and he may be giving away a good deal. But observe that in all the hours and days when he is employed in acquiring, in amassing, in preserving the earthly goods, he is selfish. Yea, even were he to amass in order to communicate, yet so long as his thought is employed with the earthly goods he is selfish. In a sense this selfishness does not inhere in him, it inheres in the essential nature of the earthly goods. So this is seen to be only a very imperfect way of making others rich, even if we assume that he who possesses earthly goods is not ruined by them but is willing to give and to communicate, and even if for an instant we forget that the earthly goods are not the true riches.

No, the way, the perfect way of making others rich is to communicate the goods of the spirit, being oneself, moreover, solely employed in acquiring and possessing these goods. In such a case a man does truly make others rich, and this is the only thing he does, his sole business, and yet the business of his whole life. These goods are the true riches. At the time he himself is acquiring them he is communicating and directly making others rich. At the time he possesses them he is communicating and directly making others rich. And since he is solely employed with and concerned about these riches, he will surely strive to increase them. But with regard to the true riches, the nature of which is communication, increase is neither more nor less than direct communication and the increase of it; for here it is not as it is meanly in the case of false riches, which verily are not increased by being given away. Then by instruction, by reproof, by encouragement, by comfort, he communicates these goods, directly making others rich.

Let us now reflect upon our theme: how joyful it is that the poorer a man becomes, the richer he can make others. O thou sufferer, whosoever thou art, when life has deprived thee of thy riches, when from competence perhaps thou art reduced to poverty, all right then, if thou wilt let thyself be helped and wilt understand it as kindly meant in thy regard, all right then, thou art thus exempted from wasting thy time and thy day and thy thought upon that with which one can only be selfishly employed; and thou art all the more prompted to employ thyself solely in acquiring and possessing the goods of the spirit — and, oh, in every such instant thou art making others rich! Or in case life has deprived thee of thy worldly prestige and influence, all right then, if thou wilt let thyself be helped and wilt understand it as kindly meant in thy regard, all right then, thou art thus exempted also from expending time and thought in drawing income and enjoying it, which one can only selfishly be employed about; and thou art all the more prompted to employ thyself solely in acquiring and possessing the goods of the spirit — and, oh, in every such instant thou art making others rich! Or in case thou wast expelled from human society, in case no one seeks thy company, no invitation incommodes thee, all right then, if thou wilt let thyself be helped and wilt understand it as kindly meant in thy regard, all right then, thou art thus exempted also from wasting thy time and thy thought in idle chatter, from being emptily employed in killing time to escape boredom, or in wasting it in foolish pastimes; and thou art all the more prompted to employ thyself solely in acquiring and possessing the goods of the spirit — and, oh, in every such instant thou art making others rich!

Perhaps it seems hard to thee to become poor, to become poorer and poorer; for in an outward sense it is a fait accompli. Perhaps thy soul still clings to the earthly things, selfishly preoccupied with the loss of them, as he who possesses them is preoccupied with the possession of them? Do not let thyself be pitiably deceived. It seems like such an easy thing to give some moneys to the poor when one is rich oneself, to help another on when one is mighty oneself — do not let thyself be deceived: the man who is employed in acquiring faith, hope and love, precisely he it is that makes others rich.

So become poorer still; for perhaps thou art maintaining with the lost possession a deceitful relationship of wish, perhaps thou dost cherish a hope traitorous to thyself of regaining it; become poorer still, let go entirely of the lost possession, and strive then solely for the goods of the spirit, that thou mayest make others rich. Rich in blessing be every such hour, every such instant; thou dost not only do good to thyself, but thou dost make others rich, thou art bestowing a benefaction upon others.

And when thou hast become thoroughly poor, thou hast more and more made the goods of the spirit thine own. Then thou shalt also be in a position to make others rich by communicating the goods of the spirit, by communicating what in thyself is communication. The poorer thou dost become, the rarer will be the moments in thy life when thou art selfishly employed with thyself or with what in thyself is selfish, with the earthly which so attracts to it a man's thought that for the time being he does not exist for others. But the rarer such moments become, the more constantly will the hours of thy day be filled with acquiring and possessing the goods of the spirit (ah, forget not, ah, forget not this, that when thou art doing thus thou art making others rich!) or with directly communicating the goods of the spirit, and thereby making others rich.

Think of our Pattern, the Lord Jesus Christ! He was poor, but yet He surely made others rich! And indeed His life never expresses anything accidental, as though accidentally He was poor. No His life is essential truth, and therefore it shows that to make others rich one must himself be poor. This is the thought of the Deity, very dissimilar from the thought which entered into the heart of man — the thought of the rich man who makes others rich. For not only are the earthly goods not true riches, but the rich man, however free-handed he may be in giving of his abundance, cannot avoid having times when he is employed with his riches, and so far forth he is not employed in making others rich. But He was poor so long as He lived here on earth, therefore His business so long as He lived was, every day, every hour, every instant, to make others rich — Himself poor, the only labour He was engaged in was to make others rich, and just by being Himself poor He was employed in it wholly. He did not descend from heaven to become poor, but He descended to make others rich. But to make others rich He had to be poor. He became poor, not as though this befell Him once in His life, perhaps after being for a time rich. Yet He became poor, for this was His own free resolution, His choice. He became poor, and became such in every sense and in every way. He lived as expelled from human society, He (oh, what light-mindedness to jest with His reputation, oh, what inexcusable indifference to the judgement of others, oh, what insolence, which indeed must deservedly abase Him deeply, deeply in the eyes of all!), He consorted only with publicans and sinners. Thus He became poor to make others rich. It was not His purpose to become poor, but His purpose was to make others rich, hence He became poor. — Think of the Apostle Paul, who himself utters this saying: As poor we make others rich. The Apostle put up tranquilly with being poor, living in poverty, expelled from human society, without even having a wife to whom he belonged or who belonged to him — he put up with it tranquilly, and for what reason unless because he therein found the way to make others rich?

So then this is the joyful thing, that the poorer thou dost become, the richer thou canst make others. Oh, the fact that the world bereaves thee of everything, or that thou dost lose the whole world, is really of no importance, yea, it even is for the best, if only thou thyself dost count it for the best! Precisely at the moment of despair, when the need is greatest, help is nearest, the change which infinitely alters everything: that thou the poor man art the rich man — for after all the true riches is surely to make others rich. Thus in this instance also the joy is concealed. For (and it is with this we wish to end every one of these discourses, that it may be thoroughly clear not only what we are talking about, but clear that one must talk in an entirely different way about a thing which is eternally different) sin only is man's ruin.

IV. THE JOY OF IT — THAT THE WEAKER THOU DOST BECOME, THE STRONGER DOES GOD BECOME IN THEE

IMAGINE A GROUP of people who have come together for social intercourse; the conversation is in full swing, lively, almost violent, one man can hardly wait to have his say till the other is through with his, and everybody in the company takes part more or less actively in the debate — then in comes a stranger, who thus arrives in the midst of it all. Judging by the behaviour of the company and the loudness of the talk, he infers that the topic of conversation is one of great concern to them, and he courteously infers that it also must be a matter of considerable importance — and so with perfect calmness, since he has not been in the heat of it, he enquires what might be substantially the subject of their conversation. Imagine then that this, as often enough happens, was a mere trifle. The stranger is not in the least to blame for the effect he produces, he has courteously assumed that this was something of importance. But what a surprising effect, to become suddenly aware in this fashion that what for more than an hour perhaps had absorbed the attention of the whole company almost passionately is so unimportant that it hardly can be put in words, that it turns out to be a mere nothing — when a stranger calmly asks what the talk is about.

But a still stranger effect is often produced by godly talk when it is heard incidentally in the midst of the world's talk. Thus in the world there is plenty of talk about strife and strife and strife. There is talk about this man and that living in strife with one another, about that man and that woman, although they are united by the holy ties of matrimony, living in strife with one another, about the learned strife which has now begun between this man and that, about this one challenging another to a mortal duel, about there being a riot in the city, about the thousands of hostile troops which now are advancing against the country, about a European war which is impending, about the conflict of the elements which rages fearfully. Behold, it is this that is talked of in the world, day in and day out, by thousands and thousands; if in this sense thou hast anything to recount of a strife, thou wilt readily find hearers, and if thou shouldest wish to hear something, thou wilt readily find talkers. But imagine then that one of these talkers about strife took occasion to talk about the strife which every man has to strive... with God — what an astounding effect! Would it not rather appear to most people that it was he who was talking about nothing, whereas all the others were talking about something, or even about something very important? For, travel the world around, form acquaintance with the most various tribes, go about amongst men, enter into conversation with them, visit them in their houses, follow them to their meetings — and listen attentively to what they talk about; take part in the many, many conversations about the many, many countless ways in which a man may get into strife here in the world, take part in these conversations, but constantly in such a way that thou thyself are not the one to bring the subject up — and then tell me if thou hast ever heard anything said about this strife. And yet this strife is the affair of every man; there is no other strife of which it is true in the same degree that it is absolutely the affair of every man. For the strife between man and man — well, after all, there are many who live their lives peaceably without strife with anybody. And the strife between married people — well, after all, there are many happy marriages which this strife therefore does not concern. And after all it is a rare occurrence for a man to be challenged to a mortal duel, so this strife concerns very few. And even during a European war there are many, after all, yea, even if it was the most terrible war, there are still many — if not elsewhere, at least in America — who live on in peace. But this strife with God is absolutely the affair of every man.

This strife, however, is perhaps regarded as so sacred and solemn that for this reason it is never talked about. As God is not directly present so as to be noticed in the world, where on the other hand the immense multitude of the manifold attracts attention to itself, it is as if God did not exist at all — so this strife is perhaps a secret which every man has, but which is never talked about, whereas all the other things which are talked about attract attention to themselves, as if this strife did not exist. Perhaps it is so, perhaps.

But certain it is that every sufferer has occasion in one way or another to become aware of this strife. And it is to sufferers this discourse addresses itself. So let us talk about this strife, about

THE JOY OF IT — THAT THE WEAKER THOU DOST BECOME, THE STRONGER DOES GOD BECOME IN THEE.

For is it not true, thou sufferer, whosoever thou art, that this is indeed joyful? Still, here, as in all these discourses, everything depends upon how the situation is viewed. If the sufferer, despondent, low-spirited, perhaps in despair, would stare fixedly upon how weak he has become — no, there would be nothing joyful in that. But if he would look away from that, to perceive what it signified that he has become weak, who it is that becomes strong, that this is God — then that is indeed joyful. One sometimes hears a vanquished man say, ‘I was vanquished, I was the weaker one (this is the painful part), but what comforts, yea, delights me, is that after all it was he that conquered.’ Who is ‘he’? Well, it may be one whom the vanquished man loves, esteems very highly. The joy is certainly not complete, he would rather have been the victor; but he compels defeat to yield a joyful aspect, he congratulates the victor upon his victory. But then when He who triumphs is God — and here again it is merely an error of vision on the part of the sufferer if, fixing his gaze outwardly, he concludes that these are his enemies, his jealous rivals who become stronger; for it well may be that they become stronger, and that it is precisely their strength which makes him weak, but with this the sufferer has nothing whatever to do. He becomes weak; outwardly understood this means simply and solely that God becomes strong. So then, when He who conquers is God! To congratulate God upon His victory, to comfort oneself that it is 'He' who has conquered, oh, essentially that is to congratulate oneself upon victory! For in relation to God a man can truly conquer only in that God conquers.

First, however, let us endeavour to make it evident that the fact of a man's being weak signifies inwardly that God becomes strong in him. And this is what we first of all must beg of the sufferer, what we must require of him in order to be able to talk to him, that as promptly as possible he take his eye off the outward aspect, and turns his glance inward, lest his glance, and he himself along with it, become riveted upon an outward view of the relation of his sufferings to his surroundings. Then when this first thing has been done, when it has been made evident that God becomes strong in him — then surely it follows of itself that this is joyful.

A man who but rarely, and then only cursorily, concerns himself with his relationship to God, hardly thinks or dreams that he has so closely to do with God, or that God is so close to him, that there exists a reciprocal relationship between him and God: the stronger a man is, the weaker God is, the weaker a man is, the stronger God is in him. Every one who assumes that a God exists naturally thinks of Him as the strongest, as He eternally is, being the Almighty who creates out of nothing, and for whom all the creation is as nothing; but such a man hardly thinks of the possibility of a reciprocal relationship.

And yet for God, the infinitely strongest, there is an obstacle; He has posited it Himself, yea, He has lovingly, with incomprehensible love, posited it Himself; for He posited it and posits it every time a man comes into existence, whom He in His love makes to be something, directly in apposition to Himself. Oh, marvellous omnipotence of love! A man cannot bear that his ‘creations’ should be something directly in apposition to himself, and so he speaks of them in a tone of disparagement as his ‘creations’. But God who creates out of nothing, who almightily takes from nothing and says, ‘Be’, lovingly adjoins, ‘Be something even in apposition to me.’ Marvellous love, even His omnipotence is under the sway of love!

Hence the reciprocal relationship. If God were only the Almighty, there would be no reciprocal relationship, inasmuch as for the Almighty the creation is nothing. But for love it is something. Incomprehensible omnipotence of love! For in comparison with this omnipotence it seems as though one could comprehend better the omnipotence which creates out of nothing (which nevertheless one cannot comprehend); but this omnipotence, more marvellous than the genesis of all creation, which constrains itself and lovingly makes of the creature something in apposition to itself — oh, marvellous omnipotence of love! If thou wouldst but strain thy thought a little bit; it is not so very difficult, and it is so blissful. The omnipotence which creates out of nothing is not as incomprehensible as the almighty love which out of this which for omnipotence is nothing is able to make something which exists independently for love.

But just for this reason love requires also something of man. It never occurs to omnipotence that a man is more than nothing — he is nothing for omnipotence. People are inclined to think that it is the almighty God that requires something of men, and so perhaps that it is the loving God that abates the requirement a little. Oh, sorry misunderstanding, which forgets that God’s love must already exist in order that a man may in such wise be existent for God that there can be any question of requiring anything of him. If the Almighty were to require anything of thee, in that very instant thou art nothing. But the loving God who in incomprehensible love made thee to be something for Him, lovingly requires something of thee. In human relationships it is the might of the mighty which requires something of thee, it is his love which remits. But it is not thus with the relationship to God. There is no earthly mighty man for whom thou art nothing, therefore it is his might which makes demands; but for God thou art nothing, therefore it is His love which, as it made thee to be something, requires something of thee. They speak of the omnipotence of God crushing a man. But it is not so; no man is so considerable that God would need omnipotence to crush him, since for omnipotence he is nothing. It is God's love which manifests itself as love even at the last instant by letting him be something for it. Woe unto him if omnipotence turns against him.

So then, love, which made a man to be something (for omnipotence let him come into existence, but love let him come into existence for God) lovingly requires something of him. Here we have the reciprocal relationship. If a man would selfishly keep for himself this something which love made him to be, and would selfishly be something, then, in a worldly sense, he is strong — but God is weak. And it is almost as if the poor loving God were duped: with incomprehensible love God has gone ahead and made man something — and thereupon man dupes Him and holds on to this as if it were his own. The worldly man confirms himself in the notion that he is strong, he is perhaps confirmed in it by other people's worldly judgement to the same effect, perhaps by his presumed might he transforms the face of the world — but God is weak. On the other hand, if man himself relinquishes this something, the independence, the freedom to act for himself, which love bestowed upon him; if this perfection of his which consists in existing for God he does not abuse by taking it in vain; if God perhaps helps him in this respect by bitter sufferings, by taking from him his dearest one, by wounding him in the tenderest spot, by denying him his only wish, by depriving him of his last hope — then he is weak. That indeed everybody will say to him, and say of him, he will so be regarded by all, no one will make common cause with him; for it looks in fact as though he had become merely a burden which their compassion must bear. He is weak — but God is strong. He, the weak man, has relinquished entirely this something which love made him to be, he has whole-heartedly consented to it that God took from him everything there was to be taken. God only waits for him to give lovingly and humbly his glad consent, and therewith to relinquish it completely, then he is entirely weak — and then God is strongest. There is only one who can prevent God from being the strongest, who nevertheless is eternally the strongest; this one is man himself. That God is the strongest is evidenced by one sign, that man is entirely weak. For God there is but one obstacle, man's selfishness, which steps in between God and man like the shadow of the earth when it produces the eclipse of the moon. If there is this selfishness, then man is strong, but his strength is God's weakness; if the selfishness is absent, then man is weak, and God strong; the weaker man becomes, the stronger God becomes.

However, if this is so, then in another sense, in the true sense, the relation is inverted; and with this we come to the joyfulness.

For he who is strong without God, precisely he it is who is weak. The strength by which a man stands alone may be strength in comparison with that of a child. But the strength by which a man stands alone without God is weakness. God is in such a degree the strong one that He is all strength, is strength itself. So to be without God is to be without strength. So to be strong without God is to be strong... without strength; it is like being loving without loving God, and so to be loving without love, for God is love.

But in him who became entirely weak God became strong. He who worshipping and praising and loving became weaker and weaker, himself of less importance to God than a sparrow, as himself nothing, in him God is stronger and stronger. And the fact that God is stronger and stronger in him signifies that he is stronger and stronger. — If thou couldst become entirely weak in perfect obedience, so that loving God thou didst understand that thou art able to do nothing at all, then would all the mighty ones of the earth, if they were to unite against thee, be unable to hurt a hair of thy head — what prodigious strength! But in fact this is not true, and let us not say anything untrue. Indeed they certainly would be able to do this, they would be able even to put thee to death, and the great conjunction of all the mighty ones of the earth is by no means requisite to this end, a far, far inferior power can easily enough do it. But yet if thou wert entirely weak in perfect obedience, then all the mighty ones of the earth in conjunction are not able to hurt a hair of thy head otherwise than as God wills. And when it is hurt thus, when thou art reviled thus, when thou art put to death thus — if thou wert entirely weak in perfect obedience — thou wouldst lovingly understand that it does thee no harm, not the very least, that it is for thy true welfare — what prodigious strength!

And even if it were not so that he in whose weakness God is strong is the strongest man — this nevertheless is the joyful thing, that God becomes stronger and stronger, that it is God who becomes stronger and stronger. Let us talk of a relationship between man and man which has, though very imperfectly, something in common with that which in the relationship between man and God is the essence of worship, let us talk about admiration. Admiration is in itself duplex, it can be viewed from two sides. Its first phase is a feeling of weakness, for the admirer stands in relationship to superiority. But admiration is a happy relationship to superiority, and so it is a blissful feeling, perhaps it is more blissful to admire in complete unanimity with oneself than to be the object of admiration. That the first phase of admiration is a feeling of pain is evidenced by the fact that if one senses superiority and admits it unwillingly, not joyfully, he is very far from being happy; on the contrary he is very unhappy, is in the sharpest pain. On the other hand, so soon as he yields to the superiority (which yet at bottom he admires, but unhappily) and surrenders himself in admiration, the joyfulness of it triumphs in him. The more devoted he is, the more unanimous with himself in admiring, the nearer he comes to being almost superior to superiority; in his admiration he is happily and indescribably liberated from all the oppressive pressure of superiority, he is not overcome by superiority but triumphs in admiration.

Let us forget now the imperfection of the comparison of admiration as exhibited in the relationship of man to man, and worship in the relationship of man to God. God is infinitely the strongest; this every man believes, and, whether he will or no, he feels accordingly God's infinite superiority and his own nothingness, but so long as he only believes that God is the strongest, and (to make mention of the dreadful case) believes it as the devils also believe... and tremble; so long as he only believes it thus, and is loath to make the admission; so long as he only believes it in such wise that he is not glad of it — just so long is the relationship painful, unhappy, his feeling of weakness an agonizing perception. For defiance is in relation to worship what envy is in relation to admiration. Defiance is weakness and impotence which makes itself unhappy by not willing to be weakness and impotence, it is the unhappy relationship of weakness and impotence to superiority, just as envy tortures itself because it will not be, what at bottom it is, admiration. What is required of man is already hinted at in relation to admiration (for the admirer loses himself in admiration of the one who is so far greater); it is required that he shall lose himself in God. If he does this with his whole heart, with all his strength, and with his whole mind, then he is in a happy relationship to God as the strong one, then he is a worshipper — never, never did any lover become so happy, never, never did the parched earth sighing at the drought sense so deliciously the refreshing rain, as the worshipper blissfully senses God's strength. Now these twain, God and the worshipper, are adapted to one another, happily, blissfully, as never were lovers adapted to one another. It is now the only wish of the worshipper to become weaker and weaker, for with that the more worship; the only need worship feels is that God may become stronger and stronger. The worshipper has lost himself, and in such wise that this is the only thing he wishes to be rid of, the only thing he flees from; he has gained God — and so indeed it is directly in his own interest that God becomes stronger and stronger.

The worshipper is the weak man; so he must appear to all the others, and this is the humiliating part. He is entirely weak; he is not able like others to make resolutions for a long life, no, he is entirely weak; he is scarcely able to make a resolution for the morrow without adding, 'If God will'. He is not able to rely defiantly upon his own strength, his talents, his gifts, his influence, he is not able to utter proud words about all he is able to do — for he is able to do nothing at all. This is the humiliating part. But inwardly what bliss! For this weakness of his is a love-secret with God, it is worship. The weaker he becomes, the more genuinely he can pray; and the more genuinely he prays, the weaker he becomes — and the more blissful.

Is not this then joyful, that the weaker thou dost become, all the stronger does God become in thee, or, is it not joyful that thou dost become weak? Is there at bottom anything to complain of because a hard lot fell to thee, that perhaps which thou didst most dread and which made thee entirely impotent and weak? The weaker thou dost become, so much the stronger does God become in thee. And that this is joyful thou thyself wilt surely admit! Consider how poor a man would be if he could pass his whole life, proud and self-satisfied, without ever having admired any one; but how horrible a thing if he could pass his whole life without ever having marvelled at God, without ever having lost himself in worship through marvelling at God! But one can worship only by becoming oneself weak, thy weakness is essentially worship; woe to the presumptuous man who in his presumptive strength would be audacious enough as a strong man to worship God! The true God can be worshipped only in spirit and in truth — but precisely this is the truth, that thou art entirely weak.

So then there is nothing in the world to fear, nothing to fear in that which can bereave thee of all thine own power and make thee entirely weak, which can break all thy confidence in thyself and make thee entirely weak, which can completely sap thy earthly courage and make thee entirely weak — for the weaker thou dost become, all the stronger does God become in thee.

No, so understood, there is nothing in the world to fear — for sin alone is man's ruin.

V. THE JOY OF IT — THAT WHAT THOU DOST LOSE TEMPORALLY THOU DOST GAIN ETERNALLY

THAT THIS IS gain one can readily perceive, and so exorbitant a gain that never did any merchant who made the most profitable bargain ever make one so profitable as this. The difficulty lies in another place, in the place, namely, where the bargain, if I may so call it, has to be closed, in the fact that this place is temporal existence. If one were in eternity, one without doubt would be well able to understand it. But in temporal existence, and at the very instant of the loss, that is, when the temporal makes itself most keenly felt, it may easily seem perhaps that eternity is so infinitely far off, that the prospects are so remote for this indubitably extraordinary gain — and what then is the good of the great profit when there are difficulties like this? A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush; a little smaller profit seems preferable to the immense... uncertain gain. Yes, so it seems in temporal existence, which sees everything topsy-turvy. And there is hardly anything more topsy-turvy than the notion that the eternal is the uncertain, and hardly any shrewdness more topsy-turvy than that which lets go of the eternal because it is uncertain, and grasps the temporal... because it is the certain. For if one does not at once get an opportunity to discover that after all eternity was the certain thing — that the temporal is the uncertain one can promptly get an opportunity to perceive. Therefore hardly any talk is more ludicrous than when a man holds the temporal in his hand and says, 'I hold to the certain.' But, as has been said, the difficulty lies in the place where the bargain has to be closed. When death has already cleared things up for one, to make the exchange of time and eternity is easy; but in temporal existence to get the view-point of eternity for bartering time for eternity, the view-point of eternity for reckoning that what is lost temporally is gained eternally, that indeed is difficult.

The sufferer, however, has by another process become sensible of the difficulty of life, how difficult it is to bear his loss, with all the sorrow of it and the pain — so then, though the joyfulness... of loss which is proposed to him presents difficulties in its turn, this is nevertheless decidedly to be preferred. The difficulty is to get eternity brought a little nearer; when eternity is quite near the joy is quite complete. But this thing of getting eternity brought a little nearer is of decisive importance for every sufferer if he is to be comforted and if his comfort is to become joy. If medical science recognizes a miraculous cure-all, one for all illnesses, I do not know; but spiritually there is one, only one, exceedingly simple cure — eternity. The difficulty merely is to get it quite near. Observe that a child also can perhaps draw after a fashion, and one who is not an artist can also perhaps draw after a fashion, but all that they draw they draw straight up and down on the paper. Ask an artist what the difficulty is, and thou wilt hear him reply: 'The distance of perspective in the drawing'. In relation to eternity the difficulty is the reverse of this: eternity seems so far, the task is to get it as near as possible. For from the view-point of temporal existence it seems to the impatience of the unwise man (and the more temporal existence has to say about it, the less wisdom there is and the more impatience) as if instead of getting the lost thing again eternally he would have to wait an eternity to get it again. But if eternity is quite near to thee, it is true thou dost not yet get the lost object, for that comes about first in eternity, but it is eternally certain to thee that thou wilt eternally get it again. If such be the case, eternity is quite near to thee. How near it is may perhaps be elucidated for thee by another situation. A wise man has said, 'Every one who has deserved punishment fears punishment, but every one who fears punishment suffers punishment.' In a sense the guilty man has not yet suffered his punishment, in another sense it impends over him so near that he suffers it.

So let me try if possible to compel the sufferer for his own good to become joyful, compel him to get eternity as near as possible, while I talk about THE JOY OF IT — THAT WHAT THOU DOST LOSE TEMPORALLY THOU

DOST GAIN ETERNALLY.

For in fact only the temporal can be lost temporally; anything else but the temporal it is impossible for temporal existence to take from thee; when thou knowest that it is temporal existence as such which has taken something from thee, by that same token thou knowest that it must be something temporal it took. In case the dreadful thing occurs that a man in temporal existence loses the eternal, this is no longer a loss, it is perdition. 'Loss' relates to the temporal. It is assumed, when anything is to be said about loss, about the pain and suffering of loss — if one is to speak for comfort, encouragement and joy, it is assumed that the sufferer himself is not guilty (as mere loss does not imply) of 'forfeiting his soul'. If such a dreadful loss is occasioned by losing the eternal in time, one must talk very differently. So this discourse presupposes that the sufferer to whom it is addressed, however great the pain of his loss may be, has maintained relationship with the eternal, by means of which he is to be comforted. If the loss has acquired such power over the sufferer that 'his heart has sinned in its sorrow', that in desperation he would go to perdition, then one must talk quite differently. In the case of sin one must talk first and foremost with an aim to conversion, even when talking with an aim to comfort and joy; in the case of suffering one can at once talk of comfort and joy, even if the comforting speech is, as it is indeed if it is Christian, 'a hard saying'. And above all let us not forget that not only theft and murder and drunkenness and the like are sins, but that properly sin is: in time to lose eternity. One too often forgets this, yea, even the officially appointed pastors in the cure of souls are sometimes (and hence their failure) too much inclined to want to give comfort at once, without first, as becomes a physician, diagnosing the sufferer's condition. For as severity in the wrong place may be ruinous, so also leniency in the wrong place, leniency where the sufferer feels at bottom that one ought to speak severely, and therefore is disgusted not only with the comfort but with the comforter who shows that he does not recognize the ailment. Figure to thyself a woman, the most lovable of all women — thus we could imagine her. Along with her purity it would be abhorrent to think of what we call the grosser sins — oh, but vanity also, and pride, and envy, and arrogance are strangers to her lovable soul. She has lost her lover. In case she has said in despair, 'Now I care nothing either for God or for eternity', then certainly comfort, in the direct sense, would be the most ruinous thing of all. And though thou thyself wert never so deeply touched and moved at the sight of her pain, yea, if thou wert so full of sympathy that thou wouldst willingly give all, thy very life, in order to comfort her if possible — in case thou wert a pastor in the cure of souls, how terrible if thou hadst not the courage to employ severity! Or what judgement wouldst thou pass upon a physician who, because he himself had a horror for the fevered man's thirst, did not dare to forbid him to drink (yea, utter it only and hear the contradiction) — out of sympathy prescribed for him cold water, that is, out of sympathy slew him!

So then, when the sufferer, whatever he may have lost, is not himself guilty of disturbing dreadfully the divine order of things, only the temporal can be lost temporally. Because man has in him something eternal, therefore he can lose the eternal, but this is not to lose, it is to be lost; if there were nothing eternal in man, he could not be lost.

On the one hand this: only the temporal is lost temporally. On the other hand: only the eternal can be gained eternally. In case a man could be so presumptuous as to wish to gain the eternal temporally, this again is perdition. In case one were to grasp the eternal to have earthly profit from it, he is lost; in case one would buy the Holy Ghost with money, he is lost. And why is he lost? Because he temporally lost the eternal; for he lost the eternal precisely by wishing to abase it to the temporal. The purpose or the aim is always more important than the means. So if one would gain the eternal for the sake of earthly profit, the earthly profit is then more important to one than the eternal; but if this is so, one has lost the eternal; and when a man has lost the eternal he is lost. The eternal refuses to amalgamate with this talk of loss and loss; so soon as it is the eternal that is lost, everything is altered, even the language, and so this is (not a pert but) perdition.

Now let us draw these thoughts together (like a net) to catch joy, or to catch the sufferer for joy. If only the temporal can be lost temporally, and only the eternal can be gained eternally, the gain is indeed evident; in losing the temporal I gain eternity. O thou sufferer, whatsoever thou hast lost, thou hast lost only something temporal, it is impossible to lose anything else; and whatsoever thou hast lost, there is something to be gained, the eternal, which thou dost gain eternally. If thou dost not will to be lost (and if this is to be, thou must thyself will it), if in the depths of thy soul thou dost shudder at this thought, then both the stern seriousness of this thought and the shudder unite in guaranteeing that thou wilt not shun comfort by willing to be lost — then, however heavy thy loss, it will be made manifest that nevertheless the joyful thing is that what thou dost lose temporally thou dost gain eternally.

But perhaps thou wouldst say, ‘Will eternity give back to me the thing lost just as it was when my soul clung to it?’ Oh, no, certainly not, for then the discourse would not be, as it is, about gain — thou dost get it again eternally. However, there is perhaps a little cunning hidden in this question of thine. For in losing the object, it was in fact taken from thee, it was no act of thine; and from this it cannot be deduced that thou hast thoroughly willed to let it go. Perhaps (oh, be on thy guard!) thou art not far from willing to have eternity as a means of getting again in eternity the temporal possession just as it was in temporal existence, thine eyes' delight and thy heart's desire — this also is perdition. For, if such be the case, what thou wilt is not to gain the eternal eternally, but thou wouldst gain the eternal in order that it in eternity might give thee the lost temporal possession, that is, thou wouldst lose the eternal in order eternally to gain the temporal, and this means, temporally to lose the eternal, which is perdition. In case it was not earthly goods thou didst lose, in case it was that which smarts more painfully, in case e.g. it was honour thou didst lose, which slander stole from thee; in case thy whole soul clung to it with insatiable passion, so that it was thine only wish, thine only pleasure, to enjoy this satisfaction of vanity and pride, to be held in honour — this indeed eternity cannot give thee again. In case it was thy lover thou didst lose, of whom death bereaved thee, thy lover to whom thou wast attached with the intensity of all earthly passion, with the love of the one and only wish — thy lover whom thou (reflect how cruel it is!) wouldst prevent, if it depended upon thee, from becoming transfigured — no, in this wise eternity cannot give him back to thee! In eternity there is no pomp and splendour of worldly honour, and in eternity they neither marry nor are given in marriage.

But why dost thou ask about some individual thing in time which thou wouldst have again — unless it be because thy soul clings to it temporally? This discourse ventures to go much farther, makes the loss much greater, talks of temporal existence as a whole, of everything temporal — but also about letting go of the lost temporal possession. Why dost thou talk of an individual temporal thing — and so passionately? Ah, be on thy guard; it is as though thou wert at the point of willing to lose something temporal in an eternal manner, to fix a temporal loss eternally fast in thy soul, to remember eternally a temporal loss; this also is perdition. If anything temporal is lost in this manner, it cannot be due to the temporal, for the temporal can only be lost temporally. So it must be due to the loser — that he wills to lose eternally something temporal, that is, to lose temporally the eternal, that is, to be lost.

What thou dost lose temporally thou dost gain eternally. Thou dost not get it back in the temporal sense, that is impossible, and it would not be any gain; but thou dost get it back in the sense of eternity — if thou dost lose it temporally, that is, if thou thyself wilt not (ah, by willing to be lost!) transform the temporal into something other than it is. If something temporal concerns thee as if it were not the temporal but the eternal, the fault is not in the temporal thing (which according to its concept can only be lost temporally), but in thee. If the loss of the temporal concerns thee so much that in despair thou dost not even care to gain the eternal, this is not due to the temporal thing (which according to its concept can only be lost temporally), but to thee. That is to say, if thou dost not will to be lost (and in such case the talk about 'loss' is senseless), it stands fast eternally that what thou hast lost temporally (be it what it may, be it regarded also by all others as the heaviest loss, or only so regarded by thee in thy pain), that thou dost gain eternally.

This stands fast eternally; even though all devils and all hair-splitters were to contest with us, they would not be able to disprove this. If therefore thou dost lose an earthly friend, perhaps thine only one, or the best — in case thou dost not lose him otherwise than as temporal existence bereaves thee of him, that is, in case thou dost lose him temporally (in no other way can temporal existence bereave thee of him, unless thou thyself wilt be to blame for it, since temporal existence verily is not to blame), then thou dost gain him eternally. Thou losest thus an earthly friend — thou gainest a transfigured friend. For eternity does not give back to thee the lost temporal object in the temporal sense; no, precisely this is the gain of eternity, which gives back the lost object in the sense of eternity and eternally — unless (ah, consider what a wrong against the loved one!) by being lost thou wilt prevent thyself from receiving him back! In case it was earthly riches thou didst lose — in case thou didst lose them temporally (oh, remember that in no other way is it possible for the temporal to bereave thee of them); in case thou wert not thyself guilty of the dreadful thing of losing them in an entirely different way than the temporal can bereave thee of them, namely, by losing thyself; in case thou wast willing to let go of the temporal because thou didst understand the truth, that it was lost temporally — then thou didst gain the eternal. Thou didst lose the riches of the temporal — thou didst gain the riches of eternity. In case thou didst see thy dearest plan come to wreck in the world, the cause defeated for which thou hadst sacrificed thyself — in case thou didst lose only temporally (and remember that in no other way is it possible for the temporal to bring to naught any plan or any cause); in case thou thyself wast not guilty of the dreadful thing of suffering defeat in an entirely different way than the temporal is able to inflict it upon thee, namely, by losing thyself); in case thou wast willing to let go of the lost temporal thing because thou didst understand the truth, that it was lost temporally — then thou didst gain the eternal. Thou didst suffer defeat of the temporal — thou didst gain the victory of eternity. Dost thou not gain eternally what thou losest temporally? Would a man will to conquer here in time — well, then, the temporal defeat means to him that all is lost. But this is not due to time, it is due to him, on the other hand, if he triumphs over his mind, the loss then becomes what it is, a temporal loss, and he gains eternally.

Perhaps, however, some sufferer will say, ‘Well, but what I gain is not the same as what I lost.’ No, certainly not; this discourse in fact has to do with gain. And moreover, in case it was the same temporal possession thou didst get again, thou didst not lose it temporally. In so far as that which thou didst lose was compounded of the temporal and the eternal, the temporal took its part, and that thou didst lose; but the eternal it did not take away from that which thou didst lose, and that thou shalt get again in eternity. So then, thou dost get back the lost. Or did thy deceased friend lose anything by the fact that death took from him the temporal, when it was obliged nevertheless to let him keep the eternal? Does a proprietor lose by the fact that his property gains in value? — On the other hand, in so far as that which thou didst lose was something purely temporal, the temporal took it from thee, and thou didst lose the temporal; but in the loss thou didst gain the corresponding eternal good, which thou dost get again in eternity. Thus after all thou dost get that, precisely that, eternally which thou didst lose temporally.

Is not this then joyful, that wherever in temporal existence there is loss and the pain of loss, eternity is then at hand to offer the sufferer more than compensation? The sufferer himself is in fact compounded of the temporal and the eternal. So when temporal existence inflicts upon him the greatest loss it is able to inflict, the question is whether, by an act of treason against himself and against eternity, he will bestow upon the loss of the temporal the power to become something other than it is, a temporal loss, whether he wills to lose the eternal; or whether, true to himself and to the eternal, he does not permit the loss of the temporal to become something other than it is, a temporal loss. If he does this, then the eternal in him has conquered. To let go of the temporal in such a way that it is lost temporally, to lose only temporally the lost temporal possession, is a precise indication of the presence of the eternal in the loser, is the token that the eternal in him has conquered.

This triumphant joy is entirely non-existent for the sensual man; it entirely escapes his notice that all a man's conflicts here in this life are really waged about something entirely different than is apparent at the first glance. For, understood in a godly sense, it is always perfectly indifferent whether a man strives to make both ends meet in life, or whether he is marching at the head of thousands and thousands accompanied by the cannon's thunder, what the strife is waged for is always to save his own soul — whether he wills to lose the eternal temporally, that is, to be lost, — or by losing the temporal temporally to gain the eternal. That this is what is to be looked at entirely escapes the notice of the worldly man. Therefore when in temporal existence he suffers a decisive loss of the temporal, he despairs, that is to say, it then becomes evident that he was in despair. But he who in truth would save his soul looks at that which should be looked at, and precisely by looking at that he discovers at the same time the joy of it that what one loses temporally one gains eternally. Ah, and as the severity of the teacher is sometimes necessary, not to punish inattention, but to punish attention, to compel the pupil to look at that which should be looked at, instead of sitting abstractedly and being lured to look at all sorts of things — so must the fear of perdition help the sufferer to look at that which should be looked at, and thereby help him to discover the joy.

Only by the aid of the eternal is a man able to let go of the lost temporal possession in such a way that he merely loses it temporally. If the eternal does not lend its aid, he loses much more than the temporal. But if temporally to lose the temporal is an indication of the eternal in the loser, then eternity is indeed very close to him. At the outset the only ground for fear we saw was that the prospects of the compensation of eternity are so remote, this being all there was to prevent one from finding the joy in the fact that what one loses temporally one gains eternally. In the eternal certainty that this is so, eternity is as close to a man as is possible, and as close as is necessary. But when eternity itself lends its aid, if the loser loses only the lost temporal possession, eternity is indeed quite close. And if eternity is so close, so is this joy that what one loses temporally one gains eternally. Thou wilt not have to wait half a century in uncertainty to get back what was lost. Oh, no, that is only the way it appears in temporal existence, if thou hast not the will to let go temporally of the temporal loss. If thou hast the will to do that, then the eternal in thee has conquered, or the eternal has conquered in thee, then the eternal has visited thee, then to thee it is eternally certain that thou dost get it again, and then thou canst easily wait. Therefore never thrust the blame upon the length of time; for an eternal certitude shortens the time to one day, even though it were a century of waiting. Neither thrust the blame upon the temporal; for it took only the temporal from thee, nothing else and no otherwise can it take away. Above all, do not hasten impatiently to thine own destruction, alas, 'as a bird hasteth to the snare'. Seek the fault in thyself; consider seriously and severely how near perdition lies; consider that, as understood in the purely eternal sense, every temporal loss is an instant — if thou dost require a very long time to understand this, it is because the eternal within thee has not yet acquired strength enough. Let then the eternal come quite close to thee, then thou art helped, and then it is joyful to thee.

So then there is really no loss in the world, but sheer gain. For every 'loss' is temporal; but what thou dost lose temporally thou dost gain eternally, the loss of the temporal is the gain of eternity. Only sin is man's ruin. But precisely this is sin: to lose the eternal temporally, or to lose the lost temporal possession otherwise than temporally, which is perdition.

VI. THE JOY OF IT — THAT WHEN I 'GAIN ALL' I

LOSE NOTHING AT ALL

To GAIN ALL' — more than this nobody can demand; and if he gains all, it is clearer than day that he loses nothing at all.

And it is surely easy enough to perceive that this is joyful, every child can understand it instantly, yea, even the youth who most is agitated and rendered impatient by the hot aspiration of wishes, even he can at once understand it. If only he does not misunderstand it, and thereby misunderstand the whole discourse. For these discourses are not for the young, at least not for immediate use; only when life has furnished the youth with a text can he perhaps find use for them and better understand the theme.

But is it not strange that he who burns most hotly with the aspiration of youthful wishes, and he who in self-denial gave up the most, that these two unite in saying the same thing: 'To gain all', whereas between them there is nevertheless a world-wide difference, and they are as far as possible from talking of one and the same thing? In fact, God's Word by its promises encourages the believer 'to gain all'; and no youth, not even he who is most spoiled by having all his wishes fulfilled, has desired more than 'to gain all'. How strange! Just as in life there is a reversion when a man becomes again as a child, so in the language of thought there is a reversion through which the most different thoughts result, as it seems, in the same expression — and yet it is precisely then that the difference is greatest. There is absolutely no one so different from a child — not the little older, not the somewhat older, not the elderly man, not the aged man (all of this being direct comparison, where likeness is the point of departure for estimating the difference) — there is no one so different from the child as the aged man who becomes again a child; for this is inverse comparison, where everything is inverted, where the difference is the point of departure for estimating the likeness. And there is no one so different from a wisher, a hankerer, a desirerer who would gain all — not him who gave up little, not him who gave up somewhat, not him who gave up much (all this being direct comparison, so that he who gave up little, somewhat, much may quite well be a desirer who desires much, somewhat, little) — no, none is so different from a desirerer who would gain all, as he who gave up all — yet of that he does not talk, he talks, strangely enough, about gaining all, and therefore there is none so different from a desirerer who would gain all, as precisely the man who says the same thing.

But it is none the less certain that it is joyful to gain all, and that when I gain all I lose nothing at all. So let us talk of THE JOY OF IT — THAT WHEN I 'GAIN ALL' I LOSE NOTHING AT ALL.

For if the 'all' which I gain is truly all, then that which in another sense is called all, the all which I lose, must be the false all; but when I lose the false all I in fact lose nothing; and when I gain the true all, I lose in fact the false all — so I lose nothing.

Thou knowest perhaps that for an instant it looks as if one might fight this joyful thought through to victory in two ways. One might strive to make it perfectly clear to oneself that the all which one loses is the false all, is nothing. Or one takes another path, aspiring after the full conviction of spiritual certitude that the all which one gains is truly all. The latter procedure is the best, the only way. For in order to acquire the power to understand that the false all is nothing, one must have the aid of the true all, otherwise the false all takes away one's power. Verily it is not by the aid of nothing one can succeed in seeing that the false all is nothing. There is a pretended wisdom whose secret is nothing, and which yet thinks it can see that all is nothing. But this is impossible; it is just as impossible as to see in the dark with a light which is not lit. There is much said in the world about there being two paths to the truth: that of faith, and that of doubt. But this is quite as strange as if one were to say: there are two paths to heaven, one of which leads to hell. So 'the way' is to aspire after the full conviction of spiritual certitude that thou dost gain all. And what is it to aspire thus? It is to believe. Believe that thou gainest all, then thou dost lose nothing. Wish to gain all, desire to gain all, expect to gain all — and perhaps thou wilt lose all. But believe that thou gainest all, then thou dost lose nothing. For the all to which faith is related is the true all, so then thou dost lose nothing at all.

But as for believing! Oh, this is such a peculiar thing about Christianity: in a certain sense it is so unspeakably easy to understand, and on the other hand it becomes really difficult just at the moment when it has to be believed. I know well enough that a profound topsy-turvy worldly wisdom has inverted the relationship, affirming that it is so easy to believe, so difficult to understand. But only put this to a test. Take what we are here talking about. What is easier to understand than the proposition: When I gain all I lose nothing? And only when it has to be believed the real difficulty emerges. What is easier to understand than that the whole world must appear to a man as Christianity says it is, must appear thus... when he is dead, dead in self-denial. But to become dead to the world! This thing of 'when one is dead to the world'!

Believe that thou gainest all, therewith thou diest unto the world; and when thou art dead thou dost lose nothing by losing that which in the understanding of the living man is all. Lose gold and goods, lose might and power, lose glory and prestige, lose health and strength, lose thy best friend, lose thy well beloved, lose more than did that king who yet spoke of losing all when he said, 'All is lost save honour' — believe that thou gainest all, and then thou dost lose nothing! That when thou gainest all, it is impossible to lose even the least thing — oh, nothing is more certain, only believe then that thou gainest all! This is — I have to admit it — an unequal division of labour: that the discourse has only the task of saying the same thing over and over again (it is in fact to say the same thing when one says, ‘He who gains all loses nothing,’ for to gain all and to lose nothing is one and the same thing), whereas thou hast the task of grasping faith, and by believing to hold fast to it that thou dost gain all — oh, but then the discourse does not possess thy joy! Poor discourse! In a sense it does not budge from the spot, it says only one and the same thing; in another sense it hovers helplessly between heaven and earth, for if it is not a certainty that there is one man who believes, then the discourse is empty. Therefore it is not the believer that needs the discourse, but rather it is the believer that pityingly comes to the relief of the discourse. For every time a man believes that he gains all, the discourse becomes true, then the empty and meaningless discourse, which is so all too easily understood, becomes so full, so rich, in a favourable sense so difficult — but so true.

Believe that thou gainest all, then thou dost become a dead man. Just as ghosts flee before the dawn, and apparitions collapse when their name is uttered, and enchantment ceases when the magic word is spoken — so to thee does the world and what the world calls ‘all’ become nothing. Then lose the world and every pleasure it possesses, lose its friendship, let it become thine enemy which chases thee out of every refuge, thine enemy which hates thee: believe that thou dost gain all — and thou dost lose nothing! The world must hate a deceased man; there is nothing contemporaries more hardly endure in a contemporary than that he lives like a departed spirit. In a room it is disturbing when a blind man walks about and cannot see what he bumps against; but a believer is likewise a blind man, his eyes are blinded by the splendour of the all which he gains, he cannot see anything of the all wherein the world has its life and its pleasure, he can see nothing of this all because he has seen that it is nothing. Oh, mad inconsiderateness of faith, which out of consideration for the true all has become blind to all considerations! In a company it is disturbing when a deaf man is present who cannot hear what the others say and nevertheless takes part in the conversation, inasmuch as he is to be heard transforming the talk of the others into nonsense; but a believer is likewise a deaf man, his ears echo with the glory of the all which he gains, he can hear nothing of the all wherein the world has its life and its pleasure. Oh, mad inconsiderateness of faith, which out of consideration for the true all has become deaf to all considerations! But believe that thou dost gain all, and thou dost lose nothing.

Yes, believe that thou gainest all. Behold that expert scientist, he had all his calculations completed, he had perhaps spent many years getting all this studied out and put together, it was all in order — he was waiting only for a point outside the earth, and he would be man enough to hoist the whole earth by means of... the calculations? — yes, or by means of the point. So long as he has not the point, all his calculations, the fruit of many years of diligence, are an impotent nothing — and the discourse about the truth that when one gains all one loses nothing, yea, even though the speaker were a man who had pondered his whole life long only over this thought, or over this only thought, and though of all eloquent speakers he were the most eloquent, and though he had the whole structure of his eloquence complete — it is an impotent nothing, if there is no one who believes that he gains all. And if there is this believer who believes that he gains all — he loses nothing, nothing at all, even if he never chances to hear a word of all this eloquence.

Oh, victorious joy of faith! But can the discourse accomplish nothing because it cannot give thee faith, because in comparison with faith it is not the higher (as a wisdom which is higher only than... madness would make us believe) but is the lower thing? Yes indeed, it can tell thee how blessed it is to believe. For when one believes, he gains all; to gain all is precisely to believe, to believe that one gains all; and when one gains all one loses nothing. In relation to divers losses in life there is perhaps a special insurance company which provides compensation; but what security against all losses, that with them all one loses nothing! It is indeed like being secured against death by being deceased. If the desirous youth were to gain all, what security has he that he may not lose it? But oh, what security in gaining all, that one gained it by losing all — and yet lost nothing!

And he who lost the true ‘all’, only he truly lost all. But this is perdition; only sin is man’s ruin.

VII. THE JOY OF IT — THAT MISFORTUNE IS GOOD FORTUNE

MISFORTUNE IS GOOD fortune. ‘But this’, I hear some one say, ’is merely a jest, and easy enough to understand, for if only one will look at everything in an inverted way, there is some sense in it: directly understood, misfortune is misfortune; inversely, misfortune is good fortune. Such a thing is only jesting, like propounding riddles, or as when a mountebank says, “Nothing can be easier to do if only a man is accustomed to walk on his head instead of on his legs.”’ Well, yes, but for all that is it then so easy to do? And because to the thought which is untried by the reality of life and experiences no weight, it seems so easy to swing up and down and down and up, both to the right and to the left — is it then so easy when misfortune weighs upon the thought which is to make the swing, is it so easy when the thought has to have power enough to turn him about who is suffering when misfortune persists in maintaining him in the contrary position? That is to say, for the idle and masterless thought, some sort of thought in general, the homeless thought which is no thought, the thought which buffets the air with indeterminate determinants and undefined definitions, ‘here — there,’ ‘right — left,’ ‘direct — inverse’ — for the vagrant thought it is easy enough to perform the trick. But when there is a concrete thought, when it is my thought, or when it is thy thought, and... when thou art a sufferer, so that it becomes a serious matter for the thought which easily enough can turn itself to acquire power over thee so as to turn thee about in spite of the much which in manifold ways resists its efforts — is this then so easy? And because it is a jest to be able to walk on one’s head instead of on one’s legs, is it therefore also a jest to look at everything inversely? Oh, far from it, or better, exactly the inverse is true, precisely this is seriousness, the seriousness of eternity. That which is a jest, a meaningless jest, so long as it is merely some sort of thought in general — when it becomes serious owing to the fact that it is thy thought, the thought which has to turn thee about, that then is precisely the seriousness of eternity. Eternity, which after all is surely the task and the surety of seriousness, says, 'This is the task, for this precisely is my view of life, eternity's view of life, to see everything inversely; and, thou sufferer, whoever thou art, if seriously thou wilt be comforted, comforted in such wise that even gladness triumphs, then thou must let me, eternity, come to thine aid — but then thou must also look at everything inversely!' This is eternity's comfort for the sufferer, the law which eternity prescribes, the condition which eternity makes, to which all the promises are attached. For eternity knows of but one method: to look at everything inversely. So let us then look at the situation inversely, and thereby find THE JOY OF IT — THAT MISFORTUNE IS GOOD FORTUNE.

But let us proceed in such a fashion that we strive first to get the sufferer in the right attitude, so that he may get an eye for this inverted prospect, and that he may be willing to abandon himself to this view and permit it to exercise power over him — then surely the joy follows of itself.

What is good fortune? Good fortune is what helps me to attain my goal, what leads to the goal; and misfortune is what would prevent me from attaining my goal.

But what then is the goal? Hypothetically we have made the one thought fast by defining what good fortune and misfortune are; but when we come to define the other thought (that of the goal) it is easily seen that in case this goal is different, is the opposite, the notion of good fortune and of misfortune must be altered in accordance with it.

We stand here at the beginning. But in another sense we are not standing at the beginning. The discourse addresses itself to a sufferer. But the sufferer is not beginning his life now; on the contrary, he is in the midst of it, alas, not merely in the midst of life, but in the midst of life's suffering. Such being the case, he must surely know what misfortune is, being himself sufficiently tried by it. Perhaps. But we are agreed that the question whether and how far he knows what misfortune is depends upon whether he knows what the goal is. Only he who has the true notion of what is the goal set before men, only he knows what misfortune is and what is good fortune. He who has the false notion of the goal has also a false notion of good fortune and misfortune, he calls that good fortune which leads him to... the false goal and so prevents him from attaining the goal (the true goal). But that which prevents one from attaining the goal is in fact misfortune.

Now there are divers things that can be striven after by men, but essentially there are only two goals: one goal which a man wishes, desires to attain; and another which he ought to attain. The one goal is that of temporal existence, the other is that of eternity; these are contrary the one to the other, but good fortune and misfortune must also be inverted in correspondence with them. If this discourse were addressed to a young man, it would strive to make the distinction of the two goals thoroughly clear to him, so that he might begin his life by choosing the right goal, begin by heading in the right direction. And yet perhaps the discourse might not be successful; for the soul of the youth will be on terms of suspicious intimacy with the temporal goal and with the false notion of good fortune and misfortune. And now for the sufferer, who does not stand at the beginning but is far advanced on the way and knows, alas, only too well what misfortune is; but, as has been said, the question is whether he also knows well what is the goal. The more vehemently he talks of his suffering and of how everything is against him, the clearer it becomes that he has the false notion of the goal. And if he has the false notion of the goal, he cannot talk truly about good fortune and misfortune.

So if he is to be helped, he must be required to reflect what is the goal set before men, lest, deceived by the vain notion that he knows well what the goal is, he continue to complain. For doubtless thou dost suffer misfortune, thou art unable to attain the goal thou didst so ardently wish to attain — but suppose then that this goal is the false one!

What then is required? It is required of the sufferer that he call a halt to his erring thought, that he reflect what the goal is, that is to say, it is required of him that he turn himself about. For in relation to sin conversion is required; in relation to the comfort of eternity the same is required, yet in the milder form, that one turn oneself about: for the severity of the law says to the sinner, 'Be converted'; to the sufferer eternity says, Oh, do but turn about.' So it is required that he turn about. Here already eternity shows itself to be the converse of temporal existence. For eternity presupposes that the natural man does not in the least know what the goal is, that on the contrary it is the untrue notion which is presupposed by temporal existence, that every man knows with ease what the goal is, so that the only difference that remains between man and man is whether they succeed or not in attaining it. On the contrary eternity assumes that the difference between man and man is that the one knows what the goal is and steers for it, the other does not know, and steers accordingly, that is, steers amiss. Thou sufferer, whoever thou art, thou findest it only too easy to make people understand thee when thou complainest of thy suffering — even if they have no comfort to give thee, they understand thee none the less — but eternity will not understand thee thus; and yet it is by eternity thou art to be helped.

So turn about! Oh, permit it to be said to thee — good Lord, it is in fact so evident that if a man is to attain the goal, he must know which the goal is and be rightly headed for it; it is so evident that if a man is to be gladdened by the magnificent view, he must turn towards the side where it is to be seen, not to the opposite side. Be not impatient, say not, ‘I know perfectly what misfortune is,’ make no attempt to terrify us too by the description of thy suffering, so that we too might turn to the wrong side and miss the view. For if thy suffering is so terrible, why then wilt thou fix thy gaze upon it? Or is this precisely the terrible thing, that thou canst not help gazing upon it? Yet it is not impossible. Say not, ‘When one suffers as I suffer, one knows what misfortune is; and only he who suffers as I suffer knows what misfortune is.’ No, say not this; oh, but listen well. In order not to wound thee we do not deny that thou knowest what misfortune is, what we are saying is that thou dost not yet know what the goal is.

And then when thou hast turned about and got an eye for the goal (that of eternity), let the goal become to thee so important, as indeed it is and ought to be, that there is no question about what sort of a path it is, but only whether it leads to the goal, so that thou mayest have courage to understand that whatever the path is, be it the worst of all, the most painful of all, in case it leads thee to the goal, it is good fortune. It is true, is it not, that if there is a place where it is of the utmost importance for thee to arrive because thou art so unspeakably eager to be there, thou wouldst say, ‘Whether I run backwards or forwards, whether I ride, or walk, or crawl — that is perfectly indifferent, if only I can get there.’ First and foremost this is what eternity would have, it would make the goal so important to thee that it acquires complete control over thee, and thou over thyself, to the effect of getting thy thought, thy mind, thine eye diverted from the hardship, the difficulty, from the how of getting there, because the only important thing for thee is to get there.

So then, in deference for the goal it has now become indifferent to thee whether what brings thee to the goal is what ordinarily is called misfortune or what ordinarily is called good fortune: what brings thee to the goal is good fortune. What an alteration! Dost thou think that the sensual man could be indifferent to this difference? What comfort would it be to him that misfortune led him to the goal, when he is only concerned about the goal to which good fortune leads?

But perhaps thou canst not yet forbear to glance back at the distinction ordinarily made between misfortune and good fortune. Thou hast acquired the right attitude but hast not yet come to repose in it. Well, eternity will help thee on farther. For if it is precisely what people ordinarily call misfortune which alone or principally leads to the goal, is there then any reason for glancing back? If it were the case, as we may assume, that it was only or most effectively by running backwards thou couldst get to the place where thou art so eager to be, would it then be the correct thing to say, ‘Whether I run backwards or forwards is a matter of indifference to me’? Would it not be more correct to say, ‘So it is well that I had to run backwards’? And so, too, in case it were possible that what is ordinarily called good fortune might more easily lead thee to the goal, there would be room for a wish. But now, thou sufferer, there is nothing to tempt thee, for misfortune is leading precisely to the goal. And thou surely wilt be true to thy word, that whatever leads to the goal is good fortune. So misfortune is good fortune.

Let us now make it quite clear to ourselves that what they ordinarily call good fortune and misfortune do not equally well lead to the goal, but that what ordinarily is called misfortune does alone or at least principally lead to the goal. What is it that may prevent a man from attaining the goal? Why precisely the temporal. And how does it most seriously prevent him? When good fortune so called leads him to the attainment of the goal of temporal existence. For when by means of good fortune a man attains the goal of temporal existence, he is farthest from attaining the goal. Man is to strive for the goal of eternity, but by means of good fortune temporal existence has delayed him. By the fact that good fortune accompanies him he is not

led to the eternal, and so not to the goal. If there is anything that does this, it must be exactly the reverse, namely, that the temporal goes against him. But the opposition of the temporal is what one is accustomed to call misfortune. — When it is said, ‘Seek ye first the kingdom of God,’ the goal of eternity is thereby posited as that for which man shall strive. If this is to be done, and done according to the letter (and, ah, eternity will not be mocked, nor be deceived!), it is required above all that man seek not first something else. But what is this ‘something else’ he seeks? It is the temporal. If then he is to seek first God’s kingdom, he must freely renounce every temporal goal. Oh, what a difficult task! when opportunity perhaps is proffered in abundance, when everything beckons him on, when what they call good fortune is ready promptly to bring him into possession of all the pleasant goods of temporal existence — and then to renounce all this! On the other hand, the sufferer has misfortune, hence he is called a sufferer. And what they call misfortune hinders the sufferer from attaining the temporal goal; misfortune makes it difficult, perhaps impossible. Oh, how hard a thing it is to see difficulties pile up before the wish, how hard that the fulfilment of the wish is thus rendered impossible! Is it not true? That indeed is a question I need not put to thee. But is it not true (ah, would to God it were so) that it is rather thou who wouldst now put to me the question, whether I myself have not now forgotten what the discourse is about. So then do tell us (it was only this I was wishing for), only tell us what the discourse is about, while I listen with joy and hear thee say, ‘If what they call good fortune is what delays, what prevents one from attaining the goal, then indeed it is well that what they call misfortune makes it difficult or impossible... to be delayed, then it is misfortune precisely which brings one to the goal.’

O thou sufferer, whosoever thou art, break away from the sufferings and from the thoughts which would obtrude upon thee, try to think of life quite impartially. Imagine then a man who is in possession of all the good things of fortune, favoured in every way — but imagine that this man moreover was serious enough to have fixed his mind upon the goal of eternity. So he understands that all this that has been bestowed upon him he is to renounce. He is also willing to do it; but, behold, there awakens in his soul a despondent concern, an anxious concern about himself, as to whether after all he may be deceiving himself, whether his renunciation is only imaginary, inasmuch as he remains in possession of all these goods. He dare not throw away what has been bestowed upon him, for he understands that this might be an exaggeration of presumption which easily might be his ruin, instead of being for his good; and he has sadly conceived an anxious suspicion of himself, whether he might possibly be deceiving God, and all his renunciation be a sham. Then he might well wish that they were taken away from him altogether, so that it might become a serious affair, this thing of giving up the temporal to grasp the eternal. And if this does not come to pass, there perhaps develops in his inward man a mental disease, an incurable melancholy, which has its ground in the fact that in a profounder sense he became perplexed about himself.

Hast thou thought of this? Yet for thee especially it would be an appropriate point of view, putting thee at the farthest distance from thine own. Contemplate thy situation from this point of view! Thou hast had indeed and hast misfortune in plenty — so thou hast merely the task of renouncing what is denied thee, whereas this man has the task of renouncing what has been bestowed upon him. In the next place, thou art exempted from anxiety as to whether thou hast given it up in an outward sense; for since thou dost not possess it, the job is easy enough. And in how many other ways thou art helped! That is denied thee which would prevent thee from attaining the goal, thou hast not thyself thrown it away and therewith incurred the responsibility which perhaps at a decisive moment would make thy life so very difficult because thou didst find thyself powerless in the face of a task thou hadst voluntarily undertaken. No, in thy case providence has assumed all the responsibility, that is to say, the providence which denied thee this. Thou hast only to come to the help of providence, of this providence which has helped thee. For misfortune is good fortune, and thou indeed hast misfortune.

So then, misfortune is good fortune. This is perfectly certain, not all the shrewdness of Satan shall be able to put it in doubt. And also thou canst well understand it. On the other hand, thou dost not perhaps believe thoroughly that it is so. But dost thou believe then (for the sake of providing a somewhat weaker diet, in case what the Scripture says about seeking first God's kingdom is too strong), dost thou believe then that the poet whose songs delight mankind, dost thou believe that he could have composed these songs if misfortune and bitter suffering had not been at hand to tune the soul? For it is precisely in misfortune,

When the heart of man is saddest,
The harp's tense strings are gladdest.

Or dost thou believe that he who knows how to comfort others would have been able to do it if misfortune had not been for him the requisite good fortune which helped him to proficiency in this fine art? Perhaps at the beginning he also felt it hard enough, almost cruel, that his soul should be tortured in order that it might become inventive in finding out comfort for others. But at last he learned to understand that without misfortune he could not have become and could not be the man he was; he learned to believe that misfortune is good fortune.

So believe thou too that misfortune is good fortune. To understand it is easy enough — but to believe it is difficult. Be not deceived by the vain wisdom which would make thee imagine that it is easy to believe but difficult to understand. But believe it. So long as thou dost not believe it, just so long does misfortune remain misfortune. It is no help to thee that it is eternally certain that misfortune is good fortune; so long as thou dost not believe it, it is not true for thee. Think of an older person in relation to a child. The older person knows the expedient for dealing with a nettle: only grasp it firmly, and then it will not sting thee. To the child this must seem the most absurd thing; for, thinks the child, if one is stung merely by touching it, how much more when one grasps it tight. One tells this to the child. But when the child is about to grasp it his courage fails — he grasps it nevertheless, but not firmly enough, and it stings him. So it is with the saying that misfortune is good fortune: if thou art not resolute in faith, thou dost get nothing out of it but misfortune.

Believe then that misfortune is good fortune. This is certain, it is only waiting for thee to believe it. Be not disturbed in thy faith by others, 'the faith which thou hast, have thou to thyself before God' (Rom. xiv. 22). When the seaman is assured that the wind which now blows is carrying him to the goal — even if all others were to call it a contrary wind — what does he care, he calls it a fair wind. For a fair wind is the wind which carries one to the goal; and good fortune is everything which carries one to the goal; and misfortune carries one to the goal — so misfortune is good fortune.

It is not necessary to demonstrate that this is joyful. He who believes that misfortune is good fortune has truly no need of the discourse to explain to him that this is joyful. And for him who does not thoroughly believe, it is of more importance not to waste an instant but to lay hold on faith. So we need not talk about it, or say more than one word. Imagine then a chase, as it were, extending over the whole world, which has driven and collected together all the grounds of comfort which, as I believe, happy people have invented to be rid of the unhappy; and then in comparison think of the comfort of eternity, this concise word of comfort which distress has discovered, as it also has discovered that it takes a person in distress, a sufferer, not a happy person, to comfort others — this concise word of comfort: misfortune is good fortune! It is true, is it not, that thou wilt regard it as quite just, and in a certain sense well advised, that the human grounds of comfort do not pretend to make the sorrowful joyful, but merely undertake to comfort them after a fashion, which they do badly enough. Eternity, on the contrary, when it comforts, makes a man joyful, its comfort is really joy, is the real joy. In the case of human grounds of comfort it is as when the sick man who already has had many physicians gets a new one who perhaps hits upon something new which for a moment produces a slight change, whereas soon it is the same old thing again. No, when eternity is called in to look after the sick man it not only heals him completely but makes him sounder than all the sound people. In the case of human grounds of comfort it is as when the physician finds a new and perhaps slightly more convenient crutch for him who walks with crutches: to give him sound feet to walk with, and strength in his knees, surpasses the power of the physician. But when eternity is called in, the crutches are thrown away, the man cannot merely walk, oh, no, in another sense it may be said that he no longer walks — so lightly does he go. For eternity gives him feet to walk with. When in misfortune it seems impossible to budge from the spot, when in the impotence of suffering it is as if one could not move a foot — then eternity makes of misfortune good fortune.

In all misfortune there is but one danger: when the sufferer will not believe that misfortune is good fortune. This is perdition, only sin is man's ruin.

PART III

FROM THE JOURNAL

THE FIRST IDEA of the following Discourses.

There should be written several Discourses (about Dec. 28, '47).

Thoughts which wound/attack from behind — to edification.

'Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of the Lord' (Ecclesiastes).

[A note in the margin refers to an earlier entry, of about Aug. 16, which reads: Ecclesiastes v. 1, 'Keep thy foot, etc.', could very well be used for a sermon in contrast to the lax way of preaching which is busy only with getting people to come to church. Beware of going thither. It is a grave responsibility if subsequently thou dost not do according to what is preached, and if the sermon is rightly preached, thou mightest perhaps receive an impression which thou canst not later overcome, an impression of what God requires of thee: self-denial, etc. Hence beware!

This shall be the introduction.

Then in the succeeding Discourses the text shall be so chosen that it looks like a gospel, and also is such, but then comes the sting.

No. 1. 'What shall we have who have forsaken all?'

The satirical point for us in this question — for us who have not yet forsaken anything.

No. 2. All things work together for our good — if we love God. (Irony.)

No. 3. The resurrection of the dead is at hand, both of the just and of the unjust.

Rejoice, thou hast no need to ask for the 'three proofs' — it is certain enough that thou art immortal — it is perfectly certain — for thou shalt be brought before the Judgment. This is a new argument for immortality.

No. 4. It is blessed — to be mocked for a good cause. (Rejoice when men speak all manner of evil against you.)

So then, rejoice — but perhaps there is no one present to whom this Discourse applies. Thou, my hearer, dost rejoice perhaps at being highly honoured and esteemed and respected. Well then, for thee it is a meal like that of the stork with the raven.

The satirical ‘Woe unto you if all men shall speak well of you.’ Here the ‘falsely’ is not added, for if all men speak well of thee, it must be a lie.

No. 5. ‘Now is our salvation nearer than when we first became believers.’ But art thou sure that thou hast become a believer?

No. 6. He (Christ) was believed on in the world (I Tim. iii. 16).

But this perhaps is only a bit of historical information.

THOUGHTS WHICH WOUND FROM BEHIND — FOR EDIFICATION CHRISTIAN ADDRESSES BY S. KIERKEGAARD

COPENHAGEN 1848

The Christian cause is in need of no defense, it is not served by any defense — it is aggressive; to defend it is of all misrepresentations the most inexcusable — it is unconscious crafty treachery. Christianity is aggressive; in Christendom, as a matter of course, it attacks from behind.

I. KEEP THY FOOT WHEN THOU GOEST TO THE HOUSE OF THE LORD

HOW QUIET EVERYTHING is in the house of God, what a sense of security. He who enters it feels as if by a single step he had arrived at a remote place, endlessly far away from all noise and outcry and vociferation, from the horrors of existence, from the storms of life, from the spectacle of dreadful events or from the sickly expectation of them. And here within, wherever thy glance is turned, everything gives thee a sense of security and peace. The lofty walls of the venerable edifice stand so fast, are such a reliable defence around this secure place of refuge, under whose mighty vault thou art free from every sense of pressing weight. And the beauty of the environment, its grandeur, is calculated to make upon thee a friendly impression, it is so inviting that it is as if the holy place would ingratiate itself with thee, by recalling also the good and quiet ages which presumably must have favoured these enterprises of peace. Behold, the man who carved these pictures in stone needed a long time for it, and during all this time his life must have been protected and secure, so that no one conflicted with him and nothing happened to him which in any way could render his hand or his thought uncertain. As an artist he needed the profoundest repose of peace — what he produced is therefore a reminder of that repose. Behold, he who wove the velvet with which the pulpit is adorned must have had repose to sit quietly at his work, which flourishes in times of peace and is not needed in time of war. And the woman who sewed the gold upon it must have been allowed to sit undisturbed and diligent at her work, solely employed with it and with sewing every stitch with equal care.

How comforting, how inviting — ah, and how much danger in this security! Wherefore it is verily true that really it is only God in heaven who in the actuality of life can preach to men with effect; for He has circumstances, has fates, has consternation in His power. And circumstances — and when 'thou' art in them, when they enclose 'thee' as the party properly concerned — yea, their eloquence is piercing and awakening. That thou hast experienced too. In case thou wast the sick man who at the hour of midnight lay sleepless upon the sick-bed, or in case thou wast merely the one that sat at the midnight hour beside the sick man's couch of pain and with alarming distinctness counted every tick of the clock and every sigh of the sick man, but without finding relief in the uniformity or in the mechanical exercise of counting — if then thou didst hear that pious song, 'It was upon the midnight hour our Saviour he was born:' dost thou believe that all orators put together would be able to produce this effect? And why not? Because the sick-bed and the hour preach more mightily than all orators, and understand this secret of speaking to thee in such a fashion that thou dost get an apprehension that it is thou, precisely 'thou', not him that sits beside thee, not him out there, but precisely 'thou' that art spoken to, thou who dost feel thyself alone, alone in the whole world, alone at the midnight hour beside the sick-bed. Or in case a man lies in extremis, and fairly and honestly they have not concealed from him that which people desire to conceal from the dying man, the thing most important for him to know, that it is all over — dost thou not believe that the simple comforting word of the most commonplace man will produce an entirely different effect than is produced by all the most famous orators upon him who, sound and healthy, in his own thoughts also spiritually hale, sits secure in the gorgeous temple and hears... and perhaps criticizes the address. And why will that simple word produce an entirely different effect? Because death knows how to make itself understood by the man to whom it applies, knows how to make thee understand that it is 'thou', that thou art the individual in question, that it is not anybody else, not thy neighbour or thine opposite neighbour, or another man here in the town, but it is thou who art to die.

So it is in the actuality of life when it is God that preaches by means of circumstances to awaken. But in the house of God, in the splendid house of God, when the parson preaches... to tranquillize! Especially if he would satisfy human requirements, or what it is the fashion to call the requirements of the times. For whereas men in these times are becoming more and more apprehensive, more and more afraid for their own part of experiencing the dreadfulness of reality when they are delivered over into the power of circumstances, on the other hand, they are becoming more and more fastidious in their desire for the trumpery of eloquence. They will not seriously listen to the dreadful happenings, they would rather read about this afterwards, very much as when in times of peace the warriors, or rather the non-warriors, play at war; they would artistically require everything that has to do with the beauty of the environment, and artistically require everything of the speaker, but for themselves, with a worldly and ungodly mind they would sit perfectly secure in the house of God, because they well know that no orator has the power which providence has to lay hold of a man, to cast him off into the power of circumstance, to let the desperation and trials and alarms of it preach seriously to him for awakening.

Oh, in the customary course of life there is so much to lull a man to sleep, to teach him to say, ‘Peace and no danger.’ It is for this cause we go into the house of God, to be awakened out of sleep and to be riven away from enchantments. But then again when there is so much in the house of God to lull us! Even that which in itself is arousing, such as thoughts, reflections, ideas, can by custom and monotony lose all their significance, just as a spring can lose the resilience which makes it what it is. So then (to approach nearer to the subject of this discourse), it is right, reasonable, and a plain duty, to invite men, over and over again, to come to the house of the Lord, to summon them to it. But one may become so accustomed to hearing this’ invitation that one loses all sense of its significance, so that at last one stays away and it ends with the invitation preaching the church empty. Or one may become so accustomed to hearing this invitation that it develops false ideas in those that come, makes us self-important in our own thoughts, that we are not as they who remain away, makes us self-satisfied, secure, because it envelops us in a delusion, as though, since we are so urgently invited, God were in need of us, as though it were not we who in fear and trembling should reflect what He may require of us, as though it were not we who should sincerely thank God that He will have dealings with us, that He will suffer and permit us to approach Him, suffer that we presume to believe that He cares for us, that without being ashamed He will be known as one who is called our God and our Father.

So concerning this matter let us for once talk differently, in talking of these words of the preacher:

KEEP THY FOOT WHEN THOU GOEST TO THE HOUSE OF THE LORD.

Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of the Lord, for thou dost assume an immense responsibility. Remember that here is One who is in heaven — and thou art upon earth. But do not imagine that in His exaltation He is far away: herein lies the seriousness and responsibility of the situation, that He, the infinitely exalted, is quite close to thee, closer than the men who are about thee daily, closer than thy most trusted friend before whom thou dost feel free to show thyself for what thou art. Exaltation and distance seem to correspond one with another, so that he who is exalted is remote from thee; equality and nearness seem to correspond one with another, so that he who is near thee is also thine equal; but when exaltation is quite close to thee, then thou art in a difficult position. It is precisely God, however, the infinitely exalted, who in the house of the Lord is quite close to thee in His exaltation; for it is not with God as with a man, who essentially becomes less exalted when he comes close to thee, the lowly person, has dealings with thee; no, God can come quite close to the lowliest and is none the less highly exalted. Oh, the seriousness of eternity! Oh, how difficult the position! For it is true doubtless that when it is merely a stranger that is present, thou art somewhat changed, and when the mightiest and most exalted in the land is present, thou art much changed, because he is so exalted, and because he is so rarely seen. But God in heaven is exalted in an entirely different degree, and yet when thou goest up to the house of the Lord, God in His infinite exaltation is quite close to thee, nearer than thou art to thyself, for He understands and discovers even the thought of thine which thou thyself dost not understand. Oh, what an immense weight of responsibility, that He, the infinitely exalted One, before whom thou wouldst prefer to show thyself at thy best, that He, in spite of His exaltation, is quite close to thee, sees thee — and in spite of His exaltation sees thee closely, as not even he sees thee who every day is in thy company! Even if thou, in consideration that thou art presenting thyself before the Most High, wouldst try to show thyself different from what thou art, thou canst not — He is too infinitely exalted for that, and (here it is again) He is too close to thee for that. If a man can lose his self-possession and forget what he was about to say when he is brought face to face with his Royal Majesty — ah, how dreadful to be brought face to face with God! For his Royal Majesty is neither so exalted, nor can he come so close to thee.

Therefore beware when thou goest to the house of the Lord. What wouldst thou do there? Thou wouldst invoke the Lord thy God, extol Him and praise His holy name. But is that then really and in all seriousness thine intention? Language, as thou knowest, has no expression more solemn which can be used to exact sincerity than this which one man employs in addressing another: ‘Before God is this thy conviction or opinion?’ And in the house of the Lord thou art indeed before God. Is then this invocation of thine, which invokes God, sincere in its intention? And what is sincerity before God? It is that thy life expresses that which thou sayest. We men may be content with less, with the fact that the one solemnly protests to the other that this or that is his sincere intention. But God in heaven, He who is infinitely exalted, or (yes, here we have it again) He who is the searcher of hearts, He who is quite close to thee — God is willing to understand only one sort of sincerity, namely, that a man’s life expresses what he says. All other sincerity, all other solemnity, all mere protesting that a man means what he says, is before God an illusion, a falsehood; such an invocation is presumption towards Him. Beware lest thine invocation, instead of being wellpleasing to God, is presumption towards Him. Beware lest, self-deceived, because thou dost not understand thyself, thou dost presume to deceive God, as if in thy heart thou didst have the pious feelings which yet have not the power over thee to change thy life, to make thy life the expression of these feelings. Oh, we men often complain of the lack of words and expressions for our feelings, that language will not come to our aid, that we have to search for words, and generally in vain — before God such considerations need not give thee concern; if only thy life expresses that thou hast these feelings, then thou art indeed sincere before God, and that chatty sincerity is entirely superfluous.

Or perhaps thou goest up to the house of the Lord to pray God for help and assistance. Beware what thou doest. Hast thou rightly and before God comprehended to whom thou art appealing for help, what it means to invoke God’s aid, what obligations it puts thee under? Is it perhaps with regard to childish concerns, insignificant things, thou wouldst invoke His aid — not that He might help thee to forget them, but with the will to be employed about them — with regard to insignificant things which perhaps tomorrow thou hast forgotten, and with this perhaps hast forgotten the by no means insignificant fact that thou hast invoked the aid of the Most High — then thou hast mocked God... and He forgets not that thou didst invoke His aid. If a physician becomes impatient, and with good reason, when childish parents summon him for every insignificant complaint, so that the whole thing is over when he arrives, and it is almost forgotten for what cause he was summoned — should God Almighty wish to be treated thus? Or darest thou understand thyself to mean that it is God that should serve thee, that He, the Most High, should be punctually at hand to hear thy prayers and fulfil thy wishes? Ah, if thou wouldst have to do with Him, it is thou that art thereby put absolutely under obligation to obey and to serve Him. And if thou dost not understand this, it is presumptuous to have dealings with Him, it is presumptuous to invoke His aid. Yes, certainly He is the Almighty and can do everything He would; it looks almost temptingly as if thou hadst nothing to do but wish. But beware. No rash word so surely involves its own punishment as a rash prayer, and no word involves such obligation as the prayer which cries to God for help; for this puts thee under the obligation to let thyself be helped as He will. Thou canst pray a man to help thee, and have forgotten it when he arrives with the help; thou canst pray a man to help thee, and when he is unwilling to help thee in the way thou wouldst be helped, thou canst say, 'This is not what I prayed for' — but if thou hast prayed to God for help, thou are under obligation, under obligation to accept the help He thinks best. Ah, there is so often heard this cry for help, and this cry that there is no help — verily there is always help enough. But the human heart is so cunning and so untrue to its word; when the help proves to be what one has most shuddered at, one says, 'But this is no help.' And yet if this help is from God, and if thou hast prayed to Him for help, thou art under obligation to accept the help, and with faith and gratitude to call it help.

Or perhaps thou goest up to the house of the Lord to pay thy vows unto God and to pledge thyself to a purpose, a resolution, for the future — beware what thou doest. Hast thou thoroughly comprehended what it means to promise God something, and considered whether what thou dost promise God is something a man can and dare promise God, that it is not something we men might jokingly promise one another, that it is something God will permit thee to promise Him — otherwise it is presumption. And hast thou comprehended how a promise to God binds thee? ‘A promise is a snare,’ they say — but a promise to God, yea, if it is what it ought to be, and results as it ought to result, it is so far from being a snare that it is rather a leading-string to salvation. But if not! If thou dost not comprehend what thou dost promise God, if thou hast not a true notion of what one can and dare promise God, then thou dost lose God, thou dost pamper thy soul to the point of taking God lightly and in vain. And if thou dost not keep thy promise to God, thou dost lose thine own self. Ah, and there is certainly one whom a man cannot escape: himself — and then one more... God in heaven!

Beware therefore when thou goest to the house of the Lord, consider the words of the Preacher: ‘Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thy heart be hasty to utter anything before God; for God is in heaven, and thou upon earth: therefore let thy words be few. When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it; for He hath no pleasure in fools: pay that which thou vowest. Better it is that thou shouldst not vow, than that thou shouldst vow and not pay.’

Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of the Lord. For perhaps thou mightest learn to know much more than thou dost really wish to know, and perhaps thou wilt there get an impression which later thou wouldst fain seek to be rid of. Beware of the fire: it burns.

It is heard again and again, and it is regarded in the world as a positive fact, that men would gladly know the truth if only they had the talents and the time for it, and if one could make it thoroughly clear to them. Oh, superfluous reason for concern! Oh, cunning evasion! Truly every man has enough talent to know the truth — could God in heaven be so inhuman as to have put any one at such a disadvantage? And every man, even one who is most deeply engaged in affairs, truly has time enough to learn to know the truth, nothing is more certain, for he shall have time. That the busy man has just as little time as the idler is no refutation of this! And since every one has talent and time enough, it cannot be so difficult a thing to make it clear, in case man himself will have it made clear. But just here lies the difficulty: it is so easy to put the blame upon lack of talent, upon lack of time, and upon the obscurity of the truth, and then on the other hand it makes so fine an impression and is so comfortable to protest that one would so gladly know the truth.

Verily, verily it is not so. He who has but some acquaintance with himself knows well out of his own experience that it is rather true that at the bottom of his heart a man has a secret dread and mistrust of the truth, a fear of getting to know too much. Or dost thou really believe that it is every man's sincere wish to get to know effectually what self-denial is, to get it made so clear that every excuse, every evasion, every palliation, every appeal to the false but favourable opinion of others is cut off from him? Indeed, I do not need to wait for thy reply; for if such were the case, every man would possess self-denial, for this (the understanding of it) is its first form. Oh, but even a man of the better sort, one who has overcome the first shudder at the truth and is not worldly enough to be altogether loath to get to know it — even he, he who also admits sincerely that he knows well from his own experience that one is not so eager to learn to know the truth — even he, or rather he especially, will indubitably admit that over and over again he has had reason to suspect himself of hiding from the truth, as Adam hid among the trees, that he quietly steals away from something and steals to something, that he sometimes would slip away into obscurity where there is only twilight, rather than that the truth should make things too luminous round about him.

Beware therefore when thou goest up to the house of the Lord; for there thou wilt hear the truth... for edification, yes, that is true, but beware of the edifying, there is nothing so gentle as the edifying, but there is nothing so imperious; the edifying is least of all loose talk, there is nothing so binding. And in the house of God thou dost get to know the truth — not from the parson, whose influence thou canst, and in a certain sense shalt evade, but from God or before God. Precisely this is the seriousness of the truth, in fact is the truth, that it is before God thou dost get to know it; what is of pre-eminent importance is this: 'before God.' In God's house there is One along with thee who knows that thou hast come to know the truth. Beware of this complicity in knowledge; from this thou shalt never again slip back into ignorance, that is to say, thou dost not slip back guiltlessly, nor dost thou slip out of the consciousness that thou art guilty.

Beware therefore of learning to know too much, lest with this thou shouldst learn that the asseveration which, while thy life went on pleasantly in the strength of it, made thee pleasing in thine own eyes and agreeable in the eyes of others, that the asseveration that thou art so fain to learn the truth, that this is a mere fancy, or, even worse, that it is a falsehood. Beware lest in the house of God thou dost get to know — but this indeed thou knowest, thou dost even perhaps exalt thyself for thy much knowledge above the simple orator who would talk about such old-fashioned things which every child knows — but beware lest in the house of God thou dost get to know it in such wise that thou must understand it: that it may be required of thee that in self-denial thou shalt give up all that in which the natural man has his life, his pleasure, his diversion. Hast thou considered what it is to be weary of life? Weariness with life results when a man is deprived of all the finite while yet he is allowed to hold on to life, when everything around him becomes waste and empty and cheerless, and time so unspeakably long, just as if he were dead — why yes! that is what self-denial calls dying, dying to the world; and the truth teaches that a man has to die to the finite (to its pleasures, its occupations, its pursuits, its diversions), has to pass through this death to life, has to taste (thus they speak of 'tasting' death) and apprehend how empty is that with which business fills up life, how unimportant is that which is the eyes' delight and the fleshly heart's desire — ah, the natural man understands it in exactly the opposite way, he thinks that the eternal is the empty. There is surely no instinct so strong in a man as that by which he clings to life — when death comes we all beg that we may live: but the dying of self-denial is as bitter as death. And in the house of the Lord thou dost learn to know the truth that thou must die to the world; and if (as is unavoidable) God has come to know that thou hast come to know this, then to all eternity no evasion shall avail thee. Therefore beware when thou goest to the house of the Lord.

Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of the Lord. For even if thou hast come from the most dreadful experience that ever befell a man, fleeing from the horror without into God's house — yet thou dost come to a still more dreadful place. Here in the house of God the subject talked about is a danger the world does not know, a danger in comparison with which all that the world calls danger is child's-play: the danger of sin. Oh, here in God's house what essentially is talked about is a horror which never was encountered before nor will be later, in comparison, with which the most terrible thing that can befall the most unhappy of all men is an insignificance: the horror that the race crucified God.

What wilt thou then in God's house? Is it poverty that brings thee, or illness, or another adversity, in short, any sort of earthly need and misery — about that nothing is said in God's house, at least not first. What first is talked of, and should first be talked of, is sin, of the fact that thou art a sinner, that before God thou art a sinner, and that thou in fear and trembling at this thought shalt forget thy earthly need. Truly, a singular way of comforting! Instead of enquiring sympathetically about thy welfare, instead of giving thee counsel and advice — if for this reason thou hast sought refuge there, thou hast made a mistake, thou hast come in fact to what is even more dreadful. For instead of finding sympathy with thy earthly misery and people busy to relieve it, there is laid upon thee a still heavier weight, thou art made to be a sinner. So this is what is talked about — and truly to edification — that there is salvation for sinners, comfort for the penitent. But perhaps all this does not apply to thee, to thee who in fleeing hither art solely concerned about thy earthly suffering. And yet it does apply to thee, in vain wilt thou say that it does not apply to thee, though thou wouldst go hence, it is in vain: it was said to thee, God knows along with thee that it was said, and that thou didst hear it!

What wilt thou in God's house? Perhaps thou didst suffer injustice, possibly thou art the innocent, the lovable man, and yet perhaps men deceived thee perfidiously; possibly thou art the noble, the good man, possibly thou shalt one day be reckoned among the benefactors of the race, and yet as a reward for this perhaps men thrust thee out of their society, maltreated thee, insulted thee, perhaps sought thy life — and thou didst flee hither to God's house in search of comfort. Whoever thou art, thou art making a mistake — thou hast come here to what is more dreadful! Here in God's house it is not a question, at least not first, of what we men may suffer in this world by way of a little bit of injustice, which in some other way at least we have richly deserved. No, here in God's house it is first and foremost a question of the horror the like of which was never seen and shall not again be seen in the confusion of the world, about the injustice which cries to heaven, such as never before was committed and never shall be again, more dreadful than the sea at its wildest, an occasion when the human race did not as usual rebel impotently against God, but triumphantly as it were laid hold of Him and crucified Him. So he is after all making a mistake who from the horror without flees into this place — to something still more dreadful! Yet the talk first and foremost must be about this. The figure of Him, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, must be recalled — not as when the artist finds and takes plenty of time to represent it, not in such wise that it is removed from the environment of horror and set apart as an object for tranquil contemplation. No, He is to be remembered as at the moment of danger and horror, when the tranquil contemplator would prefer to remain at home, when to have looked upon Him in adoration or merely lovingly would make one an object of suspicion, when there was nothing to behold except this contemptuous, 'Behold, what a man!' when there was not even time to behold Him, because the horror took away one's eyes from one and riveted them staringly upon itself. And Christ's suffering is not to be remembered as a past event — oh, waste not thy sympathy! No, when this horror is represented it is a present fact, and thou art present, and I, with a present One — and as accomplices.

But thus thou didst go amiss in going to the house of the Lord. Instead of hearing comfort which might console thee for the injustice thou dost suffer, instead of being justified as against the men who do thee injustice, instead of this thou art put in the wrong, thou, precisely thou who art innocently persecuted, insulted, wronged! What thou dost get is guilt, an atrocious guilt laid upon thy conscience, that thou art an accomplice to His innocent suffering and death. Oh, hard words of comfort! Who can bear them? Oh,

Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of the Lord — and why? Just because in the house of the Lord there is offered thee the only, the most blissful saving comfort, the very highest is offered thee, God's friendship, His grace in Christ Jesus. Hence we should not cease to invite men to come at least into the house of the Lord, we should always be ready to pray, in behalf of others as well as for ourselves, that our visit to the house of God may be blessed; but just for this reason, for this very reason, we should not hesitate to cry out to men, 'For God's sake, beware! Above all, take care to use worthily what is there offered thee — just because there is everything to gain, there is everything to lose. Use it believingly.' There is no assurance so heartfelt, so strong, so blissful, as that of faith. But the assurance of faith is not something one is born with, the youthful trustfulness of a joyous mind; still less is faith something one grasps out of the air. Faith is the assurance, the blissful assurance, which is found in fear and trembling. When faith is seen from the one side, the heavenly side, one sees in it only the bright reflection of blessedness; but seen from the other side, the merely human side, one sees sheer fear and trembling. But thus the talk is untrue which never will talk otherwise of the visit to God's house than invitingly, enticingly, winningly; for as seen from the other side it is dreadful. And hence also the talk is untrue which ends at last with scaring men completely away from coming to the house of the Lord, for seen from the other side it is blissful, one day in God's house is better than a thousand elsewhere. Oh, and for this reason it is a difficult thing to steer aright, and hence a man seldom succeeds, and always only in weakness. For it is easy to win men enticingly; it is also easy to scare them away repellently — but if possible with a heartiness which no one could resist to invite them to come, and at the same time, with a fearfulness which would teach even the boldest to shudder, to cry, ‘Beware!’ — yea, that is difficult. And the same thing applies to the speaker, the very same rule which he applies to the hearers. For it may be said to the speaker, ‘Employ all the talents bestowed upon thee, being ready for every personal sacrifice and compliance in self-abnegation, employ them to win men — but woe unto thee if thou dost so win them as to leave out the dread; employ therefore all the talents bestowed upon thee, being ready for every sacrifice in self-abnegation, employ them to terrify men — but woe unto thee if essentially thou dost not employ them to win men for the truth.

II. BEHOLD, WE HAVE FORSAKEN ALL AND FOLLOWED THEE; WHAT SHALL WE HAVE THEREFORE? (Matt. XIX. 27) AND WHAT SHALL WE HAVE?

THE WORDS HERE quoted are those of the Apostle Peter, uttered in view of Christ's assertion how hard it is to enter into the kingdom of God. And the conclusion of the question concerns us all: what shall we have, what does Christianity promise us? But then as for the beginning of the question, 'we have forsaken all and followed thee,' does that also concern us? Most assuredly. But does it then fit our case? Perhaps. It is possible that various expressions may be fitting to various people. Blessed is he whom these words fit perfectly, that is, blessed is he who can dare to say: I have forsaken all to follow Christ. Yet in another way also these words might fit perfectly — as a mockery of those who think and say that they are Christians, and yet cling with their whole soul to the worldly interests. One might seek to show by a more ample presentation of the subject that such Christianity is a vain imagination, is a deceit; but one can state the case more briefly, and yet in a way which would be less likely to fail of its effect, by merely adducing these words of Peter, 'Behold we have forsaken all and followed thee' — they fit perfectly!

People often talk of how glorious it is to be a Christian, of the great advantage of being a Christian, of what he who is a Christian possesses and one day shall receive in fuller measure, of what good things are promised a man in Christ Jesus; and these good things are then extolled in the loftiest and strongest terms. And this is also a matter of course, it is right and reasonable, it is a plain duty to do so. But one can say the same thing, the very same thing, in another and perhaps a more arousing way. Oh, and which of the two speakers really speaks most truly of this good: he who describes it in the most glorious terms; or he who says, ‘Behold, I have forsaken all for the sake of this good’? Thus he does not say anything about how glorious the good is, to this end he does not employ or waste a single word, he thinks that this speaks more effectively: ‘Behold, I have forsaken all, look, examine my life, its outward condition, my soul’s inward state, its wishes and longings and desires, and thou wilt perceive that I have forsaken all.’ Or is this not also a very suspicious self-contradiction, that a man should be perfectly convinced of the glory of that good which yet did not have so much power over him that for its sake he forsook the least of all that which is in strife with or cannot be possessed together with this good? Is not this a capital way of proving how glorious this good is to one, that one shows how much one has forsaken for the sake of it? In case there was a lover who with the most beautiful and glowing expressions extolled his lady’s perfection and superiority, and there was another lover who said not a single word about this, but only, ‘Behold, for her sake I have forsaken all’ — which of these two spoke most gloriously in her praise? For nothing runs so fast as the tongue, and nothing is easier than to let the tongue run, and only this is equally easy: by the help of the tongue to run away from oneself, in what one says to be many, many thousand miles ahead of oneself. If therefore thou wouldst extol Christianity — oh, do not wish for thyself the tongues of angels, nor the art of all the poets, nor the eloquence of all orators: in the same degree that thy life shows how much thou hast forsaken for the sake of it, in that same degree dost thou extol Christianity. And if we would give proof of our Christian conviction, supposing that we are really assured and convinced of the glory of this good which Christianity promises, let us not seek in one or another orator a happy presentation which we are entirely in agreement with and make our own, nor, if we are orators, attempt for ourselves to extol in word and speech the glory of this good. But let us turn our glance within, and while we sincerely test our life, listen to these words of Peter as said of us, ‘Behold, we have forsaken all’ — and thereupon utter for ourselves the last words: What shall we have?

‘Behold, we have forsaken all and followed thee.’ In these words the Apostle does not represent himself as a man who has had a great loss in the world, a man from whom perhaps God has taken away everything — he is not a Job who says, ‘The Lord hath taken away.’ No, the Apostle uses a different expression; he says, we have ‘forsaken’ all. This Job did not do, Job had not forsaken the least thing; on the other hand, the Lord took from him everything, even unto the least. Job’s piety appears in this, that when the Lord had taken all, he said, ‘Blessed be the name of the Lord,’ that therefore humbly and in faith he thankfully consented to put up with the loss, or to regard it as for his good. Otherwise with the Apostle, he has forsaken all, and so he has voluntarily given up all; no might was employed against him to take away from him even the least thing, no, but he voluntarily gave it all up. This is Christianity. For that a man puts up with the unavoidable loss is also to be seen in paganism. That a man puts up with an unavoidable loss in such a way that he not merely does not lose faith in God but believingly adores and extols His glory, that is Jewish piety. But voluntarily to give up all is Christianity.

Oh, there often is heard false talk which would make men believe that to give up voluntarily the earthly goods would be to tempt God, that to venture voluntarily to encounter a danger which one could avoid would be to tempt God. They think that this is tempting God, and so they say in condemnation of one who thus gets into danger, ‘He is himself to blame for it.’ Yes, quite certainly — he is himself to blame for it, and this precisely is a eulogy upon him. If he had shrewdly held back, and for fear of tempting God had allowed himself to make a fool of God, he would presumably have remained out of danger, in the secure possession of all he possessed. But the Apostle says, 'Behold, we have forsaken all,' and so far from thinking of reproaching himself for this, he evidently accounts it to his credit, as something that must please God. But that goes without saying when he adds, 'and followed thee' (Christ); it is a matter of course that if one gives up all and forsakes everything to follow his own nose, he is tempting God.

On the other hand, it is actually true that Christianity requires the Christian to give up and forsake all things. This was not required in Old Testament times, God did not require Job to give up anything, and of Abraham he required expressly, as a test, only that he give up Isaac. But in fact Christianity is also the religion of freedom, it is precisely the voluntary which is the Christian. Voluntarily to give up all is to be convinced of the glory of the good which Christianity promises. In a cowardly and apprehensive spirit not to dare to venture this for fear of tempting God implies a spirit of slavery; cunningly to pretend that it is because one is afraid of tempting God is to make a fool of God. There is one thing God cannot take away from a man, namely, the voluntary — and it is precisely this which Christianity requires of man. God is able to take away from a man everything; but He has left it to man to give up everything voluntarily, and precisely this is what Christianity requires. In a human sense it can be said of all the glorious ones who gave up all to follow Christ, that it was their own fault that they got into all these troubles and adversities, were exposed to all sorts of scoffing and persecution, it was their own fault that they suffered death. Once (yes, this is to be said in the ears of the world in disparagement of them, in God's ears to their honour) it was in their power to hold back, to avoid all these dangers; but voluntarily they forsook all. This is Christianity — and hence it is an offence. For at the most the world can comprehend that one may be able to hit upon some small comfort for them that suffer the unavoidable loss. But that one should voluntarily expose oneself to loss and danger, in the eyes of the world that is madness — and precisely that is Christianity.

This thing of voluntarily forsaking all to follow Christ, which the world neither can nor will hear without being offended, is also the thing which so-called Christendom would rather have suppressed, or if it is uttered would so much prefer to ignore, in any case would hear in such wise as to get something different out of it. Hence it is not impossible that even a discourse which had the intent of terrifying might have a lulling effect. Thus one could represent it as so terrible, as indeed it is, when in those remote ages of Christendom, the ages of persecution, a man perhaps ventured out and would be a martyr, and then, possibly after having suffered in manifold ways and for a long while, at last, at the moment of mortal danger, in sight of the painful death, he lost courage, gave up — he abjures Christianity. So this ought to be terrifying, as indeed it is. But where then is the possibility of the lulling effect? The lulling effect is or would be produced by the wrong application, if it were added, or if it were tacitly left to the hearer to add for himself: We have not thus denied Christ — we, we who perhaps with cowardly shrewdness know well how to keep out of every danger in which our Christianity might be tested. Ah, and which sort of denial is the worst? Surely it is precisely this latter sort, the cowardly, shrewd and calculating denial, continued from year to year, protracted throughout a whole life, steadily, daily (oh, how terrible to comply thus with Christ's requirement of daily self-denial!), the daily denial of Christ. Well, of course, this denial is not conspicuous (at least not in a theatrical sense — to the searcher of hearts, the ever-present, it is surely just as conspicuous) as when such a luckless wight at the decisive instant of the painful death denies Christ. But there can be no doubt which is the worst. There still is, and always will be, salvation and hope for every man whose sin became notorious, salvation is all the nearer, the more terrible the form in which his sin must be visible to him. But for this cunning game of shrewdness there is no salvation: its secret consists precisely in maintaining that one has not denied Christ. That there is some distinction between sin and sin, everybody knows; but there is a distinction which people do not always seem to be sufficiently aware of, that namely between the sin of the instant, or sin at the instant, and the continuous daily sin, of a life which consciously and with a full view of the situation has adjusted itself to sin, providing itself moreover with the hypocrisy requisite for preserving the appearance of goodness. The proverb says, 'To sin is human, but to continue in sin is devilish,' and yet this about which we are speaking is even more terrible, this thing of consciously adjusting oneself shrewdly to sin, or if not with complete consciousness of it, at least with the consciousness that one conserves in the soul an obscurity about that which for good reasons one does not want clarity. — That there is some distinction between sin and sin, everybody knows; but there is a distinction which people do not always seem sufficiently aware of: between the sin which the world regards as abhorrent, and that which the world regards as the Good, or for which at least it has mitigating and extenuating names. The latter sin is obviously the worst; for it is impossible that the sin which the world regards as sin can be the worst — in that case the world itself must be good. All sin is of the evil, but the sin for which the world has in readiness the mitigating name is even in a stricter sense from the evil, is sin in the second potency, having support and countenance in the evil which is the sin of the world. There is therefore no sin so heinous in God's eyes as the sin of shrewdness, precisely because it has the countenance of the world. Or, to stick to the example which was adduced, what is it, if the world were to be sincere, what is it the world condemns in such a luckless wight who at the decisive moment denies the faith, what is it really but just this, that he was so lacking in shrewdness as to venture so far out that his denial could in such a decisive way become notorious? So it is his first act, the beginning, that is condemned; but it is precisely the beginning that was good; he who does not begin thus never reaches the glorious end of proving himself true to his conviction by a painful death. It is the sin of shrewdness to sin in such a way that one knows cunningly how to avoid punishment, yea, knows cunningly how to give this the appearance of the Good; the sin of shrewdness is cunning enough to avoid every decisive act, and thereby to win the distinction of never having denied — this the world regards as something far above the ordinary. For verily the world does not hate the evil, on the contrary it abhors and hates the man who lacks shrewdness, that is to say, it loves the evil. 'Behold, we have forsaken all and followed thee' — and we, what shall we have?

'Behold we have forsaken all and followed thee.' The Apostle Peter is no stripling who somehow at the beginning of his life talks in an enthusiastic fashion about this thing of forsaking all things. He himself knew perfectly well what he understood by it, and we know how true it was at the time he said it, and how true it remained in his subsequent life, how true it is that the Apostle had forsaken all.

He forsook his customary occupation, the quiet, homely life which, content with a modest competence, was passed in security; he forsook the tranquillizing reliance upon the probable, within which a man for the most part passes his life, untried in anything but in that which for the most part turns out all right in the end — he forsook the certain and chose the uncertain. For Christ, on whose account and in order to follow Him he forsook all, was no man of means who could give His disciple something certain as a yearly stipend, or could secure for him an assured position and a living — He, the poorest of all, He who so far as his own life was concerned was sure of only one thing: that He would be sacrificed! But as soon as Christ called him, he forsook all this, as we read in Matt. iv. 20.

This was a magnanimous resolution, and we must not think of Peter, a man like us, as one for whom there was never an instant when the lower nature was ready to suggest misgivings and anxieties; for the truly great man is not thus, he is not without anxieties and misgivings, but he is what he is precisely by overcoming them. Nevertheless, he formed this magnanimous resolution to forsake all things. But the difficulty for the magnanimous man is always a double one: first, to triumph within himself over the lower and earthly; then, when this is done, there comes the next difficulty, that in every age the contemporaries find the magnanimous act so silly and foolish. For that a man chooses a life whereby he gains many advantages (a thing by no means magnanimous) the world admires; but that a man gives up all advantages, even that of being honoured by the world (which precisely is magnanimity), the world finds ludicrous. — Peter forsook all the certain things and chose the uncertain, to be a disciple of Christ, a disciple of Him who Himself had not whereon to lay His head. Peter chose the uncertain — and yet, no, he did not choose the uncertain. He to whom he attached himself was no adventurer who kept the possibilities equally open: the possibility of becoming something great in the world, and the possibility of losing everything. Christ did not leave the disciples in uncertainty about what awaited them and Him — certain destruction. So then Peter chose certain destruction.

He forsook family and friends and comrades, even the very conceptions and ideas in which they had their life, he became to them more of a stranger than one who speaks a strange tongue. For there is a still higher and more endless difference between two persons, one of whom thinks and speaks only of the heavenly, of the kingdom of God and of His righteousness, the other only of sustenance and livelihood and wife and children, and what news there is in the town, and about coming to something in the world. He forsook all this, notwithstanding that at the beginning his family and friends found it in their language queer and eccentric of him, therefore transformed themselves into enemies who mocked him, and later, when they saw how perilous his life was, they went about busily saying, ‘It was his own fault.’

He forsook his father’s faith, so that he had to hate father and mother. For this indeed is the meaning of Christ’s saying, that he who for His sake does not hate father and mother is not worthy of Him — and Peter was worthy of Him. When there is a difference of religion, and thus an eternal difference of eternity between father and son, and the son sincerely believes with all his heart and with all his strength and with all his soul that only in this religion is there blessedness — then he hates the father, that is, he loves something else so highly that his love for his father is like hate. When one has a legitimate, a sacred claim, has the prior claim upon thy love, then to love another, even if this means only to become indifferent to that first object, is as if thou didst hate him, just because he has a claim upon thy love. But to love something so highly that one believes that therein alone salvation is to be found and blessedness, and apart from that only perdition — when the father then to whom thou art attached by the most heartfelt ties does not believe the same thing, when consequently the believer, the more sincerely he holds fast to the one thing in which there is salvation, is compelled (oh, horror, as though it were laying violent hands upon his father!), is compelled to conclude, and must (oh, horror, as though it were denying his father the necessities of life!), must compel his heart to conclude that his father is lost — this indeed is to hate the father. Is not this to hate another, to believe that he is lost? And is it any the less so because it seems unspeakably hard to one? So then, this is to hate the father, or more correctly, it is to hate him and yet to love him! Oh, abomination without equal, to hate the loved one, so that one’s love is turned to hate; ah, of all soul-sufferings the bitterest, the most agonizing, to hate the loved one and yet love him! To want to do everything for him, to wish to offer one’s life for him — but to be bound, bound, yea, or nailed, or crucified upon the stipulation over which one has no control, the stipulation which attaches blessedness to one condition, so that apart from this there is no blessedness, so that the choice is, either to give up one's own blessedness in order to live hapless with the loved one; or to believe for oneself unto salvation — ah, and thus with hate to let go of the loved one!

He forsook the faith of the fathers, and therewith the nation and people he belonged to, and the fatherland, the love of which binds with the strongest bonds. For he belonged no more to any nation or people, he belonged only to the Lord Jesus Christ. As a believer he had to understand that this elect people of God to which he belonged by birth was cast off, that there no longer existed an elect people; as a believer he had to understand that what doubtless had once been his proudest thought, to belong to God's elect people, that this thought from now on was obduracy and perdition for every man who continued to hold to this thought.

Thus it was the Apostle forsook all, broke with everything which binds a man to the earth, and with everything which holds one a prisoner to the earth. He forsook out of love for Christ, or out of hatred for the world, he forsook all things, his position in life, livelihood, family, friends, the human language, love to father and mother, love for the fatherland, the faith of the fathers, he forsook the God he had hitherto worshipped. He forsook this otherwise than does he who by the ocean is separated from the land of his birth; more inwardly than he who leaves father and mother to cling to his wife, more heartily than a woman who leaves the paternal home — he did not even turn to look back, nor demand time to bury the dead. He forsook it all, yes, and in the most decisive way; for he remained on the spot, surrounded by all that he forsook: the daily difficulties of his life were the formal attestation that he forsook this. He remained amongst those whom he forsook: that they hated and persecuted him was the expression of the fact that he had forsaken all. He did not in fact journey away from it all, no, he remained to bear witness that he had forsaken it, exposing himself to all the consequences thereof, which in turn were the evidence that he had forsaken all.

'Behold, we have forsaken all and followed thee; what shall we have therefore? The Apostle had forsaken all — and, as has been shown, it is to be taken seriously in the strictest sense that he forsook all things; it was not as with us who, without altering anything in outward respects, protest that we are willing to forsake all things, if it is required of us. Then the Apostle asks, 'What shall we have?' — and I ask, or better, thou, my hearer, dost ask of thyself (for this is both more meet and more profitable), thou dost ask, What shall we have?

Oh, there is nothing so deceitful and cunning as the human heart, so inventive in seeking evasions and in finding excuses; nothing is so difficult and so rare as true sincerity before God. Verily we should beware of delivering ranting sermons of censure, and especially of being the one to exact of others as it were the payment of outstanding debts to God. For it is true enough that God can demand sincerity of every man, and so also of 'me' , but this by no means implies that I am commissioned on behalf of God to exact it of others. If I were to give myself out as having such a commission, I myself would be guilty of insincerity towards God. No, we would not appal men in such a way. But the appalling thing of being insincere towards God has another side. There is only one help for a man in heaven or on earth, whether all other help is at his disposition, or it is all shattered, there is only this help, that God helps him. Perhaps a man often thinks that God is slow in helping, or that by reason of the infinitely many complications in the government of the world, help becomes so slowly available. Far from it! God is a present help, swifter than thought, and for God there is no complication. But man is insincere towards God in desiring His help, or in any case very slow in becoming sincere.

When a man protests that he is willing to forsake all things for Christ's sake, if it is required of him — well, how could I dare to say that this is insincere? But in those ages when they were actually serious about forsaking all things, were there then to be found so many who were willing, and the few who were to be found, were they not found among the poor and the lowly? But now, now that it is not so easy to take seriously the obligation of forsaking all things, now we are all willing... if it is required of us. Let us not deceive ourselves, nor deceive God. It does not do to have so high an opinion of oneself: to remain in possession of all, and be such a hero too. If God does not require us to forsake all, He does nevertheless require of us sincerity. Instead of impatiently and hot-headedly urging another to try his hand impatiently and hot-headedly at forsaking all things, which God perhaps does not require, or does not require of him, we on the contrary would extol sincerity, which God requires of every one; but surely it is preposterous to treat this as a mere phrase, or as a mere form of speech to ascribe to us all that which at a time when it was really taken seriously was fully carried out by one among thousands and thousands. — Perhaps God does not require it of him, that is to say, it is required of every one but not unconditionally required of every one, i.e.. it is left to freedom. He who does this believingly, and therefore humbly, acts Christianly; but he who humbly has an understanding with himself in not doing it, who has a lowly opinion of himself, also acts Christianly. Perhaps God does not require it, that is, God does not require it in the same way of us who live in Christendom. And the voluntary act, the voluntary forsaking of all things, is only then Christian when, as was shown, it is for the sake of following Christ, and is thus in correspondence with God's requirement; and the voluntary act is in Christendom only then deserving of praise when before

God it has an understanding of the essential distinction that the Apostles and the early Christians did what they did when they were surrounded by Jews and pagans, that is, by non-Christians. For him who lives in Christendom — one thing there is in any case he is not to forsake, as the Apostles did, the faith of the fathers; and after all there is and remains the difficulty of being persecuted, being executed, not by Jews, not by pagans, but by Christians... in the name of Christianity.

There was a time in Christendom when people thought they could do penance by actually forsaking all things, by fleeing to the solitude of the desert, or seeking to be persecuted in the swarming city. There is another way of doing penance, that of being thoroughly sincere towards God. I do not know — and in case I knew differently, I trust to God that I would make bold to talk differently — I do not know that anywhere it is unconditionally required of a man in Christendom that to be a Christian and to become blessed he must in a literal sense forsake everything, or even sacrifice his life, be executed, for the sake of Christianity. But this I know, that with an insincere man God can have nothing to do. It is therefore, according to my conception, a theme for a penitential sermon, this which we have chosen, these words of Peter, 'Behold, we have left all and followed thee, what shall we have therefore?' — that is to say, when thou art prompted by this question to ask thyself, What shall we have? No man, however, can become blessed except by grace, the Apostles also were accepted only by grace. But there is one sin which makes grace impossible, that is, insincerity; and there is one thing which God must unconditionally require, that is, sincerity. If on the contrary a man holds God at arm's length by insincerity, such a man can neither learn to understand whether God would require him in the strictest sense to forsake all things, nor learn to understand himself in the humble admission that he had not indeed forsaken all things, but nevertheless confides in God's grace.

Oh, different as these situations are in the human understanding of it, when the Apostle says, ‘Behold we have left all and followed thee, what shall we have?’ — and when a man, humbly confessing that he was not put to such a test, sincerely admitting before God that he could not in any way venture to believe that he was capable of it, says, ‘What shall we have?’ — by God’s grace they both of them get one and the same thing.

III. ALL THINGS MUST WORK TOGETHER FOR OUR GOOD — IF WE LOVE GOD

IF A MAN were to protest in the most solemn and emphatic terms that he loved God, that God, and God alone, was the object of his love, the first and only love — and this man, if he were asked the reason why, were to respond, 'Because God is the highest, the holiest, the most perfect being', and if this man, when some one asked him whether he had never loved God for any other reason, were to reply, 'No' — then one might well suspect him of being a fanatic, might well warn him in all seriousness to have a care lest this fanatic mood might end in presumption. The simple and humble thing is to love God because one needs Him. It may seem so natural that in order to love God one must raise oneself to heaven where God dwells: the best and surest way, however, to love God is to remain on the earth. It may seem so lofty a thing to love God because He is so perfect, it may seem so selfish to love Him because one needs Him: yet the latter way is the only way in which a man can in truth love God. Woe to the presumptuous man who would make bold to love God without needing Him! In the relationship between man and man there may perhaps be the possibility of such an enthusiastic love which loves a man merely for his perfection, but the prime condition at the basis of a man's love for God is to understand effectually that one needs God, to love Him simply because one needs Him. The man who most deeply recognizes his need of God loves Him most truly. Thou shalt not presume to love God for God's sake; thou shalt eternally understand that thy life's welfare eternally depends upon this, and for this reason thou shalt love Him.

So let every one ask himself, for the sake of his own welfare, whether he loves God. This in the deepest sense is the enquiry about one's welfare: Do

I love God? If the answer is, Yes, then thy welfare is assured also eternally, for ‘all things must work together for good to them that love God’. Oh, how often this text has been quoted, repeated and repeated again, explained, interpreted for edification, for comfort, for consolation. They have shown how experience has confirmed the truth of it, how all things have actually worked together for good to them that love God. They have combated all doubts, have made it so clear that this is so — that however different things may appear in a time or times of suffering, of trial, of temptation, all things must in the end work together for good to them that love God, that there is no repose for thought, that there is no doubt that can resist this assurance, but in the end it must acknowledge its defeat and submit.

But what of that? Because it is eternally certain that all things work together for good to them that love God, does it follow that ‘I’ love God? And this precisely is the decisive question. The more one combats impersonally all the objections of doubt, and then, after having refuted all these objections, assumes that the whole matter is decided, all the more is attention diverted from the question which is really decisive. Yes, men are often strangely busy in the wrong place. They contend and contend, ponder and ponder, to prove the truth of Christianity — then they are tranquillized, then they think that everything is all right. This is to betake oneself to rest at the beginning, as one should not do till the end — which is strange especially in these times when people are so busy about going farther! Oh, the man who has but a little understanding of the matter easily perceives that everything else is only preliminary work, an introduction to the main matter: Is it thus WITH ME? But they have turned the whole thing around, and therefore have on their hands a job which Christianity never dreamt of. Christianity was proclaimed with divine authority; its thought was that not a single instant ought to be wasted in proving it true, but that each man severally should turn to himself and say, ‘What relation hast thou to Christianity?’ This personal concern, this fear and trembling, as to whether a man is himself a believer, is the best remedy against all doubt about the truth of the doctrine; for in his personal concern a man sets to work with all the powers of his soul at a totally different place. But because they have entirely done away with this personal concern, they have also got on their hands a kind of doubt which Satan himself could not contend against — though he might well invent it — a kind of doubt against which it is impossible to contend because it actually is required that to contend against it one must pass over to its side, and so to vanquish it must betray Christianity. Christianly understood, the only weapon against doubt is, ‘Keep still!’ or in Luther’s phrase, ‘Keep your mouth shut!’ Doubt, on the other hand, says, ‘Be so kind as to fight with my own weapons.’ How unreasonable, and how impossible! If a liar were to say, ‘Be so kind as to fight with my own weapons’, could truth be served by that proposal, or by winning such a victory?

So then, because such is the situation, and because it is so general, it is doubtless advantageous to turn the thing around again, to put back again the main-spring of personal concern which they have managed to take out of Christianity. So in this discourse, instead of proving the truth of the proposition that all things work together for good to them that love God, we would, as is meet and right, assume this quite simply as eternally certain, as the most certain thing in the world, and on the other hand talk about the statement that

ALL THINGS WORK TOGETHER FOR OUR GOOD — IF WE LOVE GOD.

SO the Discourse really revolves about the word ‘if’. It is a little word, but it has immense significance; it is a little word, about which nevertheless a world revolves, the world of personality. Thou knowest that people which was notorious for its brief, laconic expressions, and presumably thou knowest that laconic answer, ‘If’. This was proudly said by the superior power, talking about what his countless hosts would do if they conquered all; and it was a brief answer: ‘If’. And the case is somewhat similar with all this proving and proving and refuting which talks with proud words of what it is able to accomplish — seeing that it is not able to accomplish the least thing, if it does not itself believe, seeing that it has not itself the least profit from this proving, if it does not itself believe, seeing that it does not profit thee in the least,, thou dost not believe, cannot in the very least help thee to believe, and on the other hand it may be a thing totally indifferent to thee, if thou dost believe. Yea, it is a little word, this if! If God is love, then it follows as a matter of course that all things must work together for good to them that love God; but from the fact that God is love it by no means follows that thou dost believe that God is love, or that thou dost love Him. If on the other hand ‘thou’ dost believe, it follows as a matter of course that all things work together for good to ‘thee’, for this is implied in what thou believest of God. In the one case man puts himself as it were inside God and proves something about Him, proves that He is love and what follows from this; in the other case man understands humbly that the question is whether he believes that God is love, for if he believes this, then all the rest follows as a matter of course, without proof — from the proof nothing ensues for me, from faith everything ensues for me.

So the discourse is about this if, and therewith about faith, which of all goods is the highest and the only true good. For of all other goods it may be said that there is always a ‘but’ attached to them, that they have a side from which it seems doubtful whether this good is a good, whether it might not have been better that a man did not get this good. But faith is the good which is of such a nature that if thou believest, in case thou believest, when thou believest, inasmuch as thou believest — even though there were to befall thee that which thou most hast feared — thou wilt believingly understand that for thee it must be for the best, and therefore a good. Whereas doubt has power over everything we commonly call goods, power to make them doubtful, faith too has power over all the good and all the evil that can befall thee, power to put beyond all doubt that it is a good.

All things must work together for our good — IF we love God.

Imagine a man in possession of all the goods of fortune, untouched by affliction and adversity, unacquainted with any suffering or danger, envied by the narrow-hearted, counted fortunate by the young — dare he count himself fortunate? Yes — if he believes that God is love; for then all these things work together for his good. 'If' — it is a naughty little word, this 'if'! Yea, woe to the man who ventures to cast doubt of God into another man's heart, for all this doubt is sinful, and to awaken this doubt in another is seduction. But honour be to the man, praise and thanksgiving to him who is so serious that he does not fear to awaken in another the doubt which teaches a man to doubt himself, the doubt which is the origin of personal concern. So then, we say 'if'. This 'if' is a revivalist, a penitential preacher. Thou perhaps art inclined to suppose that the penitential preacher is like a great strong wind which produces physical terror. No, the true preacher is heard, as God's voice was heard, in the gentle breeze — yet for that reason not lenient but stern, stern as the seriousness of eternity. The true preacher aims only at one thing, to come to such close quarters with thee or with me, with the individual, to wound one in such a way that he thereupon becomes his own penitential preacher. Beware of this 'if' — in another sense, take care to love this 'if' — in case it has scored a hit upon thee, it may take thee a year and a day to be done with it, or rather, in case it has stabbed thee deeply, thou wilt never be done with this 'if' — that thou wilt not. This 'if' remains like an arrow in thy heart; it will remain there till the last. Be not therefore afraid of the penitential preacher, who perhaps has terror in his appearance and wrath in his voice, who chides and rebukes and thunders. A thing like that is only play and produces only a sort of shuddering pleasure. No, in the inmost depths of every man's heart there dwells his penitential preacher. When he has a chance to speak, he does not preach to others, he does not make a penitential preacher of thee, he preaches before thee alone; he does not preach in any church before an assembled multitude, he preaches in the secret chamber of the heart — and before thee, whether thou wilt hear him or not; he has nothing else whatever to attend to but to attend to thee, and he takes good care to be heard when all about thee is still, when the stillness makes thee lonely.

Thou fortunate man whom so many envy and so many count fortunate — in case thou art wounded by this 'if' or hast wounded thyself, thou wilt not seek to find comfort in the assurance of any other man that thou art fortunate, yea, though all men were united in assuring thee of this, it will not give thee the least certitude. It is with thyself thou hast now to deal, with the preacher in thine inward man. He does not employ many words, he is too well informed for that, he says merely, 'If'. And whether thou wouldst deliver to him a long discourse, or propose to him a brief question, he says merely, 'If'. In consideration of thy wealth, with the thought that it is placed in thy power to make thy life as comfortable as possible, as rich in pleasure, or with the thought which is still more glorious, that it is placed in thy power to do good to so many, if in consideration of this thou wouldst count thyself fortunate — then says the preacher, 'Yes — if thou dost believe that God is love, if thou dost love God, for then all these things work together for thy good.' This reply is a bit disturbing, it is in a sense so cold, so calm in its ambiguity, it is neither yea nor nay. If thou wouldst ask him, 'Do I then love God?', he replies, Of that I know nothing, I declare merely how the case stands: if thou dost love God, then...' Wouldst thou beg and conjure him to answer finally yes, thou dost move him no whit more, thou canst not win him with flattery nor with prayers, thou canst not put him to death except in a very figurative sense, and in any case he does not fear death. But so long as he lives, so long as thou dost still hear his voice, he repeats this 'if'. In case thou wouldst say to him, 'I give half of my wealth to the poor, if only I may thus attain the certitude that the remainder truly redounds to my good', and he made thee no answer, because he cannot make answer to such a speech, or he replied, 'Yes — if' — in case thou, being then brought to extremities by sensing what power there is in this 'if' as uttered by him to thee, wouldst say, 'I give the whole of my wealth to the poor, if only I may thus attain the certitude that poverty truly redounds to my good'; then he makes answer, 'Yes — if thou dost love God.'

If thou lovest God, or if thou believest that God is love — for if thou believest that God is love, thou dost love Him also — then all things work together for thy good. But make no mistake, do not rush ahead and love God with an exuberant sense of thy good fortune, as though thou wert not really in need of Him because thou art fortunate enough. No, thou must learn to need God, to love Him because thou hast need of Him, thou, the most fortunate of men. Thy welfare is by no means, oh, by no means decided by thy good fortune, it is only then decided, but then also it is eternally decided, when thou dost believe that God is love, O thou fortunate man — if thou believest it. Hail to thy good fortune! Then all these things work together for thy good: thy riches, thy good health, thy splendid intellectual gifts, thy joy at the side of thy beloved, thy honour, thy prestige among men, the blissful diversion of thy children: these things work together for thy good — if thou dost love God; and then thou art really fortunate. We say of a man that, however fortunate he may be, he lacks one thing if he has not the consciousness of his good fortune. But the true consciousness of his good fortune (without which, as has been said, the good fortune is not good fortune) is contained in, framed in, the consciousness that God is love. Knowledge about God being love is not yet the consciousness of it. For to have consciousness, a personal consciousness, it is requisite that in my knowing I have at the same time knowledge of myself and of my relationship to my knowing. This is to believe that God is love, it is to love Him.

Surely thou hast often heard people talk about the power of words, of what the man is capable of who has words thoroughly at his command — and yet this little word 'if' has infinitely more power when it is the preacher in one's inward parts who utters it to 'this man'. The power of words has cast down thrones, changed the face of the world, but this little 'if' has a still greater power, it is a still greater change when a man is eternally changed by this 'if'. It is an eternal change, more remarkable than the most remarkable occurrence in the world, when a man comes to love God. Whether that happens, when that happens, no one can tell the man. The preacher in his inmost parts can help him to become attentive, help him to seek with personal concern the certitude of the Spirit, when God's Spirit witnesseth with this man's spirit that he loves God. But God alone can give him this certitude. What the penitential preacher can do is to keep him awake in uncertainty: he says, 'All things work together for thy good — if thou dost love God.' With this word he challenges the youth in the morning of life, with this word he calls out to the man, at sundry times and in divers manners, in the busy days of life, with this word he prevents the aged man from becoming torpid and drowsy. He adds not one syllable more, he takes not one syllable away, he alters not his voice, nor does he vary the emphasis upon the word; unchangeable as a dead man, calm as eternity, he reiterates, 'If.'

Imagine a man, the most miserable of all — human sympathy has already long ago given him up and forsaken him, for its own sake alas, dare not come near him, wishes — for its own sake, alas — that it might remain unaware of his misery, if only thereby it could be unaware that such misery can befall a man — might this miserable man say, ‘Nothing but evil befalls me, and out of that comes constantly more evil’? By no means — but, yes, if he does not love God, he might be right in that; only the question then is something quite different from what he was talking about. For, in the divine understanding of it, not to love God is man’s decided and conclusive misery, whether in other respects he be fortunate or unfortunate. That which human speech, on the other hand, calls need, adversity, suffering, sheer misery — that still can work together for a man’s good... if he loves God.

Why what a strangely compounded double nature this ‘if’ has! Yes, and that’s as it should be; for it is true, is it not, that the penitential preacher, if he is the true one, is also always the comforter, who knows how to give comfort and to hold out long after human help has proved vain and has given up the sufferer. Therefore he is loved just as much as he is feared. In the dark night of despair, when every light is extinguished for the sufferer, there is still one place where the light is still lit, namely, upon the path the desperate man has to take, the short-cut: ‘if’ thou dost love God. At the moment of terrible despondency, when no longer there is any question or thought of any illative clause, but humanly speaking the meaning has petered out — there still is one clause left, a courageous clause of comfort which dauntlessly makes its way into the most dreadful situations and creates new meaning: ‘if’ thou dost love God. In the terrible moment of decision, when humanly speaking no turning is any longer possible, when there is only misery on all sides, wherever thou dost turn, and however thou dost turn — there is yet one turn possible which shall-marvellously turn for thee everything into good: ‘if’ thou dost love God.

‘But where is it then?’ says a man, ‘where is this?’ Ah, in the deepest depths of every man there dwells a comfort which also is found in the depths where the penitential preacher dwells. Thou art helped but little if another man would preach to thee penitence; he cannot do it, it remains an empty play, the utmost he can do is to help thee to become thine own penitential preacher. And thou art helped but little if another man would comfort thee. In case thou art tried in difficult decisions, the comfort of another man will not understand thee and therefore cannot help thee; and in case thou hast become thoroughly miserable, thou canst not reasonably demand that another man’s sympathy should venture to put itself in thy situation. But most deeply within thee, where the penitential preacher dwells, comfort also dwells, this ‘if’. And just as this word cannot be corrupted by the flatteries and prayers of the fortunate man and mocks at his menaces, so, God be praised, it is also undismayed in the day of need. In case thou art inclined to suppose that the most diseased and the most troubled imagination is capable of inventing a horror which would bring this word to silence, thou art in error. Relate to this comforter what thou wilt, confide to him what is on the point of gaining the mastery over thee, that however thou dost shudder at it thou hast this upon thy tongue, that in spite of the opposition of thy heart thou art about to conclude that God is not love — he is not affrighted, he merely repeats, ‘if thou dost love God, then shall all these things work together for thy good’.

Oh, final comfort, oh, blessed comfort; oh, comfort beyond all measure! For, as was said, when human sympathy gives up, when the one man does not dare to go in to the other — most deeply within a man there is a comfort. The Scripture says, ‘Have salt in yourselves’, and it is true also that deepest within every man there is comfort. But this comforter has by no means disavowed his role as penitential preacher. For if by all thy misery, by thy cry of pain in suffering, or thy cry of dread in anticipation of the suffering thou fearest, thou wouldst seek to move him to give thee a certitude that thou dost love God — he would reply, 'if thou dost love God'. Do not fancy that it is out of sympathy for all thy misery he utters and repeats this word of comfort. No, it is because the fears that in desperation thou mightest cast thyself into that which in the divine understanding of it is man's misery, into the misery of not loving God. He is not employed in wanting to do away with thy misery, nor does he give thee what he is unable to give, certitude that thou dost love God. But while misery preaches penitence to thee, he preaches comfort, not human but divine comfort; and in divine comfort penitence is always included and required.

O thou sufferer, if thou dost believe that God is love, or (what is the same thing) if thou dost love God (for if thou believest that God is love, then thou dost love Him also) — then all this works together for thy good. Say not that thou canst not understand how all this misery should work together for thy good, yield not to the error of doubt, so as to begin with the question whether God is love — be fearful of thyself, but find also comfort within thyself, attend to this word which rings in thine inmost parts: if thou dost love God. The certitude that thou dost love God, this word cannot give thee, that only God can give thee when His Spirit beareth witness with thy spirit that thou lovest Him, when thou dost know with Him that thou believest that He is love. But that word can help thee to seek this certitude. When despair would close around thee, this word still provides a prospect of salvation; when thou art about to collapse in weariness and to give up, that word still holds open a possibility of help, if thou dost love God.

All things must work together for good — IF we love God.

Imagine a man equipped if possible in more than an extraordinary measure with intellectual gifts, with a profundity in pondering, a keenness in comprehending, a clarity in presentation, a thinker the like of whom was never seen and never shall be seen; he has pondered upon the nature of God, upon the fact that God is love, upon what follows from this as a consequence, that the world also must be the best, and all things must work together for good. And what he has fathomed he has elucidated in a book which is regarded as the possession of the whole race and the object of its pride; it is translated into all languages, referred to on all occasions of scientific discussion, and from this book the parsons fetch their proofs. This thinker has lived hitherto unacquainted with the world, protected by favourable conditions, which indeed are required for scientific research. Then it befalls him to come to grief in consequence of an important decision; he must act in a difficult situation and at a critical moment. And this action entails a consequence which he had not in the least anticipated, a consequence which plunges him and many others into misery. This is a consequence of his act — and yet he is convinced that he could not have acted otherwise than he did act after the most honest reflection. So here it is not a question of misfortune merely, but of blame which attaches to him, however blameless he knows himself to be. Now he is wounded; there awakens in his soul a doubt whether this also can work together for his good. And in him, the thinker, this doubt at once takes the direction of thought: whether after all God is love — for in the believer doubt takes another direction, that of concern about himself. Over this man the objective concern acquires more and more power, so that at last he hardly knows where he is. In this situation he has recourse to a parson who is not personally acquainted with him. He opens his mind to him and seeks comfort. The clergyman, who is abreast of the times and is a thinker of sorts, would now prove to him that this also must be for the best and work for his good, since God is love; but he soon ascertains that he is not the man to maintain his side in a conflict of thought with this unknown individual. After several vain attempts, the clergyman says: ‘Well I have only one counsel left to give you; there is a book about the love of God by so and so, read it, study it, if that does not help you, no man can help you.' The unknown man replies, 'I myself am the author of this book.'

Observe now that what the author had set down in that book was excellent — how could I venture to doubt it! What the thinker had understood about God was also doubtless true and profound. But this thinker had not understood himself, he had hitherto been living under the delusion that when it is proved that God is love, it must follow somehow as a matter of course that we — thou and I — believe it. He has perhaps as a thinker thought very meanly of faith, until... as a man he learned to think more meanly than before of thought, especially of the 'pure' sort. The course of his thought became inverted, his thought-process became different. He did not say: God is love, ergo all things work together for a man's good; but he said: 'If I believe that God is love, then all things work together for my good.' Now the thinker is matured for life as a man; for hitherto there had been something rather inhuman about him. What it means for a little child to get the name by which it will be known its whole life long, is substantially what it means once in a man's life, decisively, eternally, to wound himself with this 'if' and thereby come to love God, although subsequently this 'if' is always at hand to preserve this love with which one loves God, is eternally young, as God is eternal, eternally young in the first tension of passion, but ever more and more heartfelt.

All things work together for our good — IF we love God.

Now, whether this is so, whether it is true as a matter of fact, whether I can prove it? Oh, if thou dost believe it, in case thou dost believe it, thou wilt blissfully ascertain that not only, as sometimes occurs, is that which thou seekest here, so that there is no need to go out to seek it, but thou hast found it, thou hast it. In case thou dost believe it, thou wilt easily understand that all proving leads thee away from what thou hast, whereas this proving deceitfully assumes the appearance of leading thee to it.

Let us understand one another. Thou art surely acquainted (as who is not?) with that happy expression, that heartfelt word of a noble poet who lets the unfortunate girl speak to this effect: ‘I desire nothing more, I have lived and I have loved,’ or what to her thinking would have been precisely the same thing: I have loved — and lived. And why the same thing? Because she humanly regards love for man as the highest good, hence to her thinking these two ideas are completely synonymous: to live and to love. If she is bereaved of her lover, life is over — but she has loved. We will not contend with this lovable girl — and besides she is in fact the stronger. She is stronger than our understanding — for she believes in love. She is stronger than all earthly power, in a sense she has overcome death, does not fear it, for already she is bereaved of life, life indeed was her love — and, alas, she has loved.

But now for this thing of loving God! This after all is surely the highest good; to this therefore we can apply with the truth of eternity what the girl, vainly deceived by her heart, applied to earthly love: to love God is to live. ‘To live’! When one uses this word thus with special emphasis, one signifies thereby the full, rich life which is in possession of all the requisites for living, one signifies thereby a life which is truly worth living, a life which expands as it were with the blissful feeling of vitality. Only when one possesses the highest good does one live thus; but the highest good is to love God. But accordingly he possesses the highest good who, whatever may befall him, loves God; for to love God is the highest good. Ah, surely this is true! For the sake of a God-fearing jest, to make sport for once of this conceit of proving things, permit me to adjoin: quod est demonstrandum!

And the same thing applies when we talk of loss. In speaking of loss, or of what a man can lose in the world, one is prone to forget that the highest good is to love God. Though a man were to lose everything in the world — if he does not lose faith in God's love, he does not in fact lose the highest good. Or imagine two men, both of whom have lost everything, but one of whom has at the same time lost faith in God's love: what is the difference between these two? Should we make the miserable reply that after all the one was somewhat better off than the other? No, let us tell the truth. The difference is that one actually lost everything, the other really lost nothing, since he retained the highest good.

IF we love God! O my hearer, thou who perhaps art accustomed to require everything of the speaker, here thou canst see that it all lies in the hearer. Wilt thou deny that the speaker speaks truly who says, 'All things work together for thy good — if thou dost love God'? That thou surely wilt not deny. Very well, but then thou wouldst require of him the impossible, if thou wert to require that he produce a definite effect: either to tranquillize, or to terrify. For what effect this true discourse will produce depends solely upon who the hearer is. There may perhaps have been one in whom this discourse inspires such a dread as he never before has known; but this is not the fault of the discourse, it lies in the hearer. There was perhaps one who in entire agreement said yea and amen to it, listened to it with the most blissful tranquillity; but this is not the merit of the discourse, it lies in the hearer. It is not the discourse which has terrified the one, and it is not the discourse which has tranquillized the other; it is the one and the other who in this discourse have understood themselves.

IV. THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD IS AT HAND... OF THE JUST AND OF THE UNJUST

MY HEARER, THOU thyself perhaps hast been in the following situation, or at least thou art aware that such is the situation of many. At various seasons in his life a person has wished that some one might prove to him the immortality of the soul. He does not require that the proofs should make all effort on his part superfluous. He is willing to co-operate by thinking the thing out on his own account. He has procured one or another of the works which deal with this subject, and he has read it tranquilly, or he has heard and followed an oral lecture which undertook to prove the immortality of the soul. What is this man's whole situation? How might I describe it? In civil life we talk about the security there is in the city: public security is assured, one goes home tranquilly even late at night without fearing any danger; theft is seldom heard of, and that only in a small way just to keep in practice; as for assault, it never occurs. Hence one is safe, lives in safety. So it is with safety in a spiritual sense: thoughts come and go, even the most decisively important thoughts merely graze the soul, in dealing with the most terrifying thoughts one thinks a little about them, then a little more, but inwardly there is safety, it is assured that one is safe, or, as it would be preferable to say in this instance, one is secure.

On the other hand, this discourse on immortality has plainly the intent of committing a breach of public safety, or here it is more properly a question of private safety, it has the intent of disturbing security — it is like an assault, as bold as an assault in full daylight, as terrifying as an assault by night. Before it proves anything — but no, let us not keep the mind in vain expectancy, it will not prove anything whatsoever. It makes a classification of men as the just and the unjust, and therewith it asks thee whether thou dost reckon thyself among the just or the unjust. It brings this question into the closest relationship with immortality; in fact it is not about immortality it speaks but rather about this difference. Is not this like an assault? Certainly it has never occurred to any of the provers to make this classification or to put this question — that would be the rudeness of treading too close on a man's heels, and one is afraid of presuming to come too close to the hearer or the reader, it would be unscientific and uncultured. How very odd. One is afraid of treading up too close to the hearer or reader — whereas one is engaged in proving to him the very thing which concerns him most closely — indeed there is nothing that more closely concerns a man than his immortality. However, one might prove this to the hearer without approaching him too closely, and presumably the hearer himself on the strength of this proof will espouse in a way his immortality without himself approaching it too rudely or too closely. In that way the proving of immortality becomes a sort of game. And when this game is long continued and becomes very popular, it is like an assault when a discourse, assuming immortality as a thing most certain, comes as close as possible to one, when instead of proving it (for that is to put it at a distance from one and hold it there), it comes out bluntly with the consequences which follow from it. Instead of beseeching thee to lend it thine attention and to listen tranquilly while it proves immortality, it assaults thee somewhat in this fashion: 'Nothing is more certain than immortality; thou shalt not be concerned about it, not waste thy time upon it, nor seek evasions by wanting to prove it, or wishing it proved — fear it, it is all-too-certain, do not doubt whether thou art immortal, but tremble, for thou art immortal.' The words of the text are uttered by Paul, and presumably both Pharisees and Sadducees were equally wroth with him. The Scripture relates expressly that the Sadducees, who did not accept immortality, were enraged when Paul talked of immortality. But may it not have been due to the way he talked about immortality that the Pharisees were equally exasperated? This would have been the most favourable opportunity for Paul, yea the situation was like a challenge to him, it was as if this was what the age demanded of him — to propound some proofs of the immortality of the soul. If he had done that, being invited to a meeting where he proposed to give some proofs of the immortality of the soul — well, in that case not even the Sadducees would have made any objection. As men of scientific culture they were presumably free-minded enough to think thus: 'Notwithstanding we deny the immortality of the soul, this man may be able to say something for the other side, we may as well listen to him.' But for a man to attack one, to pounce upon him with this question about just and unjust, to forsake the scientific attitude and become personal — who indeed can wonder that people were enraged at such behaviour? People come together as men of culture, a group of serious persons who would hear something about immortality, whether there is an immortality, whether there really is an immortality, a personal immortality, whether people will really recognize one another again, about what ways there may be of passing one's time in eternity, whether yonder in the high-vaulted halls one will find oneself again in his self-same person, embroidered in the tapestry of remembrance at his happiest moments, the day of one's marriage, the day when one enchanted everybody in the festive circle — instead of all this, instead of passing an agreeable hour and like serious persons being able to say later, 'After all it is a very serious question, this of immortality' — instead of this, to have the thing so thoroughly decided that one becomes anxious and alarmed!

Well, yes — he who never had his immortality so thoroughly decided that he became anxious and alarmed has never believed in his immortality. This is what people have entirely forgotten in these times which, quite consistently, are so busy about proving immortality, in these times when they are about ready to leave it impudently to every one's good pleasure whether he will or will not, whether he pretty much, pretty nearly, just about, up to a certain point, or in a sort of a way, wants to believe in immortality. For immortality is by way of becoming a sort of luxury, a matter of taste. And for this reason, for this reason precisely, so many books are written to prove after a sort the immortality of the soul — and precisely for this reason it is needful to give the thing a different turn. So we will speak on these words:

THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD IS AT HAND, OF THE JUST...AND OF THE UNJUST, OR ABOUT THE PROOF OF THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL WHICH RUNS THUS: IT IS ONLY TOO CERTAIN — FEAR IT!

For immortality is the Judgement. Immortality is not a life indefinitely prolonged, nor even a life somehow prolonged into eternity, but immortality is the eternal separation between the just and the unjust. Immortality is not a continuation which follows as a matter of course, but it is a separation which follows as a consequence of the past.

What has given occasion to all this error about immortality is the fact that people have completely confused the statement of the case, have made a question out of immortality, out of a task have made a question, out of a task for action, a question for thought. Would not that be the most depraved age which completely transformed its 'duties' into problems for thought? For what is duty? Duty is what one must do. There must be no question about duty, but the question must be whether I do my duty. There must be no question about immortality, as to whether it is; but the question must be whether I live as my immortality requires me to live. There must be no talk about immortality, as to whether it is, but about what my immortality requires of me, about my immense responsibility in being immortal.

That is to say, immortality and the Judgement are one and the same thing. We can speak rightly about immortality only when we speak of the Judgement; and naturally when we speak of the Judgement we speak of immortality. Hence Felix was afraid when he heard Paul's discourse about immortality; for Paul would not speak of it except in speaking of the Judgement, of the separation between the just and the unjust. If Paul had been willing to speak differently, to follow the new fashion of separating the Judgement and immortality from one another, if he had talked (or twaddled) about immortality without interjecting a word about the Judgement, talked about immortality and let it be assumed that there is no Judgement — then doubtless Felix would not have been afraid, he surely would have listened with attention to a cultured man and remarked afterwards, 'It is quite entertaining to hear the man, but it is kind of fanaticism which is capable, all the same, of delighting a person as long as he listens to it; it has something in common with a display of fireworks.'

Immortality is the Judgement. There is not a word more to be said about immortality. He who says one word more, or a word which has another slant, let him beware of the Judgement. People have transformed immortality into something entirely different and hence have sapped it. They have abstracted from it all its power, have tricked it out of its authority — by wanting to prove it, and so have left it to be accepted by anybody who will, whereas in fact it is exactly the contrary of this: either thou wilt or thou wilt not, about this there is no question raised, thou art immortal — only beware! In case an officer with authority commands that something be done — and then several persons, wishing presumably to assist him by proving that he is a very clever man etc., would persuade the subordinates to yield obedience to this officer — what then? Why, then these eloquent men have cheated him out of his authority; for he ought not to be obeyed because he is clever, ought not to be obeyed for this reason and that, but simply because he has authority. When duty, instead of being the commanding instance, is relegated to the position of a problem — then, even if men were to do what duty bids, they would not be doing their duty; for duty desires to be done because it must be done. So also in case a man by the aid of all sorts of proofs were to reach the point of assuming the notion of his immortality, he does not for all this believe in his immortality. For thou art under no obligation to carry the thing to the point of making it appear more than plausible that thou art immortal. No, God has entirely exempted thee from this bother; thou art immortal, and thou shalt give account to God of how thou hast lived, O thou immortal! Precisely because thou art immortal thou shalt not be able to slip out of God's hand, hide thyself in a grave and pretend that it doesn't matter; and the scale according to which thou shalt be judged is that thou art immortal.

Immortality is the Judgement or the separation between the just and the unjust. Thus it is Paul conjoins these two things. He does not waste a word in talking about immortality, as to whether it actually is; he states what it is, that it is the separation between the just and the unjust. The imperfection of this early life, its earthliness, consists precisely in the fact that it cannot make manifest this difference between the just and the unjust. Here in this earthly life there is the confusion that the unjust can assume the appearance of being the just, that the just must suffer as if he were the unjust, that there lies an impenetrable darkness over the question who is the just and who the unjust, that justice seems to be man's own invention, so that the right thing is that which the majority regards as such, so that righteousness seems to have the same quality as everything else that is earthly, of being right only up to a certain point, that just as it is required for beauty that one be neither too big nor too little, so righteousness is a kind of via media, it must not be pursued immoderately, therefore it is a righteous dispensation when (as a consequence of man's mediocrity) suffering and human opposition are the lot of one who wills righteousness only, who loves righteousness more dearly than his life. But the truth and perfection of eternal life is to exhibit eternally the difference between right and wrong with the severity appropriate to eternity, precise as only eternity is, with a sublimity which to the earthly-minded might seem petty and odd. In eternity therefore it will be easy enough to distinguish between right and wrong; but the point is that it is not in eternity thou art for the first time to make this distinction, in eternity thou shalt be judged as to whether in the earthly life thou hast made it as eternity would have it made. For what is eternity? It is the distinction between right and wrong. Everything else is transitory: heaven and earth shall pass away; every other distinction is evanescent, all distinction between man and man belongs to the interlude of human life and therefore is to cease. But the difference between right and wrong remains eternally, as does He, the Eternal, who fixed this difference from eternity (not like the difference which in the beginning He fixed between heaven and earth), and it remains unto eternity, as He, the Eternal, remains, He who rolls up the heavens like a garment, changes everything, but never Himself — and hence never this difference which belongs to eternity. Eternity is the distinction between right and wrong, hence immortality is the separation between the just and the unjust. Immortality is not a continuation, it is not so related to the present life that this is continued, but it is separation, so that life indeed is continued, but in separation. It is an idle, indolent, effeminate thought to wish for a life after death in the sense of a long life. Eternity's thought is that in this earthly life men differ, in eternity occurs the separation.

But how can eternity be a distinction? To be a distinction — is not that far too imperfect a mode of being to be the eternal? Well, is isn't that eternity is the distinction, eternity is righteousness. But the nature of righteousness possesses this perfection, that it has within itself a duplication; this duplication which it has within itself is the distinction between right and wrong. A being which has no distinction within itself is a very imperfect being, it may be an imaginary being, such as the being of a mathematical point. A being which has the difference outside itself is an evanescent being; such is the case with the distinctions of this early life, which therefore vanish. Eternity, righteousness, has the distinction within itself, the distinction between right and wrong. But if instead of habituating oneself to believe that there is an eternal distinction between right and wrong, instead of exercising oneself in it so that one might have one's life in it (which costs much time and effort, whereto all this earthly life is devised) — if instead one turns away from it, habituates oneself to think that there is surely some sort of distinction between right and wrong, but that after all one must not be pedantic, that it is well enough to make the distinction once in a while, but it would spoil all to do it for daily use — in that case it seems difficult to conceive, although in the very conception it is implied, that in eternity there should be an eternal distinction between right and wrong. For there is an eternal distinction between right and wrong (which ought to be seen already in this life; but, alas, it is not seen) — and how then might it not be in eternity! Take any earthly distinction to illustrate the fact that a distinction is naturally best seen where it has its stronghold. Take the distinction between noble and bourgeois. When the nobleman lives in a town where he is the only nobleman and all the others bourgeois, he cannot maintain his distinction, the bourgeois overpower him, but when he comes to his own sort and is fortified by being conjoined with them, you perceive the distinction. So it is with the eternal distinction between right and wrong. Hence in the earthly life it is overwhelmed as it were, it cannot well maintain itself, it is abased; but when it comes home in eternity it is then in its full strength. Whether men believe or no that there is this distinction in eternity, in eternity it is. But the situation in eternity is not, as it often is with the strong man, the sagacious man, the thinker, the teacher, that at last, overwhelmed by the crowd, he has to yield. Precisely the contrary! In temporal existence it rather looks as if eternity had already yielded; but it does not yield at last, no, at last comes the dreadful thing. It puts men to the proof here in the earthly life, it sometimes lets itself be mocked here in the earthly life, but at last, at last it judges; for immortality is the Judgement.

Immortality is the Judgement; and this applies to 'ME'; in 'MY' thoughts it applies to 'ME' most of all, just as in 'THY' thoughts it applies to 'THEE' most of all. In no other way have I been able to understand this matter. But that perhaps is due to my narrow capacity. For (inconceivable as it is in my thought) there are men who present the matter to themselves quite differently. They are confident enough in regard to what will happen to them in that discrimination of eternity, confident enough so far as concerns their own blessedness, that they are righteous, or confident enough that they are believers — and now they raise the query whether others can become blessed. To me this matter has never presented itself thus, nothing else has ever occurred to me but that every other man surely will become blessed, only about 'me' was it doubtful in 'my' thoughts. Yea, if I had caught myself doubting about the blessedness of any other single man, it would have been enough for me to despair of mine.

But the matter must be presented in one of two ways; one cannot be in two places at once, nor work with his thoughts in two places at once. Either one works unceasingly with every effort of his soul in fear and trembling upon the thought of self-concern, 'whether one shall himself become blessed'; and then verily one has no time or thought to doubt about others, nor is he in the least disposed to do so. Or one has become quite confident on his own account — and so he has time to think about others, time to strike attitudes and make gestures indicative of grief, time to practise the art of seeming to shudder, whereas he shudders on another person's account.

He, however, who has become so perfectly sure, so sure of hand that he presumes to handle this eternally decisive question (a boldness more to be wondered at than the sureness of the surgeon in using the knife, for in this instance it is impossible to cut another without cutting oneself), this man, however, has not always been so sure. Hence in the course of time he has changed. And that is natural, a person does indeed change in the course of time. It is evident that when a person becomes older there occurs a change in respect to his body: the smooth velvet of the skin becomes wrinkled, the soft connexions of the joints become stiff, the sinews harden, the bones petrify — is this change, this consolidation, a change for the better? The young girl who blushed if merely she heard 'his' name mentioned, blushed when in private she uttered it aloud; the young girl whose heart beat audibly every time the clock struck the hour when 'he' should come; the young girl who once shuddered at having displeased him by the very least insignificant act, or by the mere thought of it; the young girl who once became cold as death for fear that for an instant he had been less loving to her than usual — this young girl has now been married to him many years. Now she has become sure, sure that she is certainly good enough to him; she is aware of none of those virginal feelings, she is quite sure for her part; she is well-pleasing unto herself — even if she be not pleasing to... I was about to say 'the loved one', but of that there is no more any question, she has no loved one, though she has him for a husband; she is merely occupied with judging other women; she is quite well pleased with herself, even in her changed condition, she is not even like that old man who walked with his back bent low and his beard almost touching his knees, who when he was asked why he was so downcast, replied, lifting up his hands, 'I have lost my youth on the ground, and now I am seeking it everywhere' — she seeks nothing, she who once sought, ah, with all the sincerity of love sought to please, she is well-pleasing unto herself, she is quite sure. Is this assurance a change for the better?

No, away from me, dreadful assurance; save me, O God, from ever becoming quite sure, preserve me until the last in insecurity, so that then, if I attain blessedness, I might be quite sure that I receive it of grace! For this is a hollow sham, to protest that one believes it to be of grace — and yet to be quite sure. The true, the essential expression of the fact that it is grace is precisely the fear and trembling of insecurity. There it is faith lies, just as far, exactly as far from despair as from security. He who fools away his life without thinking of immortality can perhaps not be said to despise the highest good; but he who became quite sure is the one who despises it. He who flirted away his life can well be said to have forfeited his life; but he who became quite sure forfeited it in a more horrible way. Eternal God, keep therefore my deepest concern silent in my most inward parts, understood only by Thee, that I may never talk of it directly to any man. For otherwise I should get to the point of becoming just as sure as various others, more sure than several others — and quite sure. Preserve me from men, and preserve me from deceiving any other man; for this deceit lies all too near when one treats the relationship with God as if it were a direct relationship to other men, so that one falls into the way of comparison and human assurance. If there were a person accounted by many a man of rare nobility and uprightness, and he continues nevertheless to labour for his salvation, the others would be angry with him. For they would like to have his assurance as a specious pretext for their sense of security, and they would that their security should be his assurance. But, O my God and Father, the question of my blessedness concerns no one else but me and Thee.

Should there not then remain insecurity in fear and trembling until the last, I being what I am and Thou what Thou art, I upon earth, Thou in heaven — ah, a difference infinitely great! — I a sinner, Thou the Holy One! Should there not then, ought there not, must there not remain fear and trembling until the last? Or was not this the fault of the foolish virgins, that they became sure and went to sleep, whereas on the contrary the wise virgins kept awake? But what is it to keep awake? It is uncertainty in fear and trembling. And what indeed is faith but an empty imagination, if it is not awake? And when faith is not awake, what else is it but this dreadful security.

So this concerns me in my thoughts most of all, and I can understand that in thy thoughts likewise it concerns thee most of all. In no other way can I understand thee, in no other way am I willing to understand thee, and in no other way would I be understood by thee. I know nothing with regard to my blessedness; for what I know, I know only with God in fear and trembling, so that I cannot talk. When in the Council of State something indeed has been talked about but nothing as yet determined, would it not be a crime to divulge it in the city? And my blessedness is not yet determined. And I know nothing with regard to thy blessedness; thou only canst know of that with God. But this I believe, that the resurrection of the dead is at hand, of the just and of... the unjust.

My hearer, is not this discourse reassuring after all? One cannot well talk more reassuringly than as in this instance, when to one who so eagerly desired to believe in immortality, so eagerly desired to see it proved, the discourse says: ‘As for that matter, be quite assured, thou art immortal, whether thou wilt or no.’ More reassuringly one cannot talk — unless it is precisely this affirmation which disquiets a man. But if it is disquieting, there must have been deceit in the mouth or in the heart of him who desired so eagerly, oh, so eagerly desired, etc. And if he is deceitful, his disquietude is not my fault, who, if what he said was true, might have talked to him reassuringly. If there was deceit in him, he was accordingly just the contrary of what he said he was, he was afraid of immortality — hence he so eagerly desired to have it proved, because he obscurely understood that immortality, by becoming an object of proof, is cast down from the throne, deposed, a poor impotent figure which men can jeer at, as the Philistines jeered at Samson their prisoner. There is in the human race, in our race, a cunning which is slyer than the cunningest of shrewd politicians. And it is precisely this cunning of the race which has got the question of immortality inverted. The individuals do not by any means always understand how sly the whole thing is, and hence what they say is almost in the air they breathe, since it is in the race. It is the race that has willed to rebel against God, it is the race that has willed to do away with immortality and has attained the end of having it treated as a problem. For given immortality (and with that the immortality of the individual which is implied), then God is Lord and Sovereign, and the 'individual' stands in relationship to Him. But when immortality becomes a problem, God is done away with, and the race is God. The individuals perhaps do not notice how they are in the power of the race, how through them it is the race that speaks. They think therefore that he who calls upon them and calls them 'individuals' is a rebel — and that he is too, in God's name he rebels against making the race God and immortality a problem. In God's name he rebels, and he appeals to God's Word, that the resurrection of the dead is at hand, of the just... and of the unjust!

V. NOW ARE WE NEARER OUR SALVATION... THAN WHEN WE BECAME BELIEVERS

GREAT GOD, WHERE are we!' So the navigator cries when in the dark night the ship will not obey the helm, and no star is visible, when all is darkness and gloom, while storms rave, and when it is not possible to observe the position— 'Great God, where are we!' But he too in these days who has to preach Christianity, must he not say, 'Where are we?' We are in Christendom — yes, that is true. There so and so many Christians are born every year, so many are baptized, so many confirmed, we are so and so many Christians, just about as many as there are inhabitants in the land. But what does that signify? Does that determine our position? Or is he who preaches Christianity to keep the whole thing at a distance from reality, so as not to come embarrassingly near? Is he to talk about Christianity but leave it undetermined whom he is talking to? Is he to talk about our salvation being nearer than when we believed, but leave it entirely vague who these 'we' are, whether it is they who lived a hundred or several hundred years ago — is he to talk thus and therefore punch the air, so that the preaching of Christianity is no more than punching the air? Where are we? He who has to talk about Christianity in Christendom, is he a missionary who has to spread Christianity, so that all this notion of Christendom is a vain conceit, or is he to assume that we are all Christians, or shall he make a distinction, and, if so, how is he to make a distinction — where are we?

In these times people seem to be less observant of this difficulty. They regard Christianity as a sum of doctrinal statements, they lecture upon them, just as they do upon ancient philosophy, the Hebrew language, or any other scientific discipline, treating the relation to them of the hearers or learners as entirely indifferent. Substantially this is paganism. The Christian position clearly is that the personal relationship to Christianity is the decisive thing. One may be thoroughly informed about Christianity as a whole, may know how to explain it, to present it and to expound it — but if with all this he thinks that his own relationship to Christianity is a matter of indifference, he is a pagan. However, as men have cast down all regimes, so also they have deposed Christianity from its sovereignty. Instead of allowing it to rule over men, to change their lives (not only on Sunday but every day), and to intervene decisively in every relationship of life, they keep it at a scientific distance as a mere doctrine, they point out the correspondence between various doctrinal statements — but the correspondence or non-correspondence of my life or thine with this teaching is a matter of indifference.

Hence we have chosen these words to talk about. For if this discourse is not to be entirely meaningless, we must in one way or another come closer to men, or rather prompt them to come closer to themselves. And this is what we would do. Our aim is not in the least to condemn Christendom or any single person in Christendom; we do our best to come as close to ourselves as possible, which is the best way of preventing us from coming condemningly too close to others. But it is indeed our aim to prompt the hearer to test his life, his Christianity, to be observant of where he is. And to talk on these words, 'Now is our salvation etc.', without defining who 'we' are would be as inane as to travel from Copenhagen to Jerusalem on the map. To talk on these words without defining this 'now' and this 'when' is just as fatuous as to travel in imagination from one planet to another.

NOW IS OUR SALVATION NEARER... THAN WHEN WE BECAME BELIEVERS.

Two points are required for every determination of place. To say of a city that it is situated 'there', of a road that it leads 'there', of a man that he dwells ‘there’, is to make a fool of him with whom we talk, or to make a fool of oneself, if one had not the purpose of jeering at the other but meant to talk seriously. If there is to be any sense and seriousness in this discourse, and if he to whom it is addressed is to derive profit therefrom, he must be given one point the position of which he knows, in relation to which he can determine the ‘there’. The reason why a stranger goes astray in the desert, and the reason why a person becomes dizzy at sea, is that he has no ‘there’ in relation to which he can determine where he is, or because he has no point of reference for determining the ‘there’.

The same thing is true of the determination of time. If I am to determine where I am ‘now’, I must have another point in time well determined in relation to which I define this ‘now’. Hence the words chosen as the subject of this discourse contain quite properly another determination by means of which the speaker defines this ‘now’: ‘now’ we are nearer salvation than ‘when’ we became believers. This makes excellent sense. When a man says, ‘I am now farther along with this or that work than when I began it,’ there is sense in this determination of the time. In the fact that he began he has one fixed point of time, and he measures the distance from the beginning in order to see where he is now. But in case this man had never begun this work — why, then his talk is senseless: it is senseless to say, one is ‘now’ nearer than ‘when’ one began, if one never began. And in case a person who never had begun to believe were to imitate this and say thoughtlessly, ‘now is our salvation nearer than when we believed,’ that is senseless.

Recite these words in order to test thine own life by means of them, so as to learn to know where thou ‘now’ art. If thou art to learn to know this, thou must accordingly make sure first that thou knowest with precision ‘when’ that time was when thou didst become a believer, or when occurred in thy life the decision to believe. Art thou well aware of this difficulty which attacks one as it were from behind? For the question is not whether thou hast gone backward since that time when thou didst become a believer, whether thou hast abandoned faith. For one might argue thus: It goes without saying that salvation is ‘now’ nearer than ‘when’ I believed; for the ‘now’ is a later instant than the ‘when’, so it is a matter of course — unless, as was said, thou hast since that time abandoned faith. But on the other hand nothing follows as a matter of course if it is not certain that thou didst once become a believer, that thou didst experience the instant when thou didst become a believer.

When didst thou become a believer? It is of immense importance to make this definite if thou art to be able to define where thou art ‘now’. And in case the situation is of such a sort that it must contribute to leave gloaming in indefiniteness the question whether thou didst actually become a believer, in that case thou canst well perceive how near to thee is absurdity, how it encompasses thee as it were, how easy it would be to pass thy whole life in absurdity — and therefore how important it is for thee to tear thyself free from all illusion which would prevent thee from learning to know whether thou wast ever a believer, all illusion which would make it possible for thee even to hear a sermon on these words, ‘now is salvation nearer than when we believed,’ without discovering that these words were a mockery of thee, who didst remain nevertheless quite undisturbed in the absurd assurance that ‘now’ thou art nearer thy salvation than ‘when’ thou didst become a believer — thou who never didst become a believer. For perhaps the sermon prompted thee to test thy life as to whether thou hadst later renounced faith. In this respect, however, thou wast not conscious of any fault, thou didst search thy life and didst find that it was possible to say boldly that thou didst never deny the faith or publicly renounce it. So thou mightest ‘now’ be nearer to salvation than ‘when’ thou didst become a believer. Alas it was hid from thee that the misfortune precisely was that thou never didst become a believer — so that only in this sense is the affirmation quite correct that thou didst not later... renounce faith.

When didst thou become a believer; or, what is the same thing, art thou essentially conscious of having experienced this decision to become a believer? For the important thing is not that it was midday at 12 o'clock or the like. No, the whole thing is a spiritual affair and therefore has the true seriousness which is not inclined to ask about the hour or the stroke of the clock. But on the other hand it is perfectly evident that it would be a game like that called 'passing the house' if a man, being asked in his old age when he became a believer, were to reply, 'Well, it was a long time ago'; being asked if it was in his manhood, were to say, 'No, it was a longer time ago'; being asked if it was in his youth, were to say, 'It was even longer ago, in short, it was so long ago that I can't remember when.' It is evident that this would be a game, and that it is senseless for a man to say where he 'now' is in relation to salvation if the decision by which he became a believer recedes into the fabulous dimness of the nursery-tale.

When didst thou become a believer? Didst thou become a believer? It is not now as in those... difficult ages when a Jew or a pagan became a Christian in ripe years; for then surely he knew definitely when... and that he became a believer. We now live in more... favourable times, in Christendom; it is now far easier to become a Christian — in any case far easier to fool oneself into passing one's whole life in a vain conceit. Thou wast baptized as a child, instructed in the Christian religion, confirmed, everybody regards thee as a Christian, thou callest thyself such when there is any occasion to give thy name, thy position in life, and the religion thou dost profess. About whether thou art to be a merchant, a scholar, an artist, a soldier, etc., etc., about whether thou shalt marry this one or the other, where thou shalt dwell, in the town or in the country — all such questions thou hast had occasion at one time or another in thy life to propose and to answer, so thou wilt be able to say ‘when’, and also be able to determine in all these respects where thou ‘now’ art. But the question whether thou art a believer has perhaps never arisen for thee; as long back as thy memory extends it has been assumed that thou art a Christian, and at one time must have become such — God knows when.

And where art thou ‘now’; art thou ‘now’ nearer thy salvation? Thou hast surely heard of that simple wise man of ancient times who knew how to question so craftily. This question may easily sound like one of his, like a question which has the purpose of putting a man in embarrassment, of making evident the confusion on the part of the inquirer. Now I neither will nor can interrogate thee; but imagine that it is he, the simple wise man, who interrogates thee. Thou knowest that even in Christendom the catechetical art is modelled after him, but never has any catechist been capable of interrogating as he did. Think of this simple wise man, the determined hater of evasion and excuse and unclearness and misstatement, who moreover was cunning, sly, clever and bold in ferreting such things out; he who had no teaching which he would aloofly deliver to men in a lecture, but precisely in the rôle of a teacher pierced through men with his penetrating glance, so that the man who conversed with him seemed to be conversing with himself, so that his most inward thoughts were revealed to this teacher; he who not only fetched down wisdom from heaven, but knew how to penetrate with it ‘the individual’. Think that it is this simple wise man that questions thee; think how he could persist in teasing a man with this question, whether he is ‘now’ nearer to his salvation; think how he could turn and twist this question in innumerable ways, but always banteringly, always with that smile upon his face which was so characteristic of him when he had a suspicion that he with whom he conversed did not know definitely for his part which was which, did not know whether he really understood or whether he did not understand, whether he had become a believer or whether he had not become a believer; think of his perseverance until he, the simple man, had got the questioner trapped and made it manifest that he had been under an illusion. ‘Art thou “now” nearer to it (to salvation)?’

‘Yes. But nearer than...?’ This perhaps produces a pause, and when this pause occurs it has the power of transforming the whole discourse into confusion. So thou art now ‘nearer’; this ‘nearer’ is comparative, but with what then dost thou compare? Can it properly be said that one man is bigger than another, if the other doesn’t exist? There is something tempting, something persuasive in this ‘more’ of comparison, it allures one, as if in a way it were a matter of course, as if one ought not to be distrustful, for after all it is an advance. But if it is not certain that the beginning is given, all this allurement is only allurement into absurdity. No more than the man who is on board a ship ever gets farther than the ship, however many hours he may continue to travel on it, and however many miles he may journey — no more than that does he come in any sense nearer who never started upon the course which leads nearer and nearer. But the way to salvation is faith; and only then can there be any question of being ‘now’ nearer, when it is definitely settled that one became a believer.

Where art thou now; is thy salvation now nearer? Thy salvation! The question is about thy salvation, about coming nearer to thy salvation. And if this is what the question is about, the same question is about something else, about being lost. Thy perdition! Suppose thou hast made a mistake in life and become a merchant when really thou shouldest have been an artist. Well, good Lord, that may be pretty hard, but even that misfortune can be lived down. Suppose thou didst make a mistake in life and married the girl — but her sister would have suited thee better. Well, good Lord, one can put up with being out of luck. But if a man is out of luck with his salvation! Suppose that in the most vigorous moment of thy youth thou didst conceive the plan of a Herculean work which thou wouldst perform and which was to be thy life-work; but thou wast delayed on the way and hindered by various things, it was discovered that thou hadst not the strength for it, in short, at thy life's end thou wast not perceptibly nearer to it than at the beginning. Well, good Lord, there is consolation for this sorrow too. But if at thy life's end thou hast not come nearer to thy salvation! Is there anything more dreadful than to be far from one's salvation? And to be in this situation, far from one's salvation, means in fact to be receding farther and farther. Salvation is correlative to danger; one who is not in danger cannot be saved. So if thou art in danger, and thy salvation is not nearer, thou art sinking deeper and deeper into danger. Ah, like the shipwrecked man who has saved himself by a plank, and thus, tossed by the waves, hovering over the abyss, between life and death, gazes fixedly at the land — so should a man be concerned for his salvation. But can a man be farther away from his salvation than when he does not even know definitely whether he has begun to will to be saved?

Test thyself therefore by means of this saying. It is a blessed comfort to dare to know that one's salvation is nearer than when one became a believer — but surely it is true that one must be certain one has become a believer. This saying therefore may serve to comfort, but also it may as it were come upon one from behind. If it happen that thereby a man is prompted to take notice, it is indeed terrifying — oh, but even in this terror, in this salutary terror, there is some comfort. There is some comfort; for after all when a man has taken notice of the fact that he has not even begun, he is always somewhat nearer his salvation than he was so long as he was living on confidently in an illusion and a vain conceit.

One thing more, however: let us not forget that the expression used by the Apostle is different from the way we have interpreted this saying. He says, 'Now is our salvation nearer than when we became believers.' The words as we have used them concentrate the whole thought upon our own activity in the matter, and they are so used for the sake of making people take notice. The Apostolic words lay stress at the same time upon the fact that our salvation is from God. The Apostle does not say that we come nearer to our salvation, but that salvation comes nearer to us. And about this too it might be necessary to talk, so as to remind the believer that he is not to be in a hurry, not to think that he is to acquire what essentially is bestowed. It might well be necessary to talk about this — if only it always were clear where we are. But in order to become aware of this we must first know whether we have become believers.

VI. IT IS BLESSED NEVERTHELESS... TO SUFFER DERISION IN A GOOD CAUSE

AFTER ALL, 'BLESSEDNESS' is surely the highest good; so of this good that must be true which is true of the lesser goods. For if an orator or a poet were to describe the glory of some earthly good or another, he would surely make people desire it, so that they hardly would be able to keep still during the discourse, but would be impatient to be off and away in order to grasp it. And how much reason they would have to be angry with this orator for deluding them with this desirable prospect when the speech concluded with the warning that it is fortune which distributes these goods! If such were not the case, they must indeed feel that they never could sufficiently thank the orator who knew how to describe so invitingly and so fascinatingly the goods which every one could possess. But 'blessedness' is the highest good, and every man can get possession of this good. Accordingly it might be expected that people could hardly resolve to hear this discourse to the end for the impatience they must feel to acquire this good, the highest good, which nevertheless every man can acquire. It might be expected that they would feel concerned lest the moment employed in listening to this discourse might be a moment wasted, since it was not in the strictest sense employed in attaining.

And such a discourse on 'blessedness' we have from an age now long gone by. It was delivered upon a mountain which after it was called the Mount of the Beatitudes — for blessedness, in comparison with all earthly goods, stands fast and immovable like the mountain, and again, blessedness, in comparison with all earthly goods, is like a mountain lifted up above the low plains. This discourse was delivered by Him, the only one who at first hand could talk of blessedness, since this is associated with His name, the only one in whom is blessedness. In this discourse it is said: ‘Blessed are they who have been persecuted for righteousness’ sake, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye when men shall reproach you and persecute you and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven; for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you.’

These words we shall lay at the foundation of the following discourse on the theme:

IT IS BLESSED NEVERTHELESS... TO SUFFER DERISION IN A GOOD CAUSE.

— in order that we for our edification may become aware of the comfort, or rather of the joy which Christianity proclaims; for these discourses are indeed ‘for edification’, in spite of the fact that they ‘wound from behind’.

But lest in any way this joy might be taken in vain, let us first recite expressly the conditions upon which this experience can in any sense be said to be blessed. It must be for a good cause one is derided, or, as Christ says, ‘for righteousness’ sake’. And what derision says must be false, for Christ says, ‘when all men speak all manner of evil against you falsely’. But given these factors, everything else follows; yea, then it is blessed... to suffer derision.

So then comfort thyself, thou derided man, or rather rejoice! — What is the only thing that can deprive one of joy at having done a good deed? It is to get a reward for it. But if thou art rewarded by derision! Every other requital diminishes the good one has done; the requital of derision increases it. It is blessed to suffer derision in a good cause! — What is the only case in which a man can have real merit? When he suffers because he does right. For if he does right and is rewarded, he is an unprofitable servant. It is blessed therefore to suffer derision in a good cause! — What is required for mutual understanding? Only like understands like. What is requisite for a covenant? Initiation: only the initiate is in covenant with the initiates. That glorious One whom the race cast out, mocked, derided, persecuted and slew — He exists indeed for all men, many perhaps could give an account of His life and describe it. But this understanding is that of the uninitiated, for whom in a deeper sense He does not exist, since they are not understood by Him any more than they understand Him. Only he understood Him and was understood by Him, only he was initiated into a covenant with Him, who himself suffered the like. Blessed it is to be derided in a good cause! — What is it a man inquires about who for a considerable time must change his residence, moving from the town into the country, or from the country to town? He inquires about the society. But the man who suffers derision, when once he must change his residence and wander away, when he leaves the society in which he lived derided — then, precisely for the fact that he suffered derision, he has assured himself for an eternity of the society of that glorious One in daily confidential intercourse, in hearty understanding and in loving converse. It is blessed therefore to suffer derision in a good cause! — What is the only distinction God makes? That between right and wrong. And what distinction does He make? That He is wrath and a curse upon him who does wrong. And in making this distinction He makes still another distinction: between him who does right and is rewarded for it, and him who does right and suffers for it. But the more distinction He makes, so much the nearer to Him is the man who is related to Him by this distinction. Blessed therefore is he who suffers derision in a good cause! — Why is it that God never leaves Himself without a witness? Because in being the Good He is unchangeably the same, the same unchanged God; when today all creatures, as a thousand years before, look up to Him and ask for food and clothing, He opens His bountiful hand and satisfies every living thing with blessing. But when he who suffers innocently for a good cause lifts up his glance prayerfully to God, this glance moves Him, this glance which is able to accomplish nothing, nothing whatever here on earth, moves God, it requires Him to give an even stronger witness. Blessed therefore is he who suffers derision in a good cause! What bond of communion between man and man is the most heartfelt? It is suffering. What is man's most blessed communion? That with God. It is blessed to suffer derision in a good cause! — Who possesses most? Is it he who possesses God and at the same time much else, or he who being deprived of all else possesses God alone? Surely it is the latter, for all else 'is loss'. But who is deprived of most? He who did not get his deserts but was rewarded with derision; for the only thing a man essentially owns is his deserts, everything else he owns he owns only accidentally, so that it is not properly his possession. The derided man is deprived of everything; excluded from human society, he has only God — who is the richest of all. He has only God — ah, how blessed to be alone so as to have God; blessed be all the persecution, the scorn, the mockery which taught him, which constrained him, to be alone with God, to have God as his only possession. It is blessed to suffer derision in a good cause! — Where is Christ present? Wherever His name is called upon, though but two or three are gathered together in His name, He is present. Yea, and when one suffers innocently for righteousness sake and calls upon His name, there is there, besides the voice which calls upon Him, something which calls upon Him more mightily, and hence there is the communion of His suffering and the power of His resurrection. It is blessed to suffer derision in a good cause! — What is it a man desires as the highest reward? To have his name inscribed on the page of history. But think of it, that the man who is derided, precisely by suffering derision gets the highest reward, gets his name written in the Book of Life! For sure enough we are all immortal, even they who do wrong, also the most ungodly of all the ungodly. But to have one's name written in the Book of Life! Blessed it is to suffer derision in a good cause! Yea, blessed, blessed comfort, blessed But to whom does this discourse address itself? where is it? has it entirely forgotten itself? Perhaps in this distinguished assembly there is not a single man who suffers derision — but no, it is not 'perhaps', it is an impossibility that any derided man might venture into this distinguished assembly! One cannot at the same time be derided and also be here in a company where the honoured and esteemed are assembled. A derided man is like a leper, his place is appointed among the graves, he is shunned by everybody. 'Yes, but it is for a good cause he is derided.' By whom then is he derided? It cannot well be by those who themselves are derided, for that would put him among the persons highly regarded. Nor can the derided man be at once derided, and at the same time, by the very persons who deride him, be held in honour because he is derided in a good cause. Even in a comedy the same man could not be used at the same time in two places — to be derided, and also to be honoured because he was derided in a good cause.

A strange difficulty! And it is strange that this difficulty does not emerge at all when one contemplates history. Contemplate that witness for the truth; it is now several centuries since he lived, but when he lived he was derided and persecuted. In the service of the truth he had got far too long a start for limping justice to catch up with him as long as he lived, more especially because, without dawdling an instant to await limping justice, he made giant strides ahead. Then he died and lay still in the grave — then limping justice caught up with him: his name was honoured and extolled in history; we are now so accustomed to honour and extol him that finally some fall into the error of thinking that he was honoured and esteemed while he lived. For time exercises a foreshortening spell. His name lives now honoured and extolled for three centuries — and as for him, well, he lived the usual human span of sixty or seventy years, so one can almost say that he has been constantly honoured and esteemed. Oh, yes, quite so, if one wants to talk nebulously — otherwise, no. He never lived honoured and esteemed — he lived despised, persecuted, mocked, as long as he lived. And at the time he lived it must have been the honoured and esteemed people that despised him — just as now it is the honoured and esteemed people that extol his name. But the witness for the truth triumphed, and as in other respects he altered the shape of the world, so too he altered the concept of honour: after his death he became the honoured one, and they who lived contemporary with him, the honoured and esteemed people, appear now in another light. So long as he lived this was not the case, for he had to comfort himself with the teaching of Christianity that it is blessed to suffer for righteousness sake. He both felt and understood these words. For whereas many, looking at history backwards, only get confusion out of it, Christianity, on the contrary, addresses itself undeviatingly to the living man and proclaims to him that it is blessed... to suffer derision in a good cause.

That is to say, Christianity has, generally speaking, a suspicion of the honour and esteem paid to man in his lifetime. Far from Christianity be the foolishness of saying that every one who was derided while he lived was therefore on the right path. It says merely: among those who while they lived were derided the true Christian is ordinarily to be found. For this is what Christianity thinks: the eternal, the true, cannot possibly win the applause of the instant, must necessarily win its disapprobation. By being among the honoured and esteemed, Christianity does not precisely mean being in the highest positions and offices — a remark which it is especially important to emphasize, and inexcusable to pass over in silence, in view of the claim of this age which contends obstinately against all government that this contentiousness is Christianity. It is also certain that such a life in high place and in power is often characterized by true renunciation of what is properly meant by being honoured and esteemed. No, Christianly understood, to be honoured and esteemed means: forgetful of the eternal, to serve idolatrously, to serve only, and to take sides with nothing else but what has power in the instant, to 'seek first' the instant, and thereby to reap its applause, that means, to be in the 'world' (and for the world Christianity has no liking), that is, to be on top, that is, as a certain sort of culture claims, 'to be abreast of the world,' in short, it is worldliness. Christianity, on the other hand, requires self-denial with respect to honour and esteem even more definitely than in relation to money. For money is something purely external, but honour is a concept of the mind. Wherefore the Christian is required to ward off from him this sort of honour and esteem. For to be a Christian is a point of honour, and therefore every Christian, for the sake of his own honour and that of Christianity, is obliged to be on his guard to defend the true concept of honour, lest by accepting worldly honour and esteem he become an accomplice in the dissemination of the false concept.

But to whom does this discourse address itself? Does it not, instead of making due use of the place and of the moment, disappoint every reasonable expectation which might expect that here it should be made clear how great a good is honour and esteem, how glorious it is to be honoured and esteemed, and by what means one acquires a good so momentous; for, as the proverb says, 'He who loses honour cuts off his right hand,' so that he is not able to accomplish anything — as is to be seen in the example of the Apostles and the witnesses for the truth, for they were not able to accomplish anything. Yes, certainly, the discourse disappoints this expectation; but on the other hand it does not disappoint him who expected that it would preach Christianity.

'But is it not a great good to be honoured and esteemed?' About that the discourse knows nothing, it knows only that it is blessed to suffer derision in a good cause, and that this is Christianity. 'But did not this apply only in the first ages of Christianity when a man had to contend with Jews and pagans? Should the case be the same in Christendom, in the triumphant Church?' Well, yes, it goes without saying, that if a man were to imagine himself in a place where there lived only genuine Christians, it might then, as a matter of course, be taken as proof that a man was a genuine Christian if he had the applause of such people, was honoured and esteemed by those who themselves willed the true and had a true conception of it, were zealous for knowledge of the truth. But is so-called Christendom such a place? If so, then the consummation would have been reached — and then one might suppose that Christ was deeply absorbed in thought, had forgotten Himself, forgotten to come again; for His coming again corresponds to the consummation. But Christ has not yet come again — and if He were to come again, were to come 'to His own' in a still stricter sense than before, what would His reception be in Christendom? There is much which astonishes me, much which I find strange and inexplicable. When I hear a man say the correct thing — but it never occurs to him to make anything out of it... that astonishes me, I cannot understand him. But this is true of the exceedingly common witticism which I have so often heard and read, which is uttered by all sorts of people, but constantly given out as current coin which no one examines more closely, as one only does with rare, unknown, or foreign coins, since this is sufficiently well known as legal tender, which once a witty man uttered, and clever people seize upon and repeat: that if Christ were now to come again to the world, He would again be crucified... unless in that age the death-penalty had been abolished. And this a man says as carelessly as he would say 'Good day', only he utters it very impressively; and one finds it well said and strikingly apt — and it does not occur, not in the remotest way, to him who says it to ask himself if he is a Christian; and it does not occur to him who hears it to take notice of the blinding illusion of Christendom. Truly, to me this is incomprehensible. It has almost become a by-word in Christendom that if Christ were to come again He would encounter the same fate as before when He came to non-Christians — and yet Christendom is taken to be the triumphant Church, which, if things reached that point, is assumed to be ready to add to its triumphs the new one of crucifying Christ. Well, it's true enough, the 'triumphant Church' has outwardly triumphed over the world, that is to say, it can boast of a worldly triumph over the world (for only inwardly is a godly triumph over the world possible) — so, like all conquerors, it has only one triumph left, that of triumphing over oneself, of becoming a Christian. The concept of Christendom, so long as one does not take notice and scrutinize it, is of all illusions the most dangerous. In Christendom, in fact, Christianity is still militant. Just as little as one who has purchased and had elegantly bound the books he needs to use for his examination can truly be said to have taken his examination, just so little is Christendom in a Christian sense the triumphant Church. In Christendom there are perhaps not a few genuine Christians, but every such Christian is also militant.

'But is it really the intention of Christianity to extol the suffering of derision, however good the cause may be? It is quite another thing to have comfort in readiness for him who was unfortunate enough to come to grief in this way.' Yes, certainly, it is another thing; but this other is not the Christian alternative. There is no excuse for mistaking how this is to be understood. The words in Matthew read: 'Blessed are ye when all men revile you and persecute you and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake; rejoice and be exceeding glad; for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you.' The corresponding passage in Luke (v. 26) reads: 'Woe unto you when all men shall speak well of you! For in the same manner did their fathers to the false prophets.' Woe unto you when all men speak well of you! Here the word 'falsely' is not added; presumably it was not needed, it is assumed that when all men speak well of one it is a lie, and that one's life is a lie. Woe unto you when all men speak well of you!

For this is what Christianity means (and if this is not its meaning, there is no meaning in Christianity), that a man should live his life in such a decisive way, should so definitely and openly maintain what he wills, what he believes and hopes, that it is impossible all might speak well of him. It may be difficult enough to attain this aim, this dreadful aim of having all speak well of one; but, if one is to succeed, it can only be by a shrewd and cowardly effeminacy which Christianity abhors and condemns. If a man is to succeed, he must be like a reed before the wind, for even the least bush can put up at least a little bit of resistance; he must be without any deeper conviction, hollow within, so that, if one would liken time to the wind, he easily can be wafted by every breath of air, and, if one would liken time to a stream, he can as easily float upon the surface; he must be silent when he should speak, speak when he should be silent, say yes when he should say no, and no when he should say yes, answer evasively when he should answer decisively, answer decisively even though it were unto blood, sleep when he should be vigilant, yea, do his part to make others sleep, flee every danger in which forsaken truth can find a stay, and take part in every popular folly; he must entirely forget God and the seriousness of eternity and everything that is high and holy: thus perhaps he may succeed — woe unto him! This, as one sees in Christ's saying, is not only the most paltry inheritance of renown a man can leave behind him, that all men spoke well of him, but it is judgement: woe unto him that he succeeded! It must have been either a base inhuman man, or it must have been a false prophet.

It is blessed nevertheless... to suffer derision in a good cause: woe unto you when all men speak well of you. There is no excuse for mistaking how this saying is to be understood. It is blessed to suffer derision in a good cause, and this is Christianity.

Is this difficult to understand? By no means. Is it difficult to say? By no means — least of all when it is left quite indefinite to whom this is spoken.

But is it possible for a discourse to produce a definite effect? No, the effect a discourse is to produce depends upon who the hearer is. The difficulty with Christianity emerges whenever it is to be made present and actual, whenever it is uttered as it is, and uttered now, at this instant, and to them, precisely to them who are now living. Hence it is that people are so eager to keep Christianity at some little distance. Either they will not express it exactly as it is (that is one way of keeping it at a distance), or they will let it remain indefinite whether it is addressed quite to those who now are living. So the orator fights the air and says, 'Thus it was, as bad as all that, eighteen hundred years ago, and seventeen hundred years ago, and a thousand years ago, and three hundred years ago, and a hundred years ago, and fifty years ago, and thirty-three years ago; but it is not so now.' Strange! And when one looks hard at the asseverating orator, to see if he is quite confident of what he says, he becomes a bit disquieted at this glance which comes so unexpectedly, and with a gesture of irresolution he forsakes for an instant his manuscript and adds extemporaneously: 'Well — I would not say that this world has become perfect, but yet it is not quite like that now, especially in the most recent times.' Strange! For so much is certain, that when one goes backward in time a certain distance, it was formerly just as it is now: seventeen hundred years ago they said, 'So it was a hundred years ago; but it is not so now — well, at all events it is not quite so now, especially in the most recent times'; and three hundred years ago they said, 'So it was fifteen hundred years ago, and a thousand years ago, and three hundred years ago; but it is not so now — well, well, at all events, not in the most recent times.' There must be something lurking at the bottom of this expression, 'the most recent times.' Yes, undoubtedly. One comes as close as possible without actually speaking to the living — and in fact the living generation represents 'the most recent times'. If the address was made to a gathering of young people, one would doubtless say, 'the very most recent times', for then the old folks and elders would not be present, so one might well chastise them — but always preferably the dead, one chastises them at a convenient distance, unmindful of the fine rule of speaking only good of the dead.
